Now, how about taxation on the utility property itself? Let us say that a municipality or a P. U. D. wants to take over a private plant. We realize that the tax structure would be disbalanced if a community suddenly lost the taxes theretofore paid by the private utility property. We have taken the position that all municipal plants and other public agencies should voluntarily pay into the Public Treasury an amount equivalent to the State and local taxes previously paid by the utility whose property they have taken over. Our standard retail rates are based upon this theory and are high enough to include this tax equivalent. If the people of Portland were to authorize the city to acquire the private electric systems, I have no doubt that such a provision would be included in any contract which Bonneville would sign with the municipal plant. Such a provision would protect property owners from the loss of a large block of taxable property.

Let me again say in closing what I have been trying to say throughout these remarks. As men whose livelihood is bound up with real-estate values and whose future is dependent upon an active market for land, you are by necessity intimately concerned with public utilities and particularly with the electric-power system which serves your city. If you conclude that the distribution of electricity in your city is not as economical and as efficient as it might be, it is to your own self-interest to see to it that the distribution of electricity is made more economical and more efficient. How that should be done is a matter for you and the other responsible citizens of the community to decide. Much could be done for Portland's future by consolidating the two present distributing systems. If this consolidation is effected by placing the plants under municipal ownership, that could be done without increasing the burden upon the owners of land within the city. The choice of remedies is in your hands.

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

THE SHOWDOWN

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, the convention over, it is time for Republicans in Congress to inaugurate and insist upon a policy which will prepare us for anything which may come from without; have some prospect of restoring recovery at home. Republicans have voted every dollar the President asked. Now is the time to begin insisting that it and further appropriations be not wasted; be wisely spent.

The day of boondoggling in international affairs and home defense is past. No longer is there time for, nor safety in, political sideshows, however novel, conducted by New Dealers. With the disclosure of danger from subversive leaders in the administration itself and the threat of armed forces from abroad, the performances of the great magician in the White House are as ashes from a burned-out fire. They leave us cold and shivering.

What this country needs, and what it will insist upon when the people as a whole once discover the effect of the cruel and ghastly joke which has been played upon them during the past 7 years, is a safe and efficient building up of the national defense on business principles; the extermination of un-Americanism here at home.

SENSELESS SPENDING

During the past 7 years, we have spent billions in advertising and in staging the most stupendous spending spree of all time. While our attention has been distracted by these amazing performances, those who would destroy our Nation have been boring from within. Only recently did Attorney General Jackson, Assistant Secretary of State Berle, and others high in administrative circles disassociate themselves from organizations which they acknowledged were controlled by subversive influences.

PAYING THE FIDDLER

The show being over, we must pay the fiddler for the music to which we have been dancing. With danger from abroad knocking at our door, we need something more than fireside chats and appropriations, spending for the sake of spending, strutting on the world's stage with a chip on our shoulder and nothing to make good our bluff and bluster. Teddy's thought, "Speak softly and carry a big stick," is a good one now.

OTHER BILLIONS

The President asked, and Congress has appropriated, over $5,000,000,000 for national defense. Much of it cannot be spent for years. The President is asking for additional billions, without any proof that he can or will wisely spend what he has. Appropriations standing alone mean nothing. Nor does the spending of billions insure adequate defense. Upon the shoulders of the Republican minority in Congress rests the patriotic task of seeing to it, by vigorous, effective organization and a constructive program, that the billions of dollars are intelligently, economically spent for that purpose.

WATCHING EXPENDITURES

Republicans will forget partisan politics and insist that the only legislation which gets through Congress shall be that which is for the good of the Nation as a whole. Republicans should cease to swallow without examination legislation proposed either by the New Dealers, the Army, or the Navy. To prodigal spending should be added economical buying and efficient production.

COUNT THE COST

Let us have a program. Let that program be one which either initiates or offers by way of amendment legislative safeguards which, while preparing for national defense, exterminating subversive activities, will protect and insure the continuation of our form of government—a government by law under the Constitution rather than a government by those who think themselves supermen, possessed of master minds. "For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" For what shall it profit future generations of Americans, if, in preparing to meet foreign aggression, we lose the liberty and freedom we now enjoy?

THE PEOPLE ARE RESPONSIBLE

Yes; we here in Congress have a duty, but the people have one just as great, just as urgent. From now until election day in November, they should watch their Congressmen and Senators; inform themselves of the questions which must be answered; answered correctly, if we as a people are to retain the freedom, the prosperity, the liberty, which we so long have enjoyed; which we have never sufficiently appreciated.

THE FUTURE IS IN OUR HANDS

Whether we and our children here in America are to continue to have a land of opportunity, homes of our own, an education for the asking, freedom to worship, the privilege of earning our living and accumulating for our old age; or whether we are to become as cattle in the stanchions, as work horses in the harness, dumb humans serving the purposes of a dictator drunk with power, depends not wholly upon the people's representatives in Congress, but upon the willingness of the people to pause in their tasks or their pleasures; inform themselves of existing facts; consider those facts sanely and solve intelligently and soundly the questions involved; give the right answers by their ballots in November.

We must decide whether we intend to follow the New Deal along the road of wasteful spending into national bankruptcy, regimentation, the concentration of power in Washington, meddling in the internal affairs of Europe while insisting that European nations stay out of the Western Hemisphere; whether, in short, we are to attempt to settle the quarrels of Europe by entering into the World War, either directly or through the back door; sending millions of Americans to die, either in the Eastern Hemisphere or in South America or Mexico.

We must decide whether we are determined to return to those principles of constitutional government which for 150 years have guided us faithfully along the way which gave us prosperity, freedom, opportunity; which, if we continue to follow, will enable us to adequately prepare to successfully meet and overcome all dangers, whether they come from within or without.

We must decide whether we intend to avoid, as Washington advised, entanglement in the affairs of Europe; so prepare for national defense that even the most aggressive and insane of foreign dictators will not dare to attack us.

Unless we answer these questions correctly, we shall go the way of the nations of Europe; our children will be deprived of the blessings which we have enjoyed and will become, as have the peoples of Europe, but cannon fodder.

EDITORIALS FROM THE MONROE (MICH.) EVENING NEWS

Mr. MICHENER. Mr. Speaker, we are all very much interested in the reaction of the country to the nomination by the Republicans at the Philadelphia convention of Wendell Willkie as the Republican standard bearer for the 1940 election. It seems to be generally conceded that Mr. Willkie has aroused an enthusiasm seldom equaled in political annals. Therefore, pursuant to permission given me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am including two editorials from the Monroe (Mich.) Evening News. These editorials were written by J. S. Gray, the editor, who was present in the press gallery throughout the convention. This newspaper is one of the outstanding small-town dailies in the country. It is independent politically, and I am convinced that these editorials indicate the general feeling of the people in Michigan.

The editorials are as follows:

THE REPUBLICAN NOMINEE

Every American, no matter what his political affiliations, can rejoice at the outcome of the Republican national convention as far as its choice for President is concerned. Adherents of all political parties welcome the emergence of popular leaders and the expression of the will of the people at nominating conventions.

No one can say Wendell Willkie bought the Republican nomination. No one can say the delegates did the bidding of any political boss in choosing him. No one can say his selection does not represent the rank and file of Republicans, east, west, north, or south, rich or poor, in office or out. No one can say Mr. Willkie is the tool of Wall Street or public utilities or big business or anything else. He is simply the overwhelming choice of a vast majority of the partisans duly chosen to make a nomination for President, and of the other partisans back home.

He was named over the opposition or indifference of almost every recognized and titular leader of the Republican Party. If he cares to, he can virtually clean house in the entire command of his party. Republicanism underwent a new birth at Philadelphia when its rank and file turned their backs on its past potentates and picked a man utterly outside all organization recognition. Everything smacking of old guardism was tossed overboard when the most unbossed, the freest-thinking, the least awe-struck Republican convention since the beginning of the party expressed its earnest desire and nominated a man who was not even considered in the running 6 months ago.

The minority, opposition party, thus makes a fresh start. The bitterness and defeatism of 8 years are wiped out. The campaign begins with a clean slate. The councils of the past are ignored. The leaders who went down to defeat are deposed.

A man with no political background, no partisan obligations, no pledges or promises for patronage, no embarrassing links with bosses, no tie-up with ax grinders, has become the nominee of a major political party. He accomplished what no accredited prophet of political behavior would predict 4 weeks ago.

Even when the pressure upon him was greatest, during the early balloting, and when the temptations of "deals" were obviously held out to him, it appears that he went his own steadfast way. He was determined to win only if a majority of the delegates wanted him, and he would have no truck with the dickerers and make no commitments to anybody.

Because Wendell Willkie enters the 1940 campaign under such circumstances, and as a fresh vindication of the democratic process, members of all parties can join with Republicans in jubilation. The people have had their way, the partisan dictators have met their match. Whether or not Mr. Willkie wins a majority of the popular vote cast in November, he has reinvigorated America's faith in self-government, restored confidence in democracy, renewed our determination to pursue our way in the face of disturbing events abroad and proved once more that a people who undertake to rule themselves not only can produce their own leaders, but provide them with the opportunities to lead.

"BLITZ" CAMPAIGN

The gauntlet has been thrown down by the Republicans; the Democrats must answer the challenge July 15. The one man who personifies everything domestically opposed to the New Deal from T. V. A. to "brain trust," from business baiting to Kelly-Hague-Pendergast-ism, from Court packing to pay roll packing, is out in front of the Republican parade that will pass the voters' reviewing stand November 5.

Obviously the United States is about to witness a campaign the like of which it has never seen. In one corner a fresh, vigorous, inexhaustible Wendell Willkie, not shopworn by previous campaigning, who sleeps 3 or 4 hours out of 24, runs half a dozen utilities, meets all comers, speaks what he thinks, and has an utterly nonpolitical mind.

In the other corner is the New Deal, embattled for the first time by a fire-eater, one who does not wait, mouselike, for the opposition to strike, but carries the fight into enemy territory. If any persuasion were needed to spur the new dealers on in their third-term draft movement, it was the sixth ballot at Philadelphia. That doesn't entirely dispose of the question, however, for the President has yet to speak his own mind.

But no matter whom the Democrats let their mantle fall upon in the Windy City, whether it be Paul V. McNutt; Honest Harold Ickes, the former Republican, the hoe-handle diplomat; Cordell Hull; Henry Wallace, the farmer's friend; or even Frank Hague's "Golden Boy" Cromwell, late of Ottawa, the country is in for a heavyweight championship battle, with no holds barred, ere November rolls around.

A man who can sweep from a bare 1 percent to the lead among a half-dozen rivals in the Gallup poll in a mere 2 months, make the Old Guard knuckle down, and capture a Republican Convention after only 2 years of Republican Party membership is a fellow the new dealers will have to watch out for.

A man who can predict his nomination on the sixth ballot, and win, has something to rival that, until now, peerless prognosticator James A. Farley. A man shrewd enough to pick Senator CHARLES MCNARY, of Oregon, for a running mate and schedule his acceptance speech on the front steps of his high-school alma mater in an Indiana town has already won his political spurs entitling him to match wits with a purge-directing Tommy Corcoran. A man who can meet reporters at all hours of the day or night and never utter a roorback has something that none other than F. D. R. himself possesses.

Front pages will blossom and radios will crackle between now and November with a brand of "blitz" campaign the like of which America has never seen, from the days of torchlight processions down to the nights of fireside chats.

A Reply to Political Critics

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEWTON (IOWA) DAILY NEWS

Mr. LECOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Newton Daily News, of Newton, Iowa, of June 26, 1940:

[From the Newton (Iowa) Daily News of June 26, 1940]

A REPLY TO POLITICAL CRITICS

Governor Stassen's keynote speech to the Republican National Convention Monday night should provide ample reply to various of newspaper and radio columnists who have been rather free with their criticism of Republicans for daring to speak out against some of the acts of the present administration.

Governor Stassen bottomed his keynote on a broad base—that of united Americanism. Said the hard-hitting Governor of Minnesota, "As Americans, Republicans propose to stand behind the acts of the President and Congress now in power—as long as it continues in power. But at the same time Republicans have a responsibility to make 'constructive criticism,' to engage in 'vigorous debate' on questions that come before the Nation. That is the animate evidence that democracy is still living," declared the youthful Governor.

To those columnists, and we are sorry to say there are a number of them such as Walter Lippmann, Dorothy Thompson, and sometimes Raymond Clapper and Mark Sullivan, this should provide stinging rebuttal to charges of Republican stagnation and playing of politics.

Republicans have opposed some of the measures of this administration, particularly as regards this country's conduct in the field of international relations. Democrats have opposed the administration, too, on that score. These critics call that playing politics. Simply because opposition is voiced to some of the statements and proposals of our President, is that a sign of lack of statesmanship? After all, who are these commentators, themselves individuals with individual opinions to say the final word with regard to human progress and human achievement? Quite proper for them to express their opinions. But similarly theirs doesn't happen to be the last word either.

Meantime, it is well again to emphasize the importance of maintaining fulsome discussions here in America at this time. And while some want to go to war now, and some don't, the important thing is to permit complete discussion of the matter.

A Prayer for Courage

OF

HON. GEORGE W. GILLIE

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE FORT WAYNE (IND.) NEWS-SENTINEL

Mr. GILLIE. Mr. Speaker, we in Congress have the greatest admiration for the common-sense judgment of our able and genial colleague from Wyoming, the Honorable FRANK O. HORTON. So all of you, I am sure, will be pleased to learn that his fame is not confined to the State he represents single-handed or to the hallowed Halls of Congress. It extends to Indiana, home of the next President of the United States—Wendell L. Willkie—who was started on the way to the White House with the assistance of this same gentleman from Wyoming.

As proof of this fact I am placing in the RECORD a recent editorial from my home-town newspaper, the Fort Wayne News-Sentinel, commenting on the attitude of the gentleman from Wyoming, Congressman HORTON, on a vital problem of the moment. I commend it to the attention of every Member of this body:

[From the Fort Wayne (Ind.) News-Sentinel of June 22, 1940]

A PRAYER FOR COURAGE

Representative FRANK O. HORTON, of Wyoming, has recently given expression to some mighty fine common sense on the subject of the much-twittered but ill-considered phrase: "Help the Allies with everything short of war."

Representative HORTON asks, When does a pig become a hog? Is there any fine line of distinction? Can you tell just where one stops and the other starts?

He applies a similar line of questioning to short of war. And he correctly says that the American people properly refuse to throw their hats in the air and go along with the procession until they know where they are headed and by whom.

The gentleman from Wyoming is not impressed by big names among either individuals or newspapers. He is concerned with hard facts and logical conclusions.

As for one-man Presidential action in aiding the Allies with either surplus or obsolete equipment—

Mr. HORTON has noted that of 50 so-called obsolete planes recently traded in to make them available to the Allies, 22 were invoiced to our Government since March 7, 1940; and that of the remaining 28, the oldest was delivered on May 16, 1939. Obsolete, indeed!

A similar situation prevails with respect to battleships, rifles, cannon, machine guns, etc.

And "it makes little difference whether the President will sell these direct to a belligerent or through a junk dealer." Nor does it appear that the President has any proper legal authority to make any such deal.

Moreover, article VI of the Hague Convention of 1907, concerning the rights and duties of neutral powers in any time of war, provides:

"The supply, in any manner, directly or indirectly, by a neutral power to a belligerent power, of warships, ammunition, or war materials of any kind whatever is forbidden."

Both the United States and Germany solemnly signed that treaty. The United States is a neutral power. England and France are belligerents.

Hence, the President, on his own authority, has treated a contract signed by this country's agents and ratified by this country's Senate, as a shabby scrap of paper.

As Representative HORTON says: "The action just taken and about to be expanded by the President is an utter violation of every principle of international law and is tantamount to an act of war."

But under the Constitution it is the Congress, not the President, who is authorized to declare war. And, as the gentleman from Wyoming says, "If this tantamount-to-war action by the President leads to a declaration of war, then actually the President has usurped the most sacred and inviolate right of the Congress."

And such usurpation of power spells dictator.

But what if Germany wins in Europe? What if Germany construes the President's action as a declaration of war? Inquires Mr. HORTON: "Would we or would we not be considered by the victor as among his defeated enemies and demands made upon us to pay the cost of the war?"

Well, certainly we have never in our entire history been in poorer shape to defend ourselves than we are today. And so: If our boys do go abroad to fight again, they will go unprepared to meet modern warfare—just like cattle being led to the slaughter.

If they are butchered—on whose hands will their blood be?

Congress has still the duty and the power to prevent such butchery. As the people's advocate, it should summon the President before the bar of judgment, and cancel all war-provoking acts. May God grant that Congress shall muster the courage to do that very thing before it is too late.

Nominating Wendell Lewis Willkie for President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. WILLIAM DITTER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. CHARLES A. HALLECK, OF INDIANA

Mr. DITTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the text of address of Representative CHARLES A. HALLECK, of Indiana, nominating Wendell Lewis Willkie as the next President of the United States, before the Republican National Convention, June 27, 1940, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, fellow delegates, men and women of America, this is a free and independent convention of a great political party. It is one convention in which the delegates are going to choose the candidate. It is representative government in action. It is proof that democracy is yet alive and efficient.

If anyone were to ask me what job in this convention I would like best to have, I would choose the job I've got right now. I'd say, I want to place in nomination before this independent body the name of the next President of the United States—Wendell Lewis Willkie.

I nominate Wendell Willkie because, better than any man I know, he can build this country back to prosperity.

I nominate him because, better than any man I know, he can keep us out of war. As a veteran who served in France he knows the horror of war at first hand. He is against war. And he can scare these dictators by building us the greatest defense system on earth.

I nominate him because he is the strongest campaigner that the people of this country have seen in a generation. He can win next November. He has licked Franklin Roosevelt once; he can do it again.

I nominate him because if he were elected he would make a President that this country would be proud of; because every one of you would be proud to say to your children and grandchildren, "I helped to put that man in the White House."

I nominate him because he understands business; he is one of the most successful managers in the country.

Because he understands labor; he has 30 contracts with established unions, both A. F. of L. and C. I. O.

Because he understands agriculture; he has worked on farms and he owns five in Indiana.

He will pull these groups together. He will never make a deal, domestic or foreign, that will be unfair to any one of them.

I nominate this man because he knows what an organization is; because, out of his own experience, he knows how to work with, through, and for an organization.

I nominate him because he is a Republican who will stand by his party, win, lose, or draw.

And in presenting this nomination, I ask only one thing. I ask that this proposition be decided on its merits. That's the way I want it decided. That's the way my candidate wants it decided. And that's the way the people want it decided.

And let me tell you this from my candidate, from all his supporters, and from myself: Whoever you select to lead this party to victory next November, you'll find us in there pitching to assure that victory.

Back in Indiana where he was born, this man had a nickname. They called him "Win" Willkie. Indiana had the right idea about him from the beginning.

Put yourself back in that little old town of Elwood 48 years ago. There was a boom in natural gas. They had so much gas they never turned out the lights. Then the gas ran out and everybody in town went broke.

Why, this man Willkie knew about public utilities before Franklin D. Roosevelt had hardly heard of Indiana. And I'll say this: It'll be better to have a public-utility President than a President who has no public utility.

Win's father and mother were both lawyers. They loved books, they loved ideas, and they loved freedom. That's what they taught their children.

Win is an Indiana boy. He went to Indiana University. He was admitted to the Indiana bar. He went to war from Indiana. And he married the librarian of Rushville, an Indiana girl.

He got to work right early. When he was 11 he went into business with one of his older brothers. Later he harvested wheat in Minnesota. He dressed tools in the oil fields in Texas. He operated a cement-blocking machine in Wyoming. He ran a boom-town hotel in Colorado. And he bummed his way out to California in a freight car to pick vegetables.

He's familiar with every region of the United States, mostly because he's worked there. He knows the land and its history. He learned history in Indiana; he taught history at a school in Kansas; and he made history in the valley of the Tennessee.

He knows the east coast and the Alleghenies, the broad plains and the Rocky Mountains, the west coast, and the southern coast. He can see all that in his mind's eye.

In all those areas he has been the friend of the people; today he is hailed in all those areas by the people; and my proposition is that we put him to work for the people.

As he says, he left Indiana because the competition got too tough. But I'll tell you why he left. He left because of an irresistible urge to test himself against the toughest jobs that are to be found in this great enterprise that we call the United States.

He left Indiana to face, time after time, the challenge of a free, hard-working, competitive system.

He met that challenge at the bar. And you of Ohio can remember him as one of the most brilliant lawyers in Akron for more than 10 years.

He met that challenge in industry. And you of Georgia, of Michigan, of Ohio, of Indiana, of Illinois, of Pennsylvania, of South Carolina, of Alabama, of Mississippi, of Florida know him as one who has produced more electricity for less money than any major operator in the land.

He met that challenge when he stood up almost alone against the New Deal on an issue involving the rights of all of us to do business—and won it.

And he is meeting that challenge today by standing without compromise for the simple, homely principles of liberty.

Mr. Chairman, and fellow delegates, in this day of trial, when we stand in doubt before the terrible events of Europe; when we stand in danger, our arms bound by the restrictions of a hostile Government in Washington, our minds poisoned by political philosophies that we can only dread: I submit that this man who has thrust himself into every corner of our American life, from the wheatfields to the skyscrapers of Manhattan, and from the Indiana bar to the committee rooms of Congress—that this man Wendell Willkie is the man we need for the defense and rehabilitation of our American life.

The people of this country are worried, and perplexed. They want the wheels of industry to turn, they want bigger farm incomes, they want a better break for labor, they want to give new opportunity to those who are now unemployed. Above all they want to defend this country from aggression.

I submit, Mr. Chairman, that this is the man the people are looking for. If any man can do that job, Wendell Willkie can.

I have heard it said—and we have all heard it said—that he is unavailable to our party because he is a businessman. Worse, he has made a success of that business and of himself.

Are we to understand from this proposition, Mr. Chairman, that any man is barred from our deliberations who has been an American success?

What should that Indiana boy have done when he accepted the challenge that came his way? Shall we say that a man must refuse to enter American industry in order to become a leader of this Nation?

Is that the stand that the Republican Party is prepared to take?

Fellow delegates, that is New Deal propaganda.

I have a boy 11 years old. He's ambitious. And I want him some day to make a contribution to his country.

What path shall I tell my boy to follow? Shall I say to him:

"Son, if you want to get anywhere in this world for heaven's sake don't succeed in business? If you get an offer to head up a big industrial company, don't accept it. If you have a chance to increase our American standard of living by producing more goods for less cost, don't take that chance. Because if you do the Republican Party won't accept you."

Or shall I say to that boy: "I know a man born in Indiana just like you. His dad didn't have any more dough than I've got. He didn't have any better opportunity than you've got. But that fellow got a chance to run one of America's big enterprises. He took that chance. He succeeded at it. And I want you to do likewise."

You bet I'm going to tell my boy that. I'm not going to fill him full of New Deal propaganda. I am going to fill him full of the old fight.

Let's look at the record.

On January 1, 1933, this man I'm giving you became the president of a business with assets of over a billion dollars, employing 25,000 men and women in 10 States. This company was operating at a deficit. Its morale was low.

On March 4, 1933, 4 months later, Franklin D. Roosevelt took office as President of the United States. Our country was also operating at a deficit; the national debt was $23,000,000,000; and industry and agriculture were demoralized.

Now what's the picture. Why, the enterprise entrusted to Franklin Roosevelt is worse off. The national debt is crossing $45,000,000,000. We still have at least 9,000,000 unemployed; labor dissatisfied; business without hope; and the country unprepared for the international crisis facing it.

But what happened to the job that America gave Willkie 7 years ago? He hit it like a ton of bricks. That company is making a profit today. It has built new plants. It has expanded. It has cut its prices and raised its output.

While Roosevelt was promising the more abundant life, Willkie was delivering it. He raised the standard of living of every schoolteacher, factory worker, and farmer on his lines.

While Roosevelt was unbalancing an $8,000,000,000 budget, Willkie was helping to balance the $800 family budgets of his customers.

I tell you, the balancing of those $800 budgets is the immediate goal of the Republican Party.

My man has helped to balance them in 10 States. Let's let him try it in 48!

Or do you believe with the new dealers that there is no hope?

Do you believe that the growth of this country is finished?

Do you believe that the family budgets can never be balanced, the family incomes never increased?

If you believe these things don't nominate my man.

For I tell you that this man is going to fight. He believes that this country will grow, that these budgets are going to be balanced and those incomes increased. If you nominate him, that's what he'll fight for, and that will be a fight to tear a man's heart out.

I'm not kidding you. This is one of the serious moments in American history. We are not gathered here merely to confer a title of honor, or to distribute rewards.

I say we are gathered here to save this country from disintegration. We are gathered to assign the most stupendous job on the American record. We are not rewarding anybody.

He whom we choose here will age more rapidly than we. He will never again enjoy life as he has enjoyed it in the past. The scars of the fight that lies ahead of him will be with him forever.

The people of this country have risen up in overwhelming numbers to tell you this. They have risen up to tell you that they want this fighter, this man Willkie.

How do I know this? Again, the record is my proof.

A year ago a few personal friends began saying that this man ought to be President. He turned them off with courteous and friendly gestures. Six months ago he was known as an occasional contributor to national magazines. Three months ago a few individuals who made no pretense at a knowledge of politics set out to see what they could do.

And then—less than 9 weeks ago—the first Willkie for President club was started. And a great uprising of the people began.

In less than 9 weeks, by voluntary effort, without a political organization, and with no campaign fund, this man has been taken up by the people in every walk of life and in every corner of the land.

And as one who believes in the democratic process and the Republican Party, I am confident that you delegates will not ignore that demand.

I have heard it said that we, the delegates to the Republican National Convention, would never nominate this man because he is too recently a Democrat.

Is the Republican Party a closed corporation? Do you have to be born in it?

In 1936 my candidate became a Republican by conviction. He voted that year for the ticket that we nominated in Cleveland. In 1938 he demonstrated his conviction by enrolling in the Republican Party.

Mr. Chairman, we do not run the Republican Party on the basis of seniority.

Let it never be said that we bar from our deliberations a man who is one of us—a man who believes in us—a man in whom millions of our people, members of our party, already fervently believe.

Now let's get down to business here.

You know, and I know, that Wendell Willkie can win next November.

I ask this question of those delegates and candidates in whose districts he has appeared. If you were running for office, wouldn't you like to have this man come into your district as the head of your party? Wouldn't you like to have him stand shoulder-to-shoulder with you on a platform to make the fight of your political lives? I know the answer. The answer is "yes."

My man can win because he stands four-square for those two great principles of our party—freedom of life and freedom of enterprise. The Republican Party will vote solidly for Willkie.

He can win because millions who habitually belong to no party—the huge, shifting balance-of-power vote—crave those blessings of freedom. They will vote for Willkie.

He can win because millions now enrolled in the Democratic Party crave those blessings—denied to them by their own party. They will vote for Willkie.

When this man appears before the country in a real campaign, the whole blessed Nation will vote for him. I tell you we'll have a Republican stampede.

I know what I'm talking about. I've been here in Philadelphia for 2 weeks riding in front of a tidal wave the like of which has never been known in national politics. I've felt the surge of the people beneath me. And I've seen a vision.

I see now as I have never seen before that a great battle has broken out upon the earth. It is a battle between slavery and freedom.

We have talked about economic competition and industrial competition. But I see now a more desperate competition—a competition between two different ways of life—the totalitarian and the free.

Fellow delegates, to win that competition we must be strong. Only the strong can be free.

If Hitler can build a stronger system than ours, we shall lose that competition to Hitler. Our way of life will be liquidated.

Already the New Deal, impotent to compete against the rising totalitarians, has made a move toward drafting the manhood of this country. This is exactly the opposite direction from the one in which we ought to move.

The only way we can compete against a competitor is to make our own system work in its own way better than the competitor's system.

This is my vision. Millions of people in this country have seen it, and millions more will follow.

We, the people, want a man whose honor and integrity cannot be questioned.

We, the people, want a man whose personal loyalty has met the test of thousands upon thousands to whom he has freely given it.

But above all we, the people, want a strong man to defend our freedom.

A man who can liberate us from the grip of depression.

A man who can save us by building the greatest defense system in history.

A man who can awaken our energies to create for us a new world.

Mr. Chairman, I'm just a young Congressman from Indiana, but in 6 years I've seen 'em all. And when I stand in the presence of this man in this crisis I say to myself: There's a man big enough to be President of the United States—Wendell Lewis Willkie.

TELEGRAM OF TWENTY-FOURTH WARD DEMOCRATIC ORGANIZATION OF ST. LOUIS

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, to anyone familiar with Missouri Democratic politics the Twenty-Fourth Ward of the city of St. Louis has long been recognized as a bulwark of democracy in our State. This ward year after year casts a Democratic vote that is larger than that cast in many a congressional district. It has been my good fortune to have the high honor of representing the twenty-fourth ward of St. Louis in Congress.

Several days ago the great Democratic organization of the Twenty-Fourth Ward of St. Louis addressed a telegram to the President of the United States. I ask unanimous consent to close my remarks by extending that telegram in the RECORD at this point.

President, United States, Washington, D. C.

The twenty-fourth ward Democratic organization in regular meeting assembled unanimously adopted the following resolution: "We believed in you in 1932. You have shown and convinced us from the bank holiday of March 1933 down to the present moment that your every concern and heartbeat has been for the man in the street and that you are animated with a consuming desire to at all times serve the best interests of our beloved country. Because of this our ward gave you 21,383 votes in 1936, as against 11,321 for your opponent. We believe you to be the man of the hour in 1940. Yours has been an inspired leadership and you retain today, as you have always had, our utmost confidence. We pray Almighty God may continue to guide and direct you in your every act."

Will Gold Become Useless?

ARTICLE FROM THE NATIONAL CITY BANK OF NEW YORK MAGAZINE

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, on the ever-important subject of gold and its future no article has come with such clarity and cogency as the current one in the June 1940 issue of the National City Bank of New York Magazine.

I am taking advantage of the unanimous consent that I have obtained to include the summary of that study in the RECORD.

WILL GOLD BECOME USELESS?

In the discussion up to this point the assumption has been that gold will continue to hold its place as a monetary base and chief medium for making international payments. Query—how do we know that this assumption is correct? The answer is, frankly, that we don't know. Nothing is certain in this world, least of all conditions and practices after the war. However, there are good reasons for continuing faith in gold.

First, there is the long-established tradition in favor of gold. This did not just happen. Gold, more than any other material, combines the necessary attributes of basic money. It is prized for its beauty; it does not tarnish; it has scarcity; its supply shows relatively constant growth compared with violent fluctuations in most commodities; it cannot be ground out on printing presses like paper money or ballooned to the skies like bank credit; it is durable; it can be divided into parts of any size without loss of value; it is easily manipulated; and finally, it is easily transported. In times of danger and disaster mankind has always turned to gold as the one sure sanctuary. What else is so easily hidden from the enemy, so indestructible, so easily removed to a place of safety, so certain of future value as gold? The fact is that the world has experimented with all kinds of materials, both as money and as a store of value, but because of inherent qualities none has stood the test of time so well, or achieved such universal recognition and acceptability as gold. All this may seem elementary, but it is well to ponder these things when doubts arise concerning gold.

True, the gold standard broke down during and after the great war of 1914–18, but so did the silver and managed-currency standards. Moreover, this break-down did not signify that gold itself was any less prized. The phrase so often heard that such and such countries have "abandoned" gold is misleading and does not mean what it sounds like. What has occurred is simply a suspension of the willingness to redeem currency and bank deposits in gold, decided upon to safeguard the national gold holdings from exportation to other countries. This is not "abandonment" of gold, but the reverse.

A second important reason why gold is unlikely to lose its value is that not only the United States, but other countries as well, have large vested interests in gold. The British Empire alone accounts for nearly half the gold output of the world, and in many other countries gold production is an important national asset. These countries would not look with favor upon the displacement of gold as a monetary metal; and even in the event of political changes resulting from the war these vested interests would remain, though possibly shifted to other national jurisdictions.

A third important argument in favor of gold is one that should hardly need emphasis at this time—its dependability as a war chest. In the great war of 1914–18 gold, shipped here in what was then unprecedented volume, helped the Allies pay for needed materials and supplies before we entered the war. Later, in the Italian-Ethiopian war, gold from the banking reserves and gathered from the people contributed a vital share of Italy's foreign exchange requirements to carry on the war. Japan likewise found gold an unfailing source of purchasing power, and has striven in all possible ways to expand its output in order to maintain the flow of imports essential for war purposes. And now the new war in Europe is demonstrating as never before the great value of gold as a war chest.

Credits may be refused, payments in goods impeded both by inability to supply the goods or unwillingness of foreign markets to receive them, and securities prove of uncertain value, but the nation that has gold can always command purchasing power abroad. It is one of the strong points of the Allies that they have large stores of gold to assure them this command over foreign markets. It is one of the admitted weaknesses of Germany that she is lacking in this vital resource. Was there ever a time more inappropriate for questioning the value of gold? Conceivably the time may come when we, too, shall be in need of a war chest, and be thankful that we have it in gold.

Still a fourth argument for gold is that, war or peace, there is no satisfactory substitute for it as a means of settling international trade and controlling the exchanges. Without gold it would probably be impossible for stabilization funds to operate, for no major country would be willing to accumulate indefinitely the paper currencies of other countries. And without such controls, or the stabilizing influence of free gold movements, exchange conditions between anything like free economies would be chaotic.

The one alternative to gold would be complete regimentation of foreign trade by governments, with resort to all the cumbersome and stifling mechanisms of so-called clearing agreements, blocked currencies, and the like. In effect, it would mean reducing world trade to a primitive barter basis. Possibly, in the disorganization resulting from war, such desperate devices may be accepted for a time, but it is idle to talk of barter as a permanent substitute for gold. No such volume of trade as blessed the world in the years before 1914, and again for years during the twenties, would be possible under a system of barter. None of the nations knows this so well as those who have tried barter since the break-down of the exchanges—among them Germany. There were no stancher champions of the gold standard than the bankers of Germany, and among them Dr. Schacht, economic controller of Germany for a time under the National Socialist Party. It was Bismarck who put Germany on the gold basis in 1873, using the gold indemnity received from France after the victory of 1871, and it was Schacht who piloted Germany back to the gold base after the World War—aided by the Dawes loan of 1924.

It is true that Germany has been "getting along without gold" but this has not been from choice but from necessity. Germans have likewise been getting along without a lot of other things that they will want to have as soon as they are able to pay for them. How many people can seriously think that Germany will putter around for long with barter if and when it can get gold?

Of course, so long as Europe is dominated by war, and industry and trade are suppressed, gold will tend, both for safety and in obedience to movements of trade, to concentrate in this country. But this will not always be so. Out of the present chaos must eventually come peace, reconstruction, and a new order of things, in which the countries of Europe, with their wealth of trained labor, industrial equipment, research laboratories, and capable scientists, will again become factors in the trade and capital markets of the world. To attempt to put a time schedule on this process obviously would be impossible, but of one thing we may be certain—the balance of payments will not always be in favor of the United States. And as the currents of international trade and capital movements shift, so will gold movements shift. Other countries will begin to take a larger share of the new gold production, and possibly even draw substantially from our own large holdings. Thus, in the course of time, will gold maldistribution—which has its seat in world confusion and disorder—be corrected.

WHAT TO DO

In conclusion, what should we do about gold? As Secretary Morgenthau said in an address last month, "There is only one sound way in which we can work to reduce the inflow of gold and to promote the return of at least a part of the wealth it represents to useful service in the lands from which it came. That way is to do all in our power to contribute to the return of peace to the world and to encourage reconstruction and the restoration of normal trade." For reasons given, it seems abundantly clear that there is little cause for worry on the score of gold losing its value, our being left "holding the bag," and the like. It seems equally clear that we should keep on buying gold at the present price. However we may feel about the wisdom or necessity of having raised the price in the first place, it is now much too late to go back. For the past 6½ years the Treasury's policy of holding the price unchanged has been a factor making for stability and confidence. To reduce the price now would produce a new series of dislocations and disturbances.

Indeed we could well afford to go beyond the mere maintenance of the present price, by formally terminating the executive power to further devalue the dollar, and by anchoring the currency firmly on the solid foundation of gold. Possibly we might even go the whole way of paying out gold freely in exchange for currency notes to all who might want it. Granting that the amount taken might not be large, nevertheless it would in proportion reduce the large Treasury gold stock and bank excess reserves. Moreover, and perhaps more important, it would increase confidence in the money and make more difficult in the future changes in its gold value. Certainly we could dispense with the unnecessary and costly accumulation of silver.

The more serious if less immediate problem pertaining to our growing gold stock is not the danger of its becoming worthless, but rather the danger that lies latent in these huge additions to the credit base. With bank-excess reserves standing above $6,000,000,000 and still rising, the potentialities for excessive credit expansion and inflation are ever present. It is in this sector that the longer-term problem lies, even though the present problem is still to get money to work.

Various suggestions to improve the mechanism of monetary control have been made which require careful study. It may be assumed that the possibilities will be fully explored by the committee of Congress headed by Senator Wagner of New York and now engaged in making a comprehensive study, in cooperation with other Government agencies and banking associations, of the entire banking and currency system.

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

RESOLUTION BY CITIZENS

Mr. LUTHER A JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, a few days ago, at Waxahachie, in Ellis County, Tex., which is in the Sixth Congressional District, which I have the honor to represent, 2,000 citizens of Ellis County gathered in a patriotic mass meeting for the purpose of expressing their opinion relative to the international crisis and the preparation and defense of America with reference thereto.

A citizens' committee was appointed to draft resolutions, and the resolutions, after being so drafted, were presented to the mass meeting and unanimously adopted.

Under leave granted to extend my remarks, I submit herewith the resolutions so adopted, with the names of the citizens' committee signed thereto.

Be it resolved by those herein assembled, That we, the citizens of Ellis County, at a county-wide meeting held in the city of Waxahachie, Tex., on this the 21st day of June 1940, do hereby reaffirm our unfaltering faith in the principles of democracy to the end that government of the people, by the people, and for the people under the Constitution shall be forever perpetuated;

That we hereby reaffirm our loyalty and faith in our Government and to the President and Congress of the United States, and that we hereby evidence our full faith and confidence in their efforts to perpetuate the principles of democracy and the liberties and freedom of a great Nation; that we do hereby

Further resolve, That in our judgment this Nation must be promptly and adequately armed to an extent sufficient to meet any threat to this Nation from any source whatsoever, and to this end we strongly urge the Congress and President of the United States to proceed without delay to build a powerful navy, an army of whatever size the world conditions may require in the opinion of those charged with our defense, an air force second to none, and that all the necessary mechanized equipment be provided without delay; and, further, that if, in order to attain these ends it becomes necessary to commandeer the full resources of this Nation, we hereby urge the Congress and President of these United States to lay aside factional differences and to proceed without fear for the accomplishment of such ends;

That we hereby express our sympathy for the cause of the Allies in their fight for the democratic form of government, and urge that they be promptly furnished with all the munitions, arms, and equipment of war consistent with the safety and defense of our own shores;

That we do hereby further urge upon the Congress the passage of laws to prevent subversive movements within, to the end that the united efforts of this Nation in its program of defense shall not be interfered with. In line with this paragraph, we commend to the Nation the distinguished services of the Honorable MARTIN DIES in his exposure of elements that would undermine our Government from within while accepting the protection and hospitality of our people; and

That a copy of these resolutions be forthwith placed in the hands of our Congressmen and of the President of the United States.

Unanimously adopted by 2,000 loyal citizens present with the high purpose of presenting to the world a united front and of upholding the hands of those charged with our defense.

Air-Mail Pick-Up Should Be Widely Used

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1940

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, I trust the President will soon sign H. R. 9899, which passed the House of Representatives on June 21, and 1 day later passed the Senate. Our action in this matter has received favorable newspaper comment. As an example, I include at this point in my remarks the following editorial from the Philadelphia Evening Bulletin:

AIR MAIL PICK-UP ENDORSED

When the House unanimously passed a bill to permit the Civil Aeronautics Authority to license nonstop air mail pick-up service, a step delayed by the present press of business was taken as expected. The experimental pick-up system, demonstrated successfully in 59 cities of Pennsylvania, Delaware, West Virginia, and Ohio, had been called a success by the Post Office Department. Some 22,000 operations had been undertaken without serious mishap.

The expansion endorsed by the House action relates to the application of All American Aviation, Inc., for authority to operate on a permanent basis in the four States named above and three others—New Jersey, New York, and Kentucky. Pick-up service has been requested in many places.

The pick-up system is at once a direct service to communities that cannot economically support an airport and are not important enough for transport stops, but require faster mail facilities, and a line of feeders for air mail main lines. The method may lead to a fortunate combination of local service and general aviation progress.

Mr. Speaker, it is my hope that it will not be many months before several hundred communities in this country can be served by this system. It is noteworthy to state that the Post Office Department, following the 1 year of experimental service, reported to the Congress that the service is feasible and should be continued and expanded. I have been identified with the legislation, from its inception, which made possible the successful experimental development. I have watched closely the pick-up system as it has operated in the States of Pennsylvania and West Virginia. Real benefits have resulted.

Not many months ago I called attention to the possibilities of this service through an article in Popular Aviation, which I later incorporated in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I wrote:

Imagine a rural free delivery of the air. Air-mail service that does not pass over and ignore the little homesteads of 400 to 500 persons. That instead blankets the entire Nation with routes that will give these little towns an air-mail service just as efficient and virtually as frequent as now is rendered to the country's largest metropoli such as New York, Chicago, Kansas City, San Francisco, and others.

Quoting further from that article, I said:

If you can see this picture you realize that such an R. F. D. of the air promises to bring about the most far-reaching development that commercial aviation has seen since it first became a reality. And this kind of service is not a wild dream.

Continuing in that vein I wrote:

The small cities are finding air mail of greater value than it has proved to large cities on the major air lines. Most of the larger cities also have excellent railroad facilities so that even without air transportation they would have good mail delivery. But this is not the case with many of the towns served by Triple A. Some of them, such as Glenville or Grantsville—both West Virginia county seats—do not even have railroads. They are turning with great enthusiasm to air mail. Glenville, with a population of only 800, has a daily dispatch of about 3 pounds. On a per capita basis this exceeds that of the world's largest air-mail center.

The middle of May found the experimental period coming to a close. It was decided that the service be suspended until Congress had put its stamp of approval on the plan. This has been done. I hope that it will not be long until the Civil Aeronautics Board can approve pending applications for routes which will expand this necessary phase of the development of civil aviation in the United States.

The Outlook for America

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES SECCOMBE

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1940

ADDRESS BY DR. ABBA HILLEL SILVER, THE TEMPLE, CLEVELAND, OHIO

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered by Dr. Abba Hillel Silver, of the Temple, Cleveland, Ohio, before the National Conference of Social Work on Thursday evening, May 30, 1940, at Grand Rapids, Mich.:

THE OUTLOOK FOR AMERICA

It would be difficult even in normal times to discuss the subject which has been assigned to me, The Outlook for America. Tonight it is quite impossible. The outlook for the entire world is being determined today, and for decades to come, on the battlefields of France and Flanders. Destiny now waits upon military decisions. There is no way of formulating a world outlook without reference to these unpredictable military decisions. Should the Allies win, the world will be one kind of place for men to live in; should they lose, it will be an altogether different kind of place—radically and fundamentally different.

The outlook for America is likewise inextricably bound up with these fateful military decisions now in the making. The American people have now realized this fact, though somewhat belatedly. It took the frightening and shocking events of the last few weeks abroad to startle our people into a final realization of the interlocking destiny of the Eastern and Western Hemispheres, and into a final surrender of those comfortable and beguiling notions of political and economic isolationism. From now on we will not expect our foreign policy to be spun in an international vacuum. The fiction of national security through strict neutrality has been shattered forever. The nations which relied upon it have been destroyed. Our defense program must now envision an embattled America in a world of powerful neighbors whose way of life and whose political and economic creeds are potential enemies of America.

Suddenly we have discovered that our national existence is not quite secure. Neither our wealth nor our Military Establishment, nor the intervening oceans now seem to be adequate defense. Suddenly we have discovered that we are not quite secure even from attack from within. We have become apprehensive of the menace of subversive forces within the Nation, which we chose to ignore heretofore, but which we now realize might in a critical hour for our Nation undermine our strength and our strongholds, just as they have done in so many countries abroad. The Old World has moved in upon us, unbidden and unwelcome. But it is here! The feverish eagerness with which we read every new edition of our newspapers and listen to broadcasts of international news, is an indication not merely of our interest in an historic struggle which is going on overseas, but of our profound and troubled concern with the implications of that struggle for us and our children. We suspect that the shifting lines on the maps of the battlefields of Europe which we so avidly scan are projections and extensions of our own national destiny in the proximate future.

If, therefore, you ask me what is the outlook for America, my answer would have to be that it depends, to a large extent, and for a considerable time to come, on the outcome of the present war. The outlook being uncertain, the American people must prepare itself for either eventuality, for a victory or a defeat of the Allies.

If the Allies win, victory can come only after a prolonged and exhausting war which will shake the very foundations of the social, political, and economic life of Europe. Much will be destroyed beside material wealth and cities, towns, and provinces. A colossal effort will have to be made at the conclusion of the war to reconstruct Europe, and this time it must be made according to a saner and juster pattern than that which followed the first World War—one that will carry with it the promise of a more lasting peace. America will have to share in the responsibility for this gigantic task of reconstruction; for its own economic and political fortunes will be vitally involved. To do that we shall have to reconcile ourselves to the necessity of assuming definite obligations and responsibilities for any international order which we shall help to bring into existence. We shall not dare to repeat the folly of 1919. We shall make no proposals and offer no counsel without at the same time indicating our readiness to assume our full and just share of responsibility for the carrying out of these proposals and for the embodiment of these counsels into concrete social structures. We shall not again deposit any of our brain children upon the doorsteps of Europe—and precipitously abscond.

It is, of course, doubtful whether our advice will be heeded by the victorious Allies if we deny them, in this their bitter struggle and in these their dark days of agony and suffering and sacrifice, maximum aid. If we cannot help them to win the war, they will feel free to dispense with our advice to fix the peace. Americans who counsel noninvolvement in the European struggle, even in a nonmilitary sense, ought not to be thinking in terms of our involvement in European affairs after the war by way of our unsolicited counsel and gratuitous moral scolding and curtain lecturing from the side lines at the peace conference.

This, too, should be clearly grasped. If we wish to make secure our way of life for ourselves and our children, we must help to make it secure in the world. A victory for the Allies will help to make it secure. A victory for the Nazis will destroy it in Europe and will endanger it on this hemisphere. This is realism. All else is wishful and addled thinking.

The question today is not one of praise or blame of Allied innocence or guilt in the past or in the present. France and England are not without blame for many of the moral disasters of the last 20 years. Their leaders committed gross and criminal follies. Fundamentally they neither worked for peace nor prepared for war. They failed to rise to the spiritual exigencies of the new order which the World War made inevitable. They destroyed with their own hands the ideals of collective security, disarmament, and the rich promise of the League of Nations. But all that does not lessen by one whit the present Nazi menace to civilization, the imminent threat to all the precious values which western civilization evolved through long centuries of intellectual and spiritual struggle and aspiration. The Nazis have clearly defined their own creed and their program. They have not been reticent about their true intentions. They mean to destroy the culture of the western world, as it has evolved ever since the American and French Revolutions—a culture based on the inalienable rights of man to life, liberty, and the pursuits of happiness, the importance of the individual, the restricted authority of the State, religious and racial tolerance, brotherhood and universal peace, and to substitute for it a neopagan culture of their own, based on a conscious and thoroughgoing revolt against liberty, on the concepts of a monolithic state, the submergence of the individual dictatorship, racialism, and war as a national policy and destiny. The Nazis have incorporated that philosophy ruthlessly within their own borders and are imposing it upon other countries wherever their military prowess entrenches them. They intend to destroy the independence of all the small peoples, and to build up an empire which their vaulted ambitions refuse to circumscribe, in which all subjugated peoples will toil in serfdom to maintain in affluence and in mastery the elite of the Germanic race.

The delinquencies, mistakes, and sins of the Allies in the past cannot be held to condone these vicious doctrines, nor the brutal and inhuman actions of the Nazis since they came into power. They do not atone for the rape of Austria, Czechoslovakia, Poland, Denmark, Norway, Holland, Luxemburg, and Belgium, nor for the shameless and unspeakable persecutions of a helpless and honorable racial minority within their own country.

It is therefore not consistent with the facts, nor a contribution to clear thinking, nor a service to humanity to popularize the idea that in the European struggle now raging there are no basic issues involved with which the American people need at all be concerned, nor that both sides are equally culpable, nor that America stands to lose nothing if Hitlerism succeeds in destroying the last few outposts of democracy and freedom in the Western World. Such reasoning at this late date has all the earmarks of "fifth column" propaganda.

If the Allies lose, Europe will be turned over to the moral anarchy of this streamlined barbarism of the twentieth century, and the rest of the world will not long escape the effects of it.

If the Nazis win, the outlook for America and the American way of life is grave, indeed. We need not fear any imminent invasion, but our American world will become closely encircled by a hostile world, and the pressure upon it will increase as the years go by. It is in the very nature of dictatorships to be aggressive and missionary. The last few years have given ample proof of it. In a world in which there will no longer be a British or a French Empire, the United States will find itself alone, pledged to defend with inadequate resources the whole Western Hemisphere in the face of four powerful imperial dictatorships, grown strong and arrogant with the greatest spoils of all time. We shall have to arm ourselves to the teeth and increasingly to pour our reserves of wealth into our defense program. We shall have to gear up our national economy to a wartime footing and keep it there. Conceivably, our industrial organization will come steadily under added forms of central planning and control, and a system ultimately approximating the emergency forms adopted recently by England will come to pass in our country. There will come about an attenuation of the democratic processes and a lessening of the latitude of liberalism. An intensified nationalism, more suspicious and less tolerant, will emerge. The American way of life will undergo slow, unconscious, but quite definite changes.

But our greatest danger will come from within. A Nazi victory abroad, which will lay the world at their feet, will hearten and inspire their agents, friends, and admirers here. Nothing succeeds like success. Fascists and Nazi sympathizers, adventurers, and would-be Hitlers will spring up like mushrooms all over our country. They will attempt to do here what the Nazis will have succeeded so brilliantly and so swiftly in doing abroad. They will, of course, receive guidance and support from what will then be the greatest empire on earth—the victorious Third Reich. The Americas will be overrun by Nazi agents and the United States, the richest country in the world, will become their special stamping ground. There will not be lacking powerful industrialists here who will be willing to play the role of American Fritz Thyssens to would-be American Hitlers.

What role the Nazis have prescribed for the United States in their political Welt-anschauung is not clear at the moment, but certainly when they make known their program there will not be wanting within our borders a powerful "fifth column" prepared to help them realize it. The members of this "fifth column" will not be recruited exclusively or even principally from the ranks of aliens, but, as in England, Holland, Belgium, Denmark, and Norway, from the blue bloods who always escape fingerprinting and surveillance, from people prominent in the public eye, lay and cleric, from the circles of high Government officials and the military, from reactionaries who hate progressive social legislation and organized labor so bitterly that they will not hesitate to sacrifice all our free institutions in a desperate gambler's throw to save their special privileges. Some of these highly placed personages have already been decorated by the Nazis. Not all who belong to the "fifth column" are necessarily paid spies, agents, and traitors. In that column are also the far more dangerous gentry who have superseding loyalties and who have no use for American free institutions when they thwart their special interests or prejudices.

The outlook for the United States in case of a Nazi military triumph is thus a very serious one indeed. Nevertheless, we ought not to fill our minds with thoughts of doom, or resign ourselves to defeat. Not all of these things may come to pass, or even many of them. There are always the unforeseen and incalculable elements in every historic constellation. No one can plot the future with any degree of certainty. Chance, accident, unforeseen personal and impersonal forces may give the direction of events a sharp turn one way or another. Nevertheless, we should prepare ourselves, as far as possible, for all eventualities. We should build up our national defenses to a point consistent with the definite commitments and responsibilities which we intend to assume in connection with our foreign policy. Also, they should be built up reasonably to a degree where they would be a strong deterrent to any would-be aggressor.

A clear definition of our foreign policy in relation to the 21 countries on this hemisphere is clearly indicated and most urgent. If we mean to enforce the Monroe Doctrine, it is important that the nations which we are to protect from foreign invasion shall, knowingly and willingly, share with us in a well-defined and conserted program for the collective military defense of this hemisphere. We should not plan for them. We should plan with them. They must assume their clear share of responsibility for joint diplomatic action involving the fate of this hemisphere and for military defense measures. For the nations of South and Central America to maintain formal and separate neutrality status, to act independently, unrelated to a central hemisphere policy, or to carry on independent diplomatic negotiations which might unwittingly entangle them in the imperialistic machinations of foreign nations, or to tolerate "fifth columns" in their midst and the establishment of centers of powerful alien influence, is to create dangers on this hemisphere for the United States which might involve us in war against our will. Time should not be lost in implementing the declaration of the solidarity of America adopted by the Eighth Pan American Conference held in Lima in December, 1938, in bringing about a stronger federation of the peoples of the Western Hemisphere, and in formulating specific agreements and covenants among them on all matters involving their collective security.

We should not forget, however, that a strong military defense for our Nation, in itself, is not sufficient. A greater defense for a nation is the loyalty of its citizens and their essential spiritual unity. There are two ways in which these can be conserved. The forces hostile to our form of government and to our free institutions must be continuously exposed and their power broken. No democracy is immune, or can hope to remain immune, as long as it is a democracy, from anti-Democratic propaganda either native or foreign. Forces opposed to democracy will use the very technique and machinery of democracy, as well as its abundant tolerance, to destroy it. In the face of this, democracy must not remain naive or complacent. It must aggressively and relentlessly expose and harass every form of propaganda which is hostile to our basic conceptions of life and government. The agents of foreign dictatorships and their native-born kinsmen must be kept under constant surveillance. Those who wish to destroy free America should not be permitted the glamour of putting their followers in uniform or of parading our public thoroughfares.

But, no hysteria. No witch hunting. No mass stampede away from the Bill of Rights and the constitutional guarantees of a free people. We should not in our great concern, zeal, and impatience, permit ourselves to resort to extralegal and unconstitutional methods to obtain even worthy and desirable objectives. To destroy liberty in an effort to preserve it is the height of folly. The detection, arrest, and punishment of spies, saboteurs, and plotters against our domestic peace and security should be left to our legally constituted authorities who are charged with the enforcement of our laws and the defense of our free institutions.

It should be borne in mind that education still remains the strongest bulwark of a free people. The American people should be educated in the techniques of modern propaganda which have been so skillfully elaborated in our day. They should be made aware of the methods which are employed and the true character of the organizations and governments which employ them. They should be informed as to how racial and religious antagonism are aroused and exploited, in order to divide a people, disrupt its unity, confuse its counsels, and undermine its national resistance to an aggressor. Systematic courses in the detection of and the prophylaxis against false propaganda should be introduced into the curriculum of every high school and college. Furthermore, we have long assumed that education in democracy will somehow take care of itself, as an unconscious byproduct of our day-by-day living. This is no longer true. Democracy is under fire today and on the defensive. Both its theoretic soundness and its practical value have been denied. Many people have rejected it as antiquated, inefficient, and distinctly harmful. Antiliberalism and antidemocracy have today a passionate and heroic zeal behind them. Totalitarianism has millions of enthusiastic devotees in all parts of the world. Quite deliberately and specifically we must begin to educate our people anew, and especially our youth, in the principles, practices, and advantages of democracy.

In the school, the home, the church, through the written and the spoken word, an educational crusade in defense of democracy must be launched. And the time is very short. In this connection, we ought to bear in mind that the source of all political democracy in the western world is fundamentally religion, and that the basic charter of man's dignity and freedom is God.

Friends of democracy have forgotten the religious origin of the democratic dogma in the modern world. They have forgotten that political freedom came to the western world as a result of the struggle for religious freedom and not vice versa. Religion kindled the torch of political freedom in the world, and irreligion is extinguishing it. The reason why the democratic movements are perishing in the western world today is because of an increasing pessimism due to a loss of confidence in the reality of God in the life of man. Man has become frightfully small in our day, reduced in stature, stripped, and spiritually cowered, because his kinship with God, which crowned him with glory and honor and made him "a little lower than the angels," has been contemptuously rejected by a world which has tried to build its life upon foundations of pseudo-scientific materialism. No society can long remain Godless and free. If our crusade to redeem democracy is to succeed, it must draw its inspiration from the inexhaustible fires of religious faith, from the classic religious dogmas that God created man in His image, and that man was endowed by his Creator with inalienable rights of which no state, no bureaucracy, no majority, and no class has the right to deprive him.

The loyalty and unity of our citizens can be enhanced still more if they are made to feel that the American way of life is the best way of life, because in it they find security and happiness. Democracy cannot long survive widespread and prolonged economic suffering. All dictatorships have risen to power upon the economic miseries of their people. A generation of young men and women denied the opportunity to work and to build careers, consigned to demoralizing idleness and frustration is dangerous explosive material. Even the brutalities and indecencies of dictatorship become less repugnant and the ways of freedom appear less appealing in the presence of democracy's tragic failure to care for its people and to safeguard them against frequent and disastrous periods of unemployment and suffering.

Sound American patriotism must quickly translate itself into an intelligent and ardent program for social justice, for a fairer distribution of the social goods, for a larger measure of protection of our people against the hazards of unemployment, sickness and old age. Sound patriotism will look upon the disease and crime-breeding slums of our land, the blasted areas, the underprivileged children, the jobless and hopeless youth, the unemployed man, the underpaid worker, the unsheltered aged, as the real Trojan Horse which traps a free people into destruction. People who feel that they have a stake in their country, that the institutions of their land are being used to the utmost to help them to a more secure and abundant life, and who can see in them the promises of even greater happiness and well-being for their children, will not be inveigled by the propaganda for a totalitarian millennium, and will not be led into revolutionary adventures.

On the other hand the individual citizen should not unload all his responsibilities upon his government or blame it for all his misfortunes or expect all salvation from it. Nor should he sponge upon it for all manner of hand-outs. Those who wish government to provide them at all times with bread and circuses must be prepared to surrender to it all their liberties. Total dependence upon government means total control by government. The danger to a free society is not so much the encroachment by government, as the encroachment of citizens upon their government with all manner of demands which are rightly the responsibilities of private citizens or of associations of private citizens. The individual citizen must discipline himself against the temptation to become the happy-go-lucky ward of what he hopes will be a generous and tolerant and never-failing provider—called the state. Our youth must be trained to regard government as the defense of a free people which must be served and safeguarded through sacrifice, not exploited.

In our effort to maintain our way of life here, we will be strongly helped by some important factors which are uniquely our own.

Ours is a long-established democracy. We have gone through severe crises before, including a Civil War, without sacrificing our democratic apparatus. No long-established democracy has collapsed, even in Europe. We prefer to govern ourselves. The idea of being ruled by a Fuehrer, a Duce, or a Commissar is hateful to our very souls.

We have a wholesome capacity for self-criticism. We are ready to acknowledge our mistakes and to take the blame. We can and do reverse ourselves. We are not hostile to experimentation.

We have vast natural resources. Ours is not a country, but a continent. This is not a starved or crowded land, and our people are not doomed by circumstance to a low standard of living. Poverty is one of the bitterest enemies of democracy. There need be no poverty in our country.

We are a young Nation. We are not handicapped by Old World animosities. We have no threatening neighbors on our frontiers. More than any other people on earth, we can, if so we will, pursue our chosen way of life with confidence and with high hopes.

What is this American way of life? What are the classic elements which give uniqueness and distinction to it?

1. The importance of the individual. Every man is possessed of certain inalienable rights. The state cannot veto them. No majority can abrogate them. All men, regardless of race and religion, are equal before the law. Any attempt to subjugate the individual to the state, or to discriminate against him in law because of race or creed, is a frontal and deadly attack upon the American ideal.

2. Government by consent and not by constraint; government from within and not from without. Dictatorship is government imposed from without. Democracy is government self-imposed from within. The American genius strives to achieve the best possible way of life for the largest possible number of citizens through their own voluntary enterprises, through free experimentation, and step by step through the evolutionary processes of trial and error. The American genius rejects all proffers of ready-made millenniums at the spearpoint of revolution and dictatorship. It prefers the slower and less glamorous way of government. But it also avoids all the horrors of government by purges and liquidations, by terrorism and expropriation by espionage and slavery.

3. The grace of tolerance. We are a composite people. Many races had a hand in the discovery, exploration, colonization, and development of this great country. Ours is a nation made up from its very inception entirely of immigrants. Our American life is a fine mosaic in which many separate race and religious identities are grouped into one noble pattern. Despite occasional lapses, there has prevailed a wholesome attitude of good will, tolerance, and cooperation among our people. The genius of America has manifested itself in steadily dissolving the hard concretion of groups and reducing them to their individual human components. Europe is concerned with the rights of minorities. America is concerned with the rights of men.

Those people, therefore, in our midst who would break up American life into hostile racial or religious groups, and who would persuade others to judge American citizens not on the basis of individual worth, character, or achievement, but on the basis of the race to which they belong, or the religion to which they subscribe, are the deadliest foes of the spirit as well as the peace of the American people.

This true vision of American life should be kept undimmed in these darkening days. It is our sole hope for the future. It is our one chance to keep our dear country free from the ravages of the hates, bitterness, and conflicts which have disfigured the Old World. For the last 20 years the desperate people of Europe have tried a way of life which is the very opposite of the American way of life—the suppression of the individual, government by ukase and dictatorship, and race and religious intolerance—and it has led them, as inevitably it must, to the blood-soaked battlefields of war.

Let us not follow in their tragic footsteps.

Memorial Day reminds us that in every hour of grave national crisis there were found brave men in our land who were prepared to die that America might live. Let us, their descendants, prepare ourselves to live in such a way that America may not die.

The Republican Platform of 1940

OF

HON. HAMILTON FISH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1940

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Mississippi yield to me?

Mr. RANKIN. I yield.

Mr. FISH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks by incorporating in the RECORD the Republican national platform for 1940, providing for a constructive program of Americanism, preparedness, peace, and prosperity.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from New York?

There was no objection.

The platform follows:

The Republican Party, in representative convention assembled, submits to the people of the United States the following declaration of its principles and purposes:

We state our general objectives in the simple and comprehensive words of the preamble to the Constitution of the United States.

Those objectives as there stated are these:

"To form a more perfect Union; establish justice; insure domestic tranquillity; provide for the common defense; promote the general welfare, and secure the blessing of liberty to ourselves and our posterity."

Meeting within the shadow of Independence Hall where those words were written we solemnly reaffirm them as a perfect statement of the ends for which we as a party propose to plan and to labor.

I

The record of the Roosevelt administration is a record of failure to attain any one of those essential objectives.

Instead of leading us into more perfect union the administration has deliberately fanned the flames of class hatred.

Instead of the establishment of justice the administration has sought the subjection of the judiciary to executive discipline and domination.

Instead of insuring domestic tranquillity the administration has made impossible the normal friendly relation between employers and employees and has even succeeded in alienating both the great divisions of organized labor.

Instead of providing for the common defense the administration, notwithstanding the expenditure of billions of our dollars, has left the Nation unprepared to resist foreign attack.

Instead of promoting the general welfare the administration has domesticated the deficit, doubled the debt, imposed taxes where they do the greatest economic harm, and used public money for partisan political advantage.

Instead of the blessings of liberty the administration has imposed upon us a regime of regimentation which has deprived the individual of his freedom and has made of America a shackled giant.

II

Wholly ignoring these great objectives as solemnly declared by the people of the United States, the New Deal administration has, for 7 long years, whirled in a turmoil of shifting, contradictory, and overlapping administration and policies. Confusion has reigned supreme. The only steady undeviating characteristic has been the relentless expansion of the power of the Federal Government over the everyday life of the farmer, the industrial worker, and the businessman. The emergency demands organization—not confusion. It demands free and intelligent cooperation—not incompetent domination. It demands a change.

The New Deal administration has failed America.

It has failed by seducing our people to become continuously dependent upon government, thus weakening their morale and quenching the traditional American spirit.

It has failed by viciously attacking our industrial system and sapping its strength and vigor.

It has failed by attempting to send our Congress home during the world's most tragic hour, so that we might be eased into the war by word or deed during the absence of our elected representatives from Washington.

It has failed by disclosing military details of our equipment to foreign powers over protests by the heads of our armed defense.

It has failed by ignoring the lessons of fact concerning modern, mechanized armed defense.

In these and countless other ways the New Deal administration has either deliberately deceived the American people or proved itself incompetent longer to handle the affairs of our Government.

The zero hour is here. America must prepare at once to defend our shores, our homes, our lives, and our most-cherished ideals.

To establish a first line of defense we must place in official positions men of faith who put America first and who are determined that her governmental and economic system be kept unimpaired.

Our national defense must be so strong that no unfriendly power shall ever set foot on American soil. To assure this strength our national economy, the true basis of America's defense, must be free of unwarranted Government interference.

Only a strong and sufficiently prepared America can speak words of reassurance and hope to the liberty-loving peoples of the world.

NATIONAL DEFENSE

The Republican Party is firmly opposed to involving this Nation in foreign war.

We are still suffering from the ill effects of the last World War, a war which cost us a $24,000,000,000 increase in our national debt, billions of uncollectible foreign debts, and the complete upset of our economic system, in addition to the loss of human life and irreparable damage to the health of thousands of our boys.

The present national administration has already spent for all purposes more than $54,000,000,000, has boosted the national debt and current Federal taxes to an all-time high; and yet by the President's own admission we are still wholly unprepared to defend our country, its institutions, and our individual liberties in a war that threatens to engulf the whole world; and this in spite of the fact that foreign wars have been in progress for 2 years or more and that military information concerning these wars and the rearmament programs of the warring nations has been at all times available to the national administration through its diplomatic and other channels.

The Republican Party stands for Americanism, preparedness, and peace. We accordingly fasten upon the New Deal full responsibility for our unpreparedness and for the consequences of involvement in war.

We declare for the prompt, orderly, and realistic building of our national defense to the point at which we shall be able not only to defend the United States, its possessions, and essential outposts from foreign attack, but also efficiently to uphold in war the Monroe Doctrine. To this task the Republican Party pledges itself when entrusted with national authority. In the meantime we shall support all necessary and proper defense measures proposed by the administration in its belated effort to make up for lost time; but we deplore explosive utterances by the President directed at other governments which serve to imperil our peace; and we condemn all executive acts and proceedings which might lead to war without the authorization of the Congress of the United States.

Our sympathies have been profoundly stirred by invasion of unoffending ccuntries, and by disaster to nations whose ideals most closely resemble our own. We favor the extension to all peoples fighting for liberty, or whose liberty is threatened, of such aid as shall not be in violation of international law or inconsistent with the requirements of our own national defense.

We believe that the spirit which should animate our entire defensive policy is determination to preserve not our material interests merely, but those liberties which are the priceless heritage of America.

REEMPLOYMENT

The New Deal's failure to solve the problem of unemployment and revive opportunity for our youth presents a major challenge to representative government and free enterprise. We propose to re-create opportunity for the youth of America, and put our idle millions back to work in private industry, business, and agriculture. We propose to eliminate needles administrative restrictions, thus restoring lost motion to the wheels of individual enterprise.

RELIEF

We shall remove waste, discrimination, and politics from relief—through administration by the States with Federal grants-in-aid on a fair and nonpolitical basis, thus giving the man and woman on relief a larger share of the funds appropriated.

SOCIAL SECURITY

We favor the extension of necessary old-age benefits on an earmarked pay-as-you-go basis, to the extent that the revenues raised for this purpose will permit. We favor the extension of the unemployment compensation provisions of the Social Security Act, wherever practicable, to those groups and classes not now included. For such groups as may thus be covered we favor a system of unemployment compensation with experience-rating provisions, aimed at protecting the worker in the regularity of his employment and providing adequate compensation for reasonable periods when that regularity of employment is interrupted. The administration should be left with the States with a minimum of Federal control.

LABOR RELATIONS

The Republican Party has always protected the American worker.

We shall maintain labor's right of free organization and collective bargaining.

We believe that peace and prosperity at home require harmony, teamwork, and understanding in all relations between worker and employer. When differences arise, they should be settled directly and voluntarily across the table.

Recent disclosures respecting the administration of the National Labor Relations Act require that this act be amended in fairness to employers and all groups of employees so as to provide true freedom for, and orderliness in, self-organization and collective bargaining.

A prosperous and stable agriculture is the foundation of our economic structure. Its preservation is a national and nonpolitical social problem not yet solved, despite many attempts. The farmer is entitled to a profit-price for his products. The Republican Party will put into effect such governmental policies, temporary and permanent, as will establish and maintain an equitable balance between labor, industry, and agriculture by expanding industrial and business activity, eliminating unemployment, lowering production costs, thereby creating increased consumer buying power for agricultural products.

Until this balance has been attained, we propose to provide benefit payments, based upon a widely applied, constructive soil conservation program free from Government-dominated production control, but administered, as far as practicable, by farmers themselves; to restrict the major benefits of these payments to operators of family-type farms; to continue all present benefit payments until our program becomes operative; and to eliminate the present extensive and costly bureaucratic interference.

We shall provide incentive payments, when necessary, to encourage increased production of agricultural commodities, adaptable to our soil and climate, not now produced in sufficient quantities for our home markets, and will stimulate the use and processing of all farm products in industry as raw materials.

We shall promote a cooperative system of adequate farm credit, at lowest interest rates commensurate with the cost of money, supervised by an independent governmental agency, with ultimate farmer ownership and control; farm-commodity loans to facilitate orderly marketing and stabilize farm income; the expansion of sound, farmer-owned and farmer-controlled cooperative associations; and the support of educational and extension programs to achieve more efficient production and marketing.

We shall foster Government refinancing, where necessary, of the heavy Federal farm debt load through an agency segregated from cooperative credit.

We shall promote a national land-use program for Federal acquisition, without dislocation of local tax returns, of nonproductive farm lands by voluntary sale or lease subject to approval of the States concerned; and the disposition of such lands to appropriate public uses including watershed protection and flood prevention, reforestation, recreation, erosion control, and the conservation of wild life.

We advocate a foreign-trade policy which will end one-man tariff making, afford effective protection to farm products, regain our export markets, and assure an American price level for the domestically consumed portion of our export crops.

We favor effective quarantine against imported livestock, dairy, and other farm products from countries which do not impose health and sanitary standards equal to our own domestic standards.

We approve the orderly development of reclamation and irrigation, project by project, and as conditions justify.

We promise adequate assistance to rural communities suffering disasters frcm flood, drought, and other natural causes.

We shall promote stabilization of agricultural income through intelligent management of accumulated surpluses, and through the development of outlets by supplying those in need at home and abroad.

TARIFF AND RECIPROCAL TRADE

We are threatened by unfair competition in world markets and by the invasion of our home markets, especially by the products of State-controlled foreign economies.

We believe in tariff protection for agriculture, labor, and industry, as essential to our American standard of living. The measure of the protection shall be determined by scientific methods with due regard to the interest of the consumer.

We shall explore every possibility of reopening the channels of international trade through negotiations so conducted as to produce genuine reciprocity and expand our exports.

We condemn the manner in which the so-called reciprocal-trade agreements of the New Deal have been put into effect without adequate hearings, with undue haste, without proper consideration of our domestic producers, and without congressional approval. These defects we shall correct.

MONEY

The Congress should reclaim its constitutional powers over money, and withdraw the President's arbitrary authority to manipulate the currency, establish bimetallism, issue irredeemable paper money, and debase the gold and silver coinage. We shall repeal the Thomas inflation amendment of 1933 and the (foreign) Silver Purchase Act of 1934, and take all possible steps to preserve the value of the Government's huge holdings of gold and reintroduce gold into circulation.

JOBS AND IDLE MONEY

Believing it possible to keep the securities market clean without paralyzing it, we endorse the principle of truth in securities in the securities acts. To get billions of idle dollars and a multitude of idle men back to work and to promote national defense, these acts should be revised and the policies of the Commission changed to encourage the flow of private capital into industry.

TAXATION

Public spending has trebled under the New Deal, while tax burdens have doubled. Huge taxes are necessary to pay for New Deal waste and for neglected national defense. We shall revise the tax system and remove those practices which impede recovery and shall apply policies which stimulate enterprise. We shall not use the taxing power as an instrument of punishment or to secure objectives not otherwise obtainable under existing law.

PUBLIC CREDIT

With urgent need for adequate defense, the people are burdened by a direct and contingent debt exceeding $50,000,000,000. Twenty-nine billions of this debt have been created by New Deal borrowings during the past 7 years. We pledge ourselves to conserve the public credit for all essential purposes by levying taxation sufficient to cover necessary civil expenditure, a substantial part of the defense cost, and the interest and retirement of the national debt.

PUBLIC SPENDING

Millions of men and women still out of work after 7 years of excessive spending refute the New Deal theory that "deficit spending" is the way to prosperity and jobs. Our American system of private enterprise, if permitted to go to work, can rapidly increase the wealth, income, and standard of living of all the people. We solemnly pledge that public expenditures, other than those required for full national defense and relief, shall be cut to levels necessary for the essential services of government.

EQUAL RIGHTS

We favor submission by Congress to the States of an amendment to the Constitution providing for equal rights for men and women.

NEGRO

We pledge that our American citizens of Negro descent shall be given a square deal in the economic and political life of this Nation.

Discrimination in the civil service, the Army, Navy, and all other branches of the Government must cease. To enjoy the full benefits of life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness universal suffrage must be made effective for the Negro citizen. Mob violence shocks the conscience of the Nation and legislation to curb this evil should be enacted.

UNAMERICAN ACTIVITIES

We vigorously condemn the New Deal encouragement of various groups that seek to change the American form of government by means outside the Constitution. We condemn the appointment of members of such un-American groups to high positions of trust in the National Government. The development of the treacherous so-called "fifth column," as it has operated in war-stricken countries, should be a solemn warning to America. We pledge the Republican Party to get rid of such "borers from within."

IMMIGRATION

We favor the strict enforcement of all laws controlling the entry of aliens. The activities of undesirable aliens should be investigated, and those who seek to change by force and violence the American form of government should be deported.

VETERANS

We pledge adequate compensation and care for veterans disabled in the service of our country and for their widows, orphans, and dependents.

INDIANS

We pledge an immediate and final settlement of all Indian claims between the Government and the Indian citizenship of the Nation.

HAWAII

Hawaii, sharing the Nation's obligations equally with the several States, is entitled to the fullest measure of home rule and to equality with the several States in the rights of her citizens and in the application of our national laws.

GOVERNMENT AND BUSINESS

We shall encourage a healthy, confident, and growing private enterprise, confine Government activity to essential public services, and regulate business only so as to protect consumer, employee, and investor and without restricting the production of more and better goods at lower prices.

MONOPOLY

Since the passage of the Sherman Antitrust Act by the Republican Party, we have consistently fought to preserve free competition with regulation to prevent abuse. New Deal policy fosters Government monopoly, restricts production, and fixes prices. We shall enforce antitrust legislation without prejudice or discrimination. We condemn the use or threatened use of criminal indictments to obtain through consent decrees objectives not contemplated by law.

GOVERNMENT COMPETITION

We promise to reduce to the minimum Federal competition with business. We pledge ourselves to establish honest accounting and reporting by every agency of the Federal Government, and to continue only those enterprises whose maintenance is clearly in the public interest.

FREE SPEECH

The principles of a free press and free speech, as established by the Constitution, should apply to the radio. Federal regulation of radio is necessary in view of the natural limitations of wave lengths, but this gives no excuse for censorship. We oppose the use of licensing to establish arbitrary controls. Licenses should be revocable only when, after public hearings, due cause for cancelation is shown.

SMALL BUSINESS

The New Deal policy of interference and arbitrary regulation has injured all business, but especially small business. We promise to encourage the small-business man by removing unnecessary bureaucratic regulation and interference.

STOCK AND COMMODITY EXCHANGES

We favor regulation of stock and commodity exchanges. They should be accorded the fullest measure of self-control consistent with the discharge of their public trust and the prevention of abuse.

INSURANCE

We condemn the New Deal attempts to destroy the confidence of our people in private insurance institutions. We favor continuance of regulation of insurance by the several States.

GOVERNMENT REORGANIZATION

We shall reestablish in the Federal civil service a real merit system on a truly competitive basis and extend it to all non-policy-forming positions.

We pledge ourselves to enact legislation standardizing and simplifying quasi-judicial and administrative agencies to insure adequate notice and hearing, impartiality, adherence to the rules of evidence, and full judicial review of all questions of law and fact.

Our greatest protection against totalitarian government is the American system of checks and balances. The constitutional distribution of legislative, executive, and judicial functions is essential to the preservation of this system. We pledge ourselves to make it the basis of all our policies affecting the organization and operation of our republican form of government.

THIRD TERM

To insure against the overthrow of our American system of government we favor an amendment to the Constitution providing that no person shall be President of the United States for more than two terms.

A PLEDGE OF GOOD FAITH

The acceptance of the nominations made by this convention carries with it, as a matter of private honor and public faith, an undertaking by each candidate to be true to the principles and program herein set forth.

We earnestly urge all patriotic men and women, regardless of former affiliations, to unite with us in the support of our declaration of principles to the end that "government of the people, by the people, and for the people shall not perish from this earth."

Statement Pertaining to S. 134

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW EDMISTON

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1940

Mr. EDMISTON. Mr. Speaker, the George-Edmiston bill (S. 134) and the House bill introduced in this Congress (H. R. 2005) were given long and careful study by the House Committee on Military Affairs. The bills as introduced at the beginning of this Congress were identical with H. R. 8176, which was passed by the Seventy-fifth Congress and disapproved by the President. The committee appointed a special committee to confer with the Veterans' Administration to draft a bill which would overcome the objections to H. R. 8176. The committee accepted the changes suggested by the Veterans' Administration and incorporated them in S. 134, and undoubtedly the Veterans' Administration will recommend its approval when passed by Congress.

The Veterans' Administration's report on H. R. 8176 estimated that 3,194 emergency officers who have 30-percent permanent disabilities would be returned to the retired list at an annual cost of $3,696,000. The Veterans' Administration estimated under this bill, with the amendments, that 1,998 would be returned at a cost of approximately $1,750,000, a difference of more than $1,900,000.

The Veterans' Administration, and others having to do with the retirement of emergency officers, admit that the President was misinformed when he was told that the Emergency Officers' Retirement Act introduced the principle of rank into the World War compensation structure. The act of July 9, 1918, provided retirement for provisional officers, and many were retired at the end of the World War period. Those provisional officers who were not given commissions in the Regular Army were in fact emergency officers. The act of June 4, 1920, provided retirement for emergency officers of the Navy and Marine Corps who were disabled in line of duty on a parity with the officers of the Regular Establishments—there was no causative-factor requirement for either of the above groups. Further, every law providing pension for disability incurred in line of duty during active service, from 1776 down to the Spanish-American War, was based on rank, officers receiving one-half pay for disability incurred in line of duty.

This bill must not be considered as new legislation. Under the present law—section 10, Public, No. 2, the Economy Act—emergency officers wounded in action, and a few disease cases who were actually evacuated from the front lines, are now receiving retired pay. This bill simply extends the privilege to those who actually came out of the war with permanent disabilities caused by disease, and everyone who would be returned to the retired list under this bill would have been retired had they served in the Regular Army, Navy, or Marine Corps, as an emergency officer of the Navy or Marine Corps, or as a provisional Army officer. They would also be eligible for retirement under Public, No. 18, Seventy-sixth Congress. This act grants retirement to officers of the National Guard and Reserve Corps who are called to active duty for 30 days or more—both peace and war service—if they are disabled by disease or injury in line of duty during such service, and places the Reserve and National Guard officers of the future on an exact parity with officers of the Regular Establishment.

The enactment of this legislation will do away with the so-called causative-factor requirement, which makes it necessary for the emergency officer to show by a preponderance of evidence that but for his World War service his disability would not have occurred. It is impossible for those disabled by disease to meet this requirement, as Members of Congress who have handled these cases will know. All of those who would benefit under this bill will be required to show that they came out of the war with their disability.

Ninety percent of those who would be returned to the retired list under this bill are in the ranks of captain, first lieutenant, and second lieutenant. Approximately 800, or 19 percent, of the emergency officers removed from the retired list under the Economy Act have died. It is estimated that about 20 or 25 of those the Veterans' Administration considered would come under this bill have died since the report of November 20, 1939. The average age of this group is 58 years (44 to 84). Their disabilities range from 30 percent to 100 percent and average 60 percent. The disabilities of most of this group were caused by disease, and at their advanced age, the death rate is very high. Within a very few years a large percentage of them will have died.

The emergency officers are the only group of World War veterans suffering with direct service-connected disabilities that have not been given full restoration of benefits taken away by the 1933 Economy Act.

The restrictions contained in this bill, and the large number of deaths, have cut the number who would be returned to the retired list to less than 40 percent of those removed under the act of March 19, 1933. The Veterans' Administration has stated to members of the Military Affairs Committee that S. 134, as amended, is the best bill that has been offered and it is felt that they will recommend its approval when passed by Congress.

The Veterans' Administration in reports on previous emergency officer bills has stated the estimates as to numbers could be considered as the maximum, and it is believed that their estimate of 1,998, less deaths since November 1939, can be considered as the maximum. The rehabilitation services of the major veteran organizations who have handled these cases estimate approximately 1,600 would be returned under this bill at a cost of about $1,400,000, and that within 10 years more than half of them will have died.

Nebraska's Challenge To Make Democracy Work

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. NORRIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 3 (legislative day of Monday, July 1), 1940

ADDRESS BY ROBERT LASCH

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Robert Lasch, who is State editor of the Omaha World-Herald on the subject Nebraska's Challenge To Make Democracy Work.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Columbus (Nebr.) Telegram of June 24, 1940]

NEBRASKA'S CHALLENGE TO MAKE DEMOCRACY WORK—LASCH SAYS STATE'S PEOPLE HAVE JOB IN REBUILDING AGRICULTURE

Following is the text of a speech by Robert Lasch, State editor of the Omaha World-Herald, given Sunday at Harmon Park at Kearney. The occasion was the annual picnic of employees and officers of five public hydroelectric and irrigation districts.

His speech follows:

We are remote from war—here in this beautiful park, in this pleasant city just halfway between the two coasts. We are about as remote from the terrible events of Europe as one could get—in a physical sense.

And yet all of us know how closely the war has touched us since the 10th of May.

We have experienced the desperation and despair of defeat almost as acutely as the people who are doing the fighting.

GOT SCARE OF OUR LIVES

We have sat by our radios, and snatched our newspapers, and worried, and fumed, and hoped. We have seen the worst happen—and we have got the scare of our lives.

We deluded ourselves, for a long time, by thinking that it didn't matter to us what went on in Europe. Now we are suddenly and painfully aware that it does. A world in which totalitarian dictatorship rules undisputed in Europe is not the same old comfortable world we have known for all these years.

Our faith in democracy—our dedication to liberty—our conviction that the most inefficient republic in the world is better than the most powerful dictatorship; this faith is being revived and renewed by the ordeal of fire.

MUST MEET CHALLENGE

The democracy that we so long took for granted has been challenged—and seriously challenged. Now we know that we can take nothing for granted any more—and that the challenge must be met.

There is, after all, only one way to meet the challenge.

That is for every one of us, who possesses this burning faith in freedom, to pitch in—and help make democracy work.

We have got to be strong, as a nation. We have got to be united, as a people. We have got to be resourceful, and energetic, and self-sufficient, as a democracy.

When I say our task is to make democracy work, I am not thinking only in the national sense. I am thinking about our own, common, every day affairs, here at home. The Nation is no greater than its parts. Democracy in the Nation will be no stronger than it is in the States—in the counties—in the towns—and in the public power and irrigation districts.

I was talking the other day—through no fault of my own—with a bond counselor, who specializes in utilities. He knew a great deal about the Nebraska power and irrigation districts—or said he did—and he was able to give me a great many reasons why they were doomed to failure.

Well, I had heard all this before, and some other things, too.

MISSED VITAL POINT

For example, I had heard that the Columbus powerhouse was tipping over, and would soon outlean the leaning tower of Pisa. I had heard that it was impossible to transmit power as the hydrogrid was going to transmit it. I had heard that every one of these projects had long ago been proved impossible.

What struck me was that although this man had a very fine technical knowledge of investments, he was totally ignorant of the real social significance of these Nebraska developments.

He seemed not to realize that these districts are, in the purest sense, democracy at work—that they are people's districts, raised up by the people, to do a vitally necessary—and, indeed, indispensable—job which nobody else was doing or offering to do.

Along the Platte, along the Loup and its upper reaches, the people of Nebraska are setting about the task of conserving and making full use of their water resources. Some day, we hope, they will be discharging the same responsibility along the Republican, the Blue, the lower Platte, the Cedar, and every other workable stream in the State.

This is something that cannot be expressed in terms of the bond market. The canons of Wall Street simply do not apply.

In 1929 we in Nebraska harvested $326,000,000 worth of crops. Ten years later, in 1939, our crops were worth $114,000,000.

In 1929 our farm income was $480,000,000. In 1939 it was down to $247,000,000—a decline of 48 percent.

If anybody wants to hunt out the reason and the justification for these projects, he can find them right there.

MUST ADJUST OURSELVES

If you were dying of thirst, you would not measure the value of a drink of water in terms of debentures or bonds. Nebraska lies in a twilight zone, midway between the arid west and the humid east; and our soil is dying of thirst. The development of our water resources is absolutely necessary unless we are to give up our position as a principal agricultural State and go back to an economy of grass.

Nor is it solely a question of our own selfish interests as a State. Whatever happens abroad, or whatever happens in our own country during the months ahead, it is plain that we shall have to adjust ourselves to a new kind of world.

Abroad a whole continent is engaged in destruction. In this country we are embarking upon a new course, which for as far as we can see ahead will drain a great deal of our substance into nonproductive works of national defense.

These two facts can mean only one thing: For years to come this country is going to need all the energy, all the resources, all the production of wealth it can muster.

The public power and irrigation districts can and must contribute to this new surge of productive energy—whether by increasing the productivity of Nebraska soil or by energizing the transmission lines with power.

JOB IS HARD

But it is one thing to say this and another thing to do it. Nobody knows better than you, who have worked at this job, that the road is long and hard, the disappointments bitter, the discouragements profound.

We hear a great deal in praise of private enterprise. I presume that none of us here would deny that it is the right system of private economic enterprise which, along with democracy, we are trying to preserve. We have a strong feeling that the two go together—for whenever they have been separated, democracy has disappeared.

But while we pay this tribute, let us not forget to say a word, as well, for public enterprise—for the people's enterprise—in doing tasks which nobody but the people can do or will do.

PEOPLE ACT SLOWLY

In some ways, success in a public enterprise is infinitely more than in a private one. When the people act, they generally do so slowly, and uncertainly, and with a great deal of argument. There are set-backs, mistakes, man failure, all kinds of weaknesses peculiar to any democratic undertaking. The spur of self-interest arising from personal profit is lacking. All that keeps the thing going is faith and the will to keep fighting.

So when one of these public enterprises succeeds, in my opinion our applause ought to be loud and long and accompanied by a prayer of gratitude.

You in the public power and irrigation districts are engaged in such an enterprise. You carry the responsibility not only for the welfare of your own undertakings but for those that are yet to come.

It is upon how you conduct your business that the future development of our water resources will depend. For the big job, Nebraska's big job, has only begun. You, as pioneers, are compiling a record, and that record will very largely determine whether Nebraska goes ahead and does the whole job, as it ought to be done, or whether Nebraska gives up in defeat.

DON'T NEED DICTATORS

I do not envy you this responsibility; but on the other hand, I do envy you the opportunity. It is an opportunity to demonstrate, in our own back yard, that democracy can work—an opportunity to prove that the people do not need the services of supermen or dictators, but find within themselves the strength and resources to do what must be done for their own welfare.

When the public power and irrigation districts discharge that obligation, they will be contributing not only to the cause of Nebraska but to the cause of the Nation and of democracy.

Confusion in Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 3 (legislative day of Monday, July 1), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the New York Times of the issue of July 1, 1940, entitled "Confusion in Defense."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times of July 1, 1940]

CONFUSION IN DEFENSE

It is already being hinted that Congress will be called upon to appropriate still more billions for national defense. War Department sources have indicated a wish for equipment costing $3,000,000,000 more than that already authorized, and in addition also, apparently, to the $4,000,000,000 already authorized by the House for a two-ocean navy.

No one wishes to economize where economy would mean inadequate defense. But before new billions are authorized or appropriated the public is entitled to a far clearer picture than it has yet had of how the billions already appropriated are to be spent. It also has a right to ask that only as large funds should be appropriated or authorized now as are necessary to insure the fullest and most efficient physical production for defense that we can secure within the next 12 months, before the end of which time new appropriations can be made in the light of the situation as it then appears.

To appropriate more than this would be actually harmful. It would complicate our already grave fiscal problem; putting our national finances in order is an essential part of national defense. And it would tend to give us dangerously false ideas about the state of our defenses. Big monetary appropriations lead many people to believe that we have equally big defenses. But defense is not a matter of monetary appropriations; it is a matter of actual physical production of planes and ships and tanks and guns and the training of men. To put faith in appropriated billions as such is to mistake the shadow for the substance.

No clear picture whatever exists in the public mind regarding the directions in which the billions of dollars already appropriated are being spent. As a result of an attempted analysis published today the National Economy League concludes that "confusion still seems the order of the day in Washington. It is evident from a review of the figures revealed that we have a loose-leaf method of adding billions and yet more billions to defense costs with seemingly no adequate analysis of needs."

It is not merely that the ordinary citizen does not know how the money appropriated for defense in the last few weeks is to be spent. Congress itself does not know; and this refers not only to the average Congressman but even to the committee members who recommended the appropriations. As Representative COLLINS, of Mississippi, said, in speaking to General Marshall, Army Chief of Staff, in a committee hearing: "All we can do is to ask you to protect this money and see that as much of it as possible goes for the purpose that the American people have been led to believe it has been appropriated for."

Many of the appropriations, in short, have been in the nature of blank checks. The picture remains blurred, since appropriations are made according to bureaus and departments instead of according to specific items of expenditure. The greatest discretion is allowed in the provisions for speeding up production and in financing additional capacity in Government and private plants. Analyzing three recent acts—the Military Establishment Appropriation Act of 1941, the Navy Department Appropriation Act of 1941, and the First Supplemental National Defense Appropriation Act of 1941—and congressional hearings and reports on them, the National Economy League finds that appropriations for these purposes for the fiscal year 1941 total about $4,300,700,000, which, together with authorizations for naval vessels, bring the total of commitments for defense to about $6,000,000,000.

A wide section of the general public is under the impression that these new funds are going mainly into airplanes, the point at which our defense at the moment most seriously and quickly needs to be amplified. But the analysis of the League does not support this impression.

The analysis of naval appropriations, for example, raises direct and immediate questions. As compared with actual expenditures of $669,000,000 for the Navy Department in 1939, appropriations for 1941 so far are $1,868,000,000. And of this amount, $853,000,000 is for construction, replacement, alteration, and repair of naval vessels (not including $141,000,000 more for ordnance and not including the whole new plan for a 70-percent increase in the Navy), while only $161,000,000 is for the Bureau of Aeronautics, plus contract authorizations of $125,000,000. In view of the fact that our most serious shortage today is in airplanes rather than ships and that planes can be built so much faster than ships to meet the present emergency, is it sensible for the Navy to be planning to spend many times as much on ships as on planes?

The questions that the League's analysis raises point to the need of a board of the best experts available in various fields to study the new defense program and to plan a balanced defense for the future.

Senator McNary's Nomination for the Vice Presidency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR CAPPER

OF KANSAS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 3 (legislative day of Monday, July 1), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON POST

Mr. CAPPER. Mr. President, a very fine editorial was printed in the Washington Post on June 29, 1940, commenting favorably on the nomination by the Republican National Convention of the Senator from Oregon [Mr. MCNARY] for Vice President of the United States. It is a well-deserved tribute to our distinguished colleague, and I ask unanimous consent to have the editorial printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of June 29, 1940]

TWO SIDES OF A TICKET

The selection of Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY for the Republican Vice-Presidential nomination was wholly logical. He adds strength and balance to the ticket, in addition to being particularly well qualified for an office of which both the actual and potential importance are too frequently obscured.

The nomination of Mr. McNARY is receiving some criticism on the ground that his views tend to cancel out those of Wendell Willkie, the Presidential nominee. Anyone acquainted with the careers of the two men knows that they do not see eye to eye on every issue. Yet both belong to the liberal wing of the Republican Party. And any differences between them are minimized by the strong assumption that Mr. Willkie had approved the selection of Mr. McNARY before Friday's balloting began.

The contrast between Mr. Willkie and his running mate, moreover, itself helps to make them a formidable team. Those who expect the nominee for the Vice Presidency to be an understudy of the Presidential candidate misunderstand both our party system and the genius of American Government. Every administration at Washington, and consequently every party ticket, must represent a harmonious compromise of viewpoints, policies, and interests. And that is most readily accomplished by choosing for the second place a man who complements the qualities of the standard bearer.

From this viewpoint, of course, Mr. McNARY is an admirable selection. His long experience as a legislator, and particularly as minority leader in the Senate, supplements Mr. Willkie's intensive experience in many fields of private enterprise. Mr. Willkie represents the East and Middle West; Mr. McNARY, the far West. The former's specialty has been industry; the latter's, agriculture.

This diversity of interest and experience is desirable for reasons other than its broad appeal to the electorate. The Vice President ought to be, and frequently is, a close adviser to the President and a potent factor in shaping administration policy. He is particularly useful in this respect when his temperament, as well as his experience, varies from that of the President. Should the Republican ticket win, McNARY, the conciliator, would be in a position to render the most valuable type of service to Willkie, whose energy will always arouse some opposition merely because it is forceful.

Finally, the Vice President has an important function of his own as presiding officer of the Senate. For that task Mr. McNARY's qualifications are almost unique. He is universally respected and loved by Members of the Senate without regard for party lines. And he is recognized as probably the ablest parliamentarian now serving in that body.

Statement by Rear Admiral Yates Stirling, Jr., on United States-British Accord With Japan

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR H. VANDENBERG

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 3 (legislative day of Monday, July 1), 1940

ARTICLE BY YATES STIRLING, JR., REAR ADMIRAL, UNITED STATES NAVY, RETIRED

Mr. VANDENBERG. Mr. President, Rear Admiral Yates Stirling, Jr., retired, an American naval officer, with a long and distinguished career in Asiatic waters, has contributed an article to the United Press regarding Japanese-American relationship. I read one sentence only:

For our part we should begin negotiations for a new basic treaty with Japan to replace the agreement terminated by us last January and should try generally to normalize Japanese-American relations.

I so completely agree with Admiral Stirling's conclusions, as I have been constantly watching events for the past 12 months, that I ask that the full article may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES-BRITISH ACCORD WITH JAPAN ON EAST ASIA IS URGED BY STIRLING—ADMIRAL STRESSES NO POWER CAN HALT TOKYO'S MOVE—SAYS PACT WOULD ENABLE OUR FLEET TO GO TO THE ATLANTIC

(By Yates Stirling, Jr., rear admiral, United States Navy, retired)

It is becoming increasingly clear, in my opinion, that our interests as well as those of Britain lie in reaching a friendly understanding with Japan, if one can be attained.

Japan so far is following a policy of nonbelligerence toward the war, but there are indications she may be leaning toward collaboration with the axis powers. Obviously that collaboration is not in the interest of the British or ourselves.

The question is not one of appeasing the Japanese. It is one of looking facts in the face.

The Japanese Foreign Minister, in his address to the world Saturday, stated the situation we face. He asserted that Japan was the dominant power in east Asia and indicated that the empire shares the view of the axis powers that a new world order must be created in which the great military powers in the chief geographical divisions of the world will dominate groups of the smaller nations.

The plan, as I understand it, is that Japan intends to become—as, indeed, she already is—the dominant power in east Asia and contiguous areas of the Pacific Ocean. This part of the world, if the Japanese can make good in their far-reaching plans, would be reorganized economically, and to an extent politically and militarily, so that it would constitute a unified whole of cooperating peoples. Japan would be the great armed power that would prevent encroachments by other great powers and would make east Asia a region primarily for Asiatics.

VAST CHANGES INVOLVED

If one looks at a map it is apparent that the Japanese plan involves changes in the whole strategic and economic set-up that has prevailed in east Asia for more than a century. It means that British and French power in east Asia must be broken and that our own role in this part of the world, if peace is to be maintained, must be limited largely to fields in which we will not challenge the Japanese.

For the British and French the immediate problem is more serious than it is for us. Britain's naval station at Hong Kong already is menaced by Japanese forces, the British concession in Tientsin has been rendered impotent.

Japanese inspectors are stationed in French Indochina and the Japanese are exercising increasing control on the French concession at Shanghai. The Japanese have obtained concessions from the Netherlands Indies and are demanding more, including a larger share of the trade of these rich islands.

Throughout the whole area they have chosen for themselves the Japanese are on the move. History would indicate they can be stopped only by superior military force. And there is no power now that can divert its force to this region. We have been forced by the developments in Europe to disperse our naval power. British, French, and Netherland strength in the Orient is negligible.

The problem, as I see it, is to prevent Japan from adopting a policy of complete cooperation with the axis powers. This can be done only by convincing Tokyo that Japanese interests, in the long-range view, lie in cooperating with us and with Britain. And I believe that is where they do lie, economically, culturally, and strategically.

The great bulk of Japan's trade, outside her own immediate sphere, always has been with us and the British Empire. These economic interchanges are largely reciprocal and noncompetitive.

JAPAN NEEDS OUR FRIENDSHIP

Strategically the Japanese position never will be secure in east Asia so long as we are a potential enemy. We have the resources to build a greater Navy than Japan ever can hope to build. In the present expansion of armaments the Japanese are bound to fall behind very rapidly as soon as we hit our stride.

Culturally the Japanese always have leaned toward us and Britain rather than Germany and Italy.

The first move the British and French need to make, in my opinion, is to recognize that their possessions in east Asia cannot be defended. Once that is done, a risk of Japan's involvement in the war will have been averted. A first step might be for the British and French to agree that they are ready to give up their possessions in China proper, including Hong Kong.

China long has demanded a return of these areas, and an announcement that they will be returned as soon as satisfactory conditions can be arranged probably would do much to remove the immediate danger of possible Japanese invasion.

For our part, we should begin negotiations for a new basic treaty with Japan to replace the agreement terminated by us last January and should try generally to normalize Japanese-American relations.

There is every indication that we may need all our strength, naval and otherwise, to face the threat that may come from Europe if Germany's operations against Britain end in success. It would seem but the part of wisdom to assure the safety of our Pacific flank if we can do so with honor.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 3 (legislative day of Monday, July 1), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM WAUSAU (WIS.) PILOT

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have a thought-provoking editorial entitled "United States Program of Defense" inserted in the Appendix to the RECORD. The editorial is taken from the June 20, 1940, issue of the Wausau Pilot, published in Wausau, Wis.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Wausau (Wis.) Pilot of June 20, 1940]

UNITED STATES PROGRAM OF DEFENSE

The sudden burst of understanding on the part of the public that democratic institutions are in danger the world over seems to have come with the same thunderbolt that carried it to the minds and ears of America's responsible leaders. The latter may have been a little short-sighted but no more so than the people they represent who, in majority, have opposed repeatedly attempts to keep the United States thoroughly prepared to defend herself no matter what was happening in the rest of the world.

This newspaper has been a strong advocate of preparedness through the years. It has more than once expressed the opinion that an armed force of 800,000 was none too great for the United States to maintain. We repeat that assertion today. Instead of having W. P. A. bands playing music on courthouse squares, these same musicians should be playing for American youth in training for their own moral and physical good and for the welfare of their country.

Compulsory military training as a goal seemed unattainable not long ago, although many have advocated it as a means of keeping our mental fiber toughened and the spirit and love of democracy "fierce," as the President was wont to describe the right feeling in his recent address. Years of easy national spending and the consequent softening of the stuff men are made of mean just that much harder work to swing a good defense program into action. We lack not only soldiers and equipment but the trained workmen, the skilled craftsmen to make the mechanical machinery needed. Today's necessity requires us to put the splendid youth of the country into immediate training so that they will know how to use modern weapons. It means, furthermore, the use of every means to school skilled workmen. Our gigantic natural and industrial resources must be so tapped and organized that we could place ourselves on a war footing without costly and perhaps fatal delay.

The argument now being waged as to whether the Roosevelt reforms of 7 years shall be retained in speeding up industry and in occupying labor seems futile and silly to us. Of course, both employees and employers will have to sacrifice to protect their country for the great good its democratic government and democratic way of living can contribute to their lives and their children's.

If it proves necessary no mere reform, no social measure, no wage or hour or profit control or regulation can stand in the way of the proper defense of the United States. That must be obvious to everyone who participates in such an argument and if they think otherwise, it is said with an ulterior motive such as politics.

The United States, like all other nations in the world today, is in the center of a fast moving stream, the currents and eddys of which are varying and mystifying. We shall miss the dangerous shoals and rocks only by keeping our single objective in mind every minute and hour of the day.

Let the Government and Congress which is supposed to sense the will of the people quickly, push aside the red tape that forces delay, marshal the forces of industry and manpower, and see to it that the reputation of the American people for doing a job thoroughly and quickly is not lost now.

We shall avoid war only by such strength of armed might that no assailant will dare molest the Americas.

Will We Do It?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 3 (legislative day of Monday, July 1), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM SATURDAY EVENING POST

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial under the heading "Will We Do It?" appearing in the July 6 issue of the Saturday Evening Post.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post of July 6, 1940]

WILL WE DO IT?

We do not believe the great ways of thinking and feeling that have made this country what it is can be overthrown. They may be betrayed. Therefore we say—saying it bluntly as a challenge—that for a time already too long the American people have been out of character in their emotional premises, in their reactions to evil and in their choice of mentors and leadership. And if the principle of free government were really in danger in the world, it would be owing less to the rise of the totalitarian powers than to the softness of a people upon whom freedom has conferred incomparable gifts.

Not the first bad sign, perhaps, but certainly a very wrong turn, was when the country followed the magicians who said there was an easy way out of depression. Repudiation of debts and contracts, debasement of money, inflation, confiscation, redistribution of the national income by law, then recovery, the more abundant life, less work for more pay, and security forever—all of that was wishful thinking.

Such was the beginning of a headlong flight from individual responsibility. It was the beginning of a dangerous habit of soft living unearned. We presented the spectacle of a people trying to consume more than they produced and able for a while to do it because they had been so rich. We had the finest industrial machine in the world, and for 7 years we have been consuming it. Do you know what that means? Take a single fact as it was stated by Mr. Hoover, that, according to a recent census of machine tools in the United States, 70 percent of them now are more than 10 years old, whereas in 1932 only 52 percent of them were more than 10 years old. And no move had been made to enforce an embargo up to June 4.

All this time certain hungry nations commonly called the have-nots, and first among these the German people, were working twice as hard as we were, consuming not more but much less than they produced, in order by heroic self-denial to create a surplus. We were purposely destroying our surplus, saying it was ruinous. They were putting theirs into war machines, with intent, when they were ready, to turn them on the soft democracies and take from them what they wanted.

We knew it, we watched them doing it. Behaving as if our power were still intact, we warned them not to do what they were intending to do. Yet they went on as if we had said nothing. They knew what we had done to our strength, that we had let our armaments rust.

From here on it is painful. When the war the Germans had been preparing was imminent, what did this country, the richest, most powerful republic that ever lived on earth—what did it do? It adopted the thesis that its own first line of defense was in France. It would not itself go to the battlefield. Never. Yet the aggressor had to be stopped; the free governments of the world must stand together. Therefore, it would sell food, supplies, planes, and war munitions to France and England, provided they came in their own ships to get them and paid cash; it changed its neutrality laws accordingly, and argued as it did so that it was helping to save democracy, keeping itself out of war, and doing business, all at the same time. And such was the leadership the people followed, apparently unaware that if the thesis were true, their country's behavior was pusillanimous.

The thesis was false. Our first line of defense was not in Europe. It was here. American civilization, that is our own possession. It could not be saved in Europe or defended there. We are its sole defenders and it can be saved only here.

Well then, the war came, and suddenly it appeared that the strength of the aggressor had been fatally underestimated. Thereupon a great voice was heard in many places at once, as if it were the American voice, saying we must rush to the side of the Allies with material aid—with credit, munitions, anything but men—because it would be cheaper and more intelligent to do that than to let the war come to us, and because (we quote it exactly): "The success of the Allies is vital to us."

We do not believe that was the American voice. It was the voice of fear, to say no worse of it. "Vital" is not a word to be misunderstood. It means something essential to life. Was it the American voice saying the life of this American republic was at stake on the outcome of a war in Europe, even such a thing as the fall of the British Empire? Never had the American spirit a voice like that.

May came. The historian who examines the American newspapers for the month of May 1940 may wonder how much of ourselves we saw in that mirror.

What had happened? The power of the German war machine had been revealed, its triumph was a definite possibility, the fall of the British Empire was imaginable, and the American mind passed through the strangest experience of its life. The emotion was that of dread, acted upon by hysterical mentorship. If we may speak of the national mind, certainly never had its behavior been so unimportant, so weak against the impact of deformed ideas crashed forth before they were born, such as the idea that we should forsake our political traditions and name Mr. Roosevelt on both party tickets, because that would be a demonstration of unity, meaning mass-mindedness, and it would be dangerous in this emergency to change leadership.

The President's own first contribution was a defense message, hastily prepared, in which he suggested how easy it would be for the aggressor to get here with bombs unless we were prepared to stop him enroute, which we were not. He imagined that adequate American preparedness would require 50,000 airplanes and then asked the Congress to increase the Regular Army and Navy appropriations by a sum not much more than the amount it was voting for the W. P. A. program. Less than 2 weeks later he was saying to the reporters at a White House press conference, as reported in the New York Times, "that there was no reason for the country to become discomboomerated. The women of the country would not have to give up their cosmetics, lipsticks, and chocolate sodas in consequence of the preparedness program. * * * The whole idea was that the present state of international affairs called for an outlay of about a billion and a quarter dollars over and above the two billions that were being spent on the Military and Naval Establishments." Three days later he was saying, in another message to Congress, that "the almost incredible events of the last 2 weeks" made it necessary to appropriate another billion for defense.

While the Germans were doing without butter and buying one cigarette at a time in order to have guns, we were changing our automobiles once a year. "We have not manufactured a big gun for many years," says General Marshall, our chief of staff, "but it would take about 2½ years to make a 16-inch gun and carriage," for the coast defense.

We are not prepared to fight the aggressor. Yet we defy him. He shall not make us give up any of our social gains, says the President. He shall not upset the normal American way of life. American women shall have their cosmetics still, in spite of him. Preparedness the easiest way!

If the Government knows what the problem is, comprehends it even dimly, it is treating the American people as if they were children unable to bear reality. If it does not know, its incompetence, hitherto an economic disaster only, may come to be remembered as a calamity.

The problem is not that we stand alone in this hemisphere, with not one powerful friend in the world to help us defend it. When was it that we stood not alone here? Where was that powerful friend in the world ever willing to help us defend American civilization? We are sick of hearing that the British Navy all this time has been defending our Monroe Doctrine. More than once we had been willing to fight the British Navy for it. Our part is to stand alone for so long as we have the hardihood, the spirit, and the fortitude to do it, and when we haven't, we may as well stop talking about American destiny.

No. The problem is that a balanced distribution of power in the world has been upset. A new and frightful power has appeared, an offensive power, moved by an unappeasable earth hunger, conscious of no right but the right of might. It does not threaten this country with invasion; at least, not yet. It does threaten the Western Hemisphere by economic and poliical designs in the Latin-American countries, and this, for us, is an ominous fact. But the larger aspect of what has happened is that the world is in a state of unbalance. Until an equal defensive power has been created in the hands of people who prefer peace to war, there will be no safe living in it, no security for free government.

Who shall create that equal defensive power and restore the balance? You have only to ask the question to get the answer. There is one country in the whole world that can do it. In that simple sense it is the United States against Germany, now or later. And that is not to speak of war. It is the minimum price of peace.

The cost of doing it, in terms of self-discipline, harder living, more work, may be terrific. This is the truth that we have so far declined to face. It might well cost us, not some billions more or less to be voted by Congress, not a 10-percent increase of the income tax, but possibly a quarter of our total national exertions for several years. There is no easier way. A thousand airplanes a day, if necessary. That is the American voice. It is possible. But how many of us realize what we should have to do without for a thousand airplanes a day? What we will, that we can do.

EDITORIAL FROM THE ST. LOUIS POST-DISPATCH

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following splendid editorial from the St. Louis Post-Dispatch calling attention to the significance of the American flag and the principles for which it stands:

[From the St. Louis Post-Dispatch of June 9, 1940]

WHAT THE STARS AND STRIPES STAND FOR

It is fitting that we should be asked to display the national colors this week—Flag week. Yet this act can have little meaning without the realization that the flag is only a symbol—a symbol for America.

America is more than a flag, more than an anthem, more than patriotic oratory. It is more, even, than this land.

My own Manhattan with spires, and the sparkling and hurrying tides, and the ships,
The varied and ample land, the South and the North in the light, Ohio's shores and flashing Missouri,
And ever the far-spreading prairies cover'd with grass and corn.

America is the sum total of many, many men, and women, great and small, quick and dead. It is the sum total of the things they did and are doing to make democracy work. It is action. It is work undertaken to give substance to ideals.

America is George Washington forsaking the plow at Mount Vernon for the cold and the hunger of Valley Forge. It is Thomas Jefferson, with no taste for public office and a skin too thin for the acrimony of politics, accepting that office and enduring that acrimony for the sake of high duty. It is Abraham Lincoln taking up the sword to save the Union, and then bidding the States to bind up their wounds "with malice toward none, with charity for all." America is the sum total of its heroes giving meaning to Jefferson's inalienable rights: life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness.

But, perhaps even more, America is a great host of lesser figures with less glamorous histories—men who saw tasks that needed to be done and did them, men who saw wrongs that cried to be righted and righted them.

There are, for example, the able and far-sighted administrators like Albert Gallatin, Jefferson's Secretary of the Treasury. This French-Swiss immigrant, who never learned to speak good English, not only put an end to the congressional custom of making lump-sum appropriations without designating the specific purposes for which public money was to be used but he also introduced the present system of Treasury reports, halved the national debt, financed the War of 1812, and became the father of Federal aid for the building of our great network of roads that he saw to be necessary for binding together a great country.

Then there are the men of righteous anger like Benjamin H. Bristow, of Kentucky, whom Grant unwittingly called to be Secretary of the Treasury. Bristow was horrified to see how greedy hands were looting the public coffers. Investigation soon convinced him that the distillers of St. Louis were paying taxes on only a third of the whisky that left their warehouses. That was the beginning of the exposure of the whisky ring. The trail of bribery led to the White House itself. Bristow obtained more than 250 indictments in St. Louis, Chicago, and Milwaukee, but convictions, unfortunately, were few, and he lost his own post for his zeal.

But Bristow's work was not in vain. He became one of the first soldiers in a great crusade that took form as the Nation's growing wealth tempted the buccaneers to make corruption part of the warp and woof of America. The New York Sun exposed Oakes Ames and the Credit Mobilier scheme, which cost the United States millions of acres of land and millions of dollars, ostensibly given for building our first transcontinental railroad, but actually siphoned into the pockets of the robber barons. Here in St. Louis, Joe Folk fought Butlerism. In New York, the lances were raised against the Tweed ring. Only the other day Boss Pendergast left the Federal penitentiary at Leavenworth. The prosecution of the heirs of Huey Long is current history in Louisiana. So the crusade continues on one front and another.

Courage is perhaps the best synonym for this concept of America—courage as it was exemplified by old Bob La Follette and Nebraska's GEORGE NORRIS and their little band as they stood up in the Senate in 1917 and faced the storm wind and the tempest in a vain effort to keep us out of the first World War, steadfastly shielding the last spark of reason and conviction against all-engulfing hysteria.

America means a less spectacular kind of courage, too. It means the kind of courage that enabled the elder La Follette and his sons after him to make Wisconsin a model of honest and advanced government, the kind of courage that kept Senator NORRIS fighting for his Tennessee Valley dream until it became a reality, the kind of courage that sent a Jane Addams into the slums of Chicago to establish Hull House as a model for so many projects that are making concrete the hope and promise of the Bill of Rights.

More important than anything else, perhaps, America means a high sense of justice, a scrupulous respect for the rights of all, even the most unpopular minorities—a sense of justice such as that of John Peter Altgeld, Illinois' eagle forgotten. There was something in the destiny of this man that would not allow him to settle into the comfortable life of a small-town Missouri lawyer. There was something that drove him on to Chicago and the executive mansion in Springfield. There, in the face of the most articulate and powerful elements in the State, he pardoned those Haymarket rioters who had not been hanged. That was in 1893, and the next year, before the hue and cry had subsided, he bitterly protested against President Cleveland's unconstitutional use of Federal troops in Chicago's Pullman strike. Altgeld was hounded into poverty and almost into obscurity. But not quite. Vachel Lindsay was able to say to his spirit:

"A hundred white eagles have risen, the sons of your sons,
The zeal in their wings is a zeal that your dreaming began,
The valor that wore out your soul in the service of man."

America, of course, is Holmes, and Brandeis, and Cardozo, the Judges, shaping the law to the will of the people. It is also Brandeis, the advocate, pleading for decent working conditions for the women of Oregon, and striving with his insurance system to assure the workers of Massachusetts the secure enjoyment of the fruits of their toil in the twilight of their years.

America, too, is the educators—Mark Hopkins on his log and Robert Hutchins in his Gothic tower, working, in Jefferson's words, "to diffuse knowledge more generally through the mass of the people, realizing that knowledge is power, and that in a democracy power belongs to the many, not to the few."

And America also is the writers—Tom Paine and Harriet Beecher Stowe, and John Steinbeck, those with the power of words that move men.

America is also the great legion of the unnamed. It is the Quaker doctor and nurse and teacher going up into the hills of Kentucky. It is the labor organizer daring tar and feathers in the almost feudal pockets of the southern hills. It is the employer who cheerfully complies with a wage-hour law and a Wagner Act. It is the good citizen who makes an honest income-tax return and marks an intelligent ballot each election day.

There is no need to call the roll longer. America is all those who know how to make democracy work, all those who know that their duty is to do the task at hand.

This America is more than a flag. It would be great without any banner or anthem or slogan. And no mere salute to a bit of bunting, no mere singing of a song, is sufficient to make any man a part of this America. Patriotism is in the deed, not in the symbol.

What's Wrong in Washington?

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 3 (legislative day of Monday, July 1), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM MILWAUKEE JOURNAL

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of the issue of July 1, 1940, under the heading "What's Wrong in Washington?"

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Milwaukee Journal of July 1, 1940]

WHAT'S WRONG IN WASHINGTON?

The people of this country want our Government to stand up for its every right. They want no appeasement. They want no Munich. This is not to say that there shall be no dealings with Germany and/or Italy should Europe's war end. It is saying only that the Nation wants no trying to mollify the dictators. That doesn't work. Appeasement is interpreted by the dictators only as a sign of weakness.

Nor is there any reassurance in such indecision as marked President Roosevelt's approval of conscription for training manpower one week and his backing up the next week with an explanation that he had been hasty. This rightabout face came when some of the blatherskite politicians, who put politics above country, started the cry that the Democratic Party was becoming the "war party."

So, it seems, the training to be given young men who are assisted by Government is to be mostly in how to make and repair tanks, how to service war machines. We are to have machine guns with nobody to fire them, airplanes with no one to operate them in combat, if necessary, tanks with no one to run them. We are to spend billions for the machines of war and not train men to know how to use them. It is time we dropped this attitude that Government must help everyone who needs assistance, but that nobody must be required to do anything for Government he may not want to do.

And the Senate of the United States. What a weakling it is proving to be. With every call for another billion dollars it falls all over itself to vote the appropriation. But it votes not to end the senseless and extravagant foreign-silver-buying program. It votes not to reduce Government peacetime extravagances by even so little as a 10-percent cut in nonmilitary categories. It rejects 5 percent. It rejects even a $500,000 saving in all the billions. Not one cent in all the wasteful pump priming and social experimenting that has been going on will these politicians give up.

The people of this Nation who earn their keep in shop and office and on the land want Government to have every dime that is considered necessary to make this country impregnable to attack from any quarter.

But they want incompetency cleaned out.

They want indecision and floundering to end.

They want extravagance and nonvital spendings stopped.

They know that they are going to have to take up a notch in their belts. They understand that the tremendous burden of defense coming on top of the load the depression has heaped upon them will mean a lowering of the general standard of living. And they are willing to face this.

But they would like to see some recognition of realities and a pulling in of the politicians' belts, too. It is time for the exploitation of the Nation for the benefit of politicians and their hangers-on to stop.

It is time for sanity.

Danger to United States From "Sixth Column"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 3 (legislative day of Monday, July 1), 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE MITCHELL (S. DAK.) DAILY REPUBLIC

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an article appearing in the Daily Republic of Mitchell, S. Dak., on June 20, 1940, written by Mr. Arthur Watwood and relating to the subject of subversive activities in the United States.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Mitchell (S. Dak.) Daily Republic of June 20, 1940]

"SIXTH," NOT "FIFTH COLUMN," GREATEST DANGER TO UNITED STATES, REPORTS WATWOOD

WINNER, S. DAK.—Arthur Watwood, of Winner, Democratic candidate for Congress, west of the river, is not worried about the "fifth column" as much as he is about the "sixth column," he indicated in a speech before a farm group, near White River.

"We know," said Mr. Watwood, "that our Government, under the leadership of Roosevelt, is now checking the people who live in this Nation—receive the protection of our Government, enjoy the privileges of citizenship, and yet, at the same time, endeavor to promote governmental ideologies—contrary to our system of government. We call such people 'fifth columnists.' The Department of Justice now has a record of such people."

FAR MORE DANGEROUS

"But," continued Mr. Watwood, "the Government does not have a list of the 'sixth columnists'—who are far more dangerous than the 'fifth column' group. They are more dangerous, because of their prominence and the conspicuous places which they hold. Some are Congressmen, Senators, Governors, and civic leaders. By their constant criticism of Roosevelt and his new national-defense plan, they give comfort to the enemies of our form of government and serve as tools of the 'fifth column.' They have become obstructionists to our program of national defense—so badly needed, and to our program of Americanism, as sponsored by the American Legion and other patriotic groups."

Concluding Mr. Watwood declared, "Why should these 'sixth columnists,' drawing in many instances salaries as Senators and Congressmen, be permitted, now in a national crisis, to oppose every move Roosevelt makes for our national defense? I have noticed, however, that many who now oppose our great President, also opposed the President on his battle to end starvation in America. But Roosevelt, the humanitarian, has gone steadily ahead working for the people, notwithstanding such criticism. I predict that regardless of the activities of the 'fifth and sixth columns,' if renominated by the Democrats in their coming convention, he will be reelected President of the United States by an overwhelming majority. The people of this Nation will not repudiate the greatest friend they have."

Oregon Proud of McNary

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1940

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, Oregon is justly proud of the nomination of its senior Senator, Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY, as the running mate for Wendell Willkie to carry the banner for the Republican ticket in the coming campaign. Senator MCNARY is a native son of Oregon and lives on the farm where he was born of pioneer parents. His long service in public life has endeared him to the people of Oregon. Before coming to the United States Senate he served as Associate Justice of the Oregon Supreme Court. He has been an outstanding exponent of liberal legislation and particularly legislation having for its purpose the placing of the farmers of our Nation on an equality with industry.

I ask leave to include as a part of my remarks an editorial appearing in the Oregonian under date of June 29, 1940, discussing the two candidates on the Republican ticket. The editorial follows:

WILLKIE AND M'NARY

Our Oregon Republicans, and a great many of his neighbors of other political persuasion, wanted Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY to have a chance at the Presidency as the nominee of the Philadelphia convention. There were few party members in all the Nation who did not feel that Oregon's senior Senator possessed all the qualifications required of a candidate. For the matter of that, there would be but few of any party to dispute it. But now the chance has gone glimmering and the fateful ticket of 1940 is Wendell L. Willkie, risen like a comet, though far more substantially, and Senator MCNARY, tempered like a tried blade. Here in Oregon there is no repining. What we think of the ticket is that America needs it, and that if it cannot win a Republican victory no ticket could.

The fact is that we of Oregon, when it was apparent that Senator MCNARY could not have the Presidential nomination, and at a time when it seemed that log-rolling in the hall of convention might roll the fortunes of Willkie under, were praying for this. It appeared to us that the nomination of the utilities executive, who likes to grow hogs in Indiana, and the Oregon native son, who long since earned the right to the designation of "statesman," would establish the unbeatable leadership for which the party was calling from a chaotic wilderness—and not only the party, but a country in crisis, confused and uncertain of everything but the need for strong men and sound guidance. The time was not the time for politics, as politics has been habitually played. Well, sir, the prayer was answered, as it was answered for millions of Americans by the nominations of Willkie and MCNARY.

In no more than the conventional sense is the Republican ticket political. You cannot style an answer to prayer a mere matter of politics, and especially are you prohibited from such usage in a time when we are taking our basic Americanism, exposed and rubbed raw by abrasive events, far more seriously than we have at any hour in 20 years past. There is a Nation-wide conviction that the near future will require, if the American Nation is to weather the gathering storm, such national leadership as citizens will swear by, being neither persuaded to this trust by rhetorical cajolery nor induced by the giving of favors and alms. In a word, ours is a Nation that finally, as at the last stroke of the eleventh hour, with midnight hurrying, has determined that what it wants, and without delay, is results that insure security. In casting about for a phrase to define the Willkie-McNary ticket, as a response to the national need, one cannot improve on the popular plaudit that it is a "natural."

Wendell L. Willkie, the public-utilities executive who has ransomed that sometimes epithetical designation from suspicion and cheap derision, and of swift ascent from private obscurity to public renown, by virtue of those individual gifts of which nobody knew a few months ago. And Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY, whose name for brilliant integrity almost is as common to the firesides of the people, and this without least self-seeking, as it is to the floor of the Senate. Willkie with his gifts of phrase and of person, his warmth and his vitality, his incisive and searching, his astonishing knowledge of what is going on in the Nation and the world, and what it all means. MCNARY, the veteran, to whose name attaches no breath of criticism, but all of praise, and is a household word in the farm houses of America; the same who has kept his conscience, his dignity, his undisputed leadership in the counsels of his country and his party through a period that has destroyed many affiliations and wrecked many friendships, and whose personal friendship even is cherished by the opposition. The ticket of Willkie and McNary. Is it to be marveled that enthusiasm responds to it here, as enthusiasm shall respond throughout the country?

In Oregon we are grateful to Senator MCNARY for the loyal and unselfish service he has given to this State and the Nation, but for this last service, that of his permission to the party to draft him as Vice Presidential nominee, against his inclination, we are doubly grateful. His place, the Senator felt, was in the Senate, where by the exercise of experience he could best serve his country. But Oregon felt that, failing of the Presidential nomination, the place of the senior Senator was beside the Republican nominee. And, as we say, this feeling was not restricted to party; it was spontaneous and unlabeled. That the Nation felt so, too, is attested by the insistence of the Philadelphia convention that no other Vice Presidential nomination would content its delegates. It was Willkie the country wanted as the Republican Presidential nominee. It was MCNARY that both Willkie and the Nation wanted as Willkie's running mate.

Out of the confusion and welter of the Republican National Convention, at which the columnists joined the new dealers in scoffing, came in spite of all attempt at prevention the ticket for which the party and the people had prayed. It is a good omen for America when she has need for good omens. We dare think it the guaranty of tomorrow.

Mr. Speaker, the Oregon Journal, which generally has supported the present administration, in a leading editorial in its issue of June 28, 1940, discusses the nomination of Wendell Willkie as Republican nominee, as follows:

WENDELL WILLKIE EMERGES AS REPUBLICAN NOMINEE TO GIVE JOYOUS BATTLE TO OPPONENT

In Wendell Willkie the Republicans have named their most formidable candidate. He will be infinitely more of a match for the Democratic nominee than Thomas Dewey, Senator Taft, Senator Vandenberg, or Governor James.

For 7 years the Republican organization has spent its time hating Roosevelt and all of his works. As campaign year rolled around the party found itself without an outstanding candidate and without a constructive program. As convention time approached, however, blanket opposition to all New Deal reforms necessarily faded before common sense and popular demand.

Then came the welter of war, which made wholesale attack upon the foreign policy of the Roosevelt administration quite indiscreet, to say the least.

For a week the G. O. P. platform-makers labored and labored in Philadelphia and brought forth a mouse-like effort that is not strong enough to support such a candidate as Willkie. Willkie, the nominee, however, is so much bigger than the formal platform that he may be expected to scrap it plank by plank, build his own platform as he goes along regardless of party orthodoxy.

A few months ago the name Wendell Willkie was a whisper in the political breeze. He was known in business circles as a capable lawyer and utility executive and in administration circles as a persistent and powerful opponent who fought the New Deal alone in a successful defense of the rights of those he represented when they clashed with the bureaucracy of the Tennessee Valley Authority.

A few months ago he began to make public addresses here and there. Among the first was before the Commonwealth Club in San Francisco, where his criticism of the New Deal was tempered with constructive comment so liberal as to strike terror to the heart of the smug of the Union League Club. His ready wit upon the "Information, Please" program recommended him to the national radio audience.

In April, in an off-the-record dinner panel discussion before the American Society of Newspaper Editors, by sheer force of personality and quick thinking, he stole the show from the acerb Harold Ickes. The next week, in New York, in an address before the American Newspaper Publishers Association, he observed that business was being criticized by the administration for not doing what the administration would not permit it to do.

A public address in Massachusetts followed and then a swing through the farm belt of the Mississippi Valley.

Wendell Willkie was emerging as a political candidate. His phenomenal rise from scratch as a boy amidst comparatively humble circumstances in Indiana to a high position in the much-maligned utility field was made known to all of the people, including the fact that until recently he had been a lifelong Democrat, and now, as then, quite on the liberal side.

And the Willkie movement assumed major proportions overnight. As a serious political effort, its principal impetus was from downtown New York in an effort to stop Dewey, and from investment bankers at that.

So fast did the Willkie idea take that when balloting began at Philadelphia, Thursday, Willkie was no longer in the dark-horse class. From third place on the first two ballots Willkie jumped to second place on the third ballot; was first on the fourth and fifth, and was unanimously nominated on the sixth ballot. On the convention floor young Governor Stassen, of Minnesota, performed yeoman service with professional skill in Willkie's behalf.

Now Willkie is the Republican Presidential nominee, and as such stands out like a red necktie on a pious clergyman. In the flush of his victory he has the cordial assurance of support from his opponents and their campaign managers.

News of his victory he greeted with the simple statement: "I am deeply grateful; I am overwhelmed. And now I want to go and join my family."

There you have it. The Journal welcomes his nomination because of his frankness and candor. At the moment of his nomination the Journal ventures the thought that should he be elected his liberalism and sense of social justice will annoy exceedingly some of those who will shout for him the loudest during the campaign.

Some days ago Willkie quipped: "I don't want to meet Galento; I want to meet the champ." Well, Willkie has formally qualified for the bout and unless the unexpected happens—and it well may happen—Franklin Roosevelt will emerge from the formality of the Chicago convention as the Democratic champ.

It will be a grand fight and whoever may win, the plain people of the United States won't lose.

Mr. Speaker, after the nomination of Senator MCNARY the Oregon Journal, in its issue of June 29, 1940, further discussed the Republican ticket and the candidacy of Senator McNARY, as follows:

POLITICS OF THE OLD MACHINE SORT HAD TO TAKE A BACK SEAT WITH THE NOMINATION OF WENDELL L. WILLKIE

On their farms and in their hamlets and cities the American people may call what they have just witnessed a "Willkrieg." Politics hasn't a match for the way Wendell Willkie rose in 2 months from political obscurity to dominance as a Presidential candidate, nor for the way his name rode through the Republican National Convention to win unanimous nomination before the sixth ballot ended.

Now, the performance stands to repeat in the larger arena and in the elimination contest affecting Democratic Presidential aspirants. The Republicans have presented their most powerful candidate, with a feeble platform. The Democrats, to get the edge, must produce a great candidate with an equally great platform. And even then, as Willkie said, the fight will have just begun.

But, beyond the party label, the Willkie nomination comes from a deep impulse in national life. The Presidential campaign will be waged between ideas of government. In a world that has so far left the United States out of a movement toward national socialism or, more properly, state capitalism, the Willkie nomination bespeaks a strong stand by business and industry for a capitalistic democracy, with its free enterprise, competitions, and ownerships.

Dewey, if nominated, would have become the prosecutor of the New Deal; Taft, if nominated, as the leader of movement toward conservatism. Willkie, Democrat until he broke with the New Deal, espouses such New Deal reforms as social security, wage-hour legislation, old-age and unemployment insurance. He acknowledges the abuses that became flagrant under preceding Republican administrations in finance and industry. He applauds Federal control over banking, the issue of new securities, utilities, aviation, and communications, and interstate enterprise.

But if you want to get the Willkie platform down into words so few that they make the Republican platform seem as lengthy as Gone With the Wind, it is domestic recovery, national defense, the re-creation of free economic enterprise, the dismissal of a government-controlled economy, gradual curtailment of the spend-lend program, budget balancing, tax reduction, and trade promotion.

What's going to happen to public works, electrification, and trade treaties in their present administration? Maybe the Democratic platform will have to answer.

If one assumes the nomination of Roosevelt at Chicago, and if the international crisis continues, the contest between Roosevelt and Willkie will be determined to large extent on the national-defense issue.

Even if European hostilities end, it will still be necessary to convince the American people that total defense of the Western Hemisphere is imperative.

It is to be assumed that Roosevelt and Willkie are not far apart on this fundamental issue. But if the Roosevelt defense program bogs down in the next 3 months, if it is unable to translate money into armament swiftly enough to satisfy a jittery people, Willkie will have the advantage.

We come now, however, to the peculiar power that will mark the Willkie campaign—good humor, absence of epithets, and a liking for people, including opponents.

One more word about the Republican convention. It was unbossed. It gave youth a voice. The nomination was made on the floor, not in a "smoke-filled room." We are going to have a great campaign in full sight and hearing of the people who will decide it—and thank God that they still do.

M'NARY IS IDEAL RUNNING MATE FOR WILLKIE; OREGON PROUD OF HER SON

Tremendous strength is added to the Republican ticket by the nomination of Oregon's own Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY for the vice presidency and as Wendell Willkie's running mate.

The Willkie-McNary combination will appeal to business, industry, and the farm. It will draw more closely together the East and the West. It will be hard to beat.

Like Willkie, McNary rose to eminence from the grass roots. He became minority leader of the United States Senate through sheer ability, long-headed judgment, and the influence commanded by the respect accorded him by his colleagues.

Although he occupied an increasingly larger place in the national picture, Oregon, its people, and its interests have had his instant, effective attention.

The nomination gives Oregon a place on a national Presidential ticket, for the first time in 80 years. In 1860 the Democratic convention at Baltimore composed of seceding delegates from the Douglas convention nominated for the Presidency, John C. Breckenridge of Kentucky, and for the Vice Presidency, Joseph Lane, first territorial Governor of Oregon and later Congressman. Breckenridge and Lane ran against Abraham Lincoln of Illinois and Hannibal Hamlin of Maine.

McNary is of Presidential stature. His heart is with the plain people, the producers, and the workers. His personal and political philosophy is essentially liberal. He supported many New Deal measures. He's almost as good a "Democrat" as Willkie. His nomination may constitute an answer as to what will happen to great public improvements like Bonneville, Grand Coulee, and the Willamette Valley projects. He and Willkie constitute a team of nearly equal pulling power.

His nomination fills Oregon with pride.

Patman Chain-Store Bill

OF
HON. EMANUEL CELLER
OF NEW YORK
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 3, 1940

STATEMENT BY RALPH BURKARD, COMPTROLLER, FIRST NATIONAL STORES, INC.

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following final statement of Ralph Burkard, comptroller, First National Stores, Inc.:

THE RECORD CLOSES

(Final statement by Ralph F. Burkard, comptroller, First National Stores, Inc., on Patman chain-store bill)

Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my name is Ralph F. Burkard. I am comptroller of First National Stores, Inc., and a member of its executive committee. Our principal offices are at Somerville, Mass., and I have been with the company for 22 years.

On April 12 Mr. C. F. Adams, treasurer of our company, testified before this committee in opposition to H. R. 1.

I have been present throughout the greater part of these hearings, including the period of rebuttal statements by the proponents of of this bill. Furthermore, I have carefully read these statements and have concluded that while they contain no new facts which require extended discussion or answer, I feel that a further statement is justified in view of the character of the material presented by the rebuttal witnesses. I have made my views known to representatives of other multiple store companies who have appeared here, and I am authorized to state to you that they share these views.

In their rebuttal the proponents have again indulged in specious generalities entirely unsupported by facts and have, at best, merely reiterated their shopworn and, I think, wholly unsubstantiated arguments. To this they have added ridicule and unwarranted criticism of those men and women, from practically all walks of American life and from every section of the country, who have exercised their constitutional right of petition by appearing before you in opposition to this bill. I feel sure that you will agree with me when I say that ridicule and such criticism are not substitutes for facts.

The record shows that in addition to the testimony of men actually engaged in our system of distribution, approximately 148 witnesses (exclusive of the oil witnesses) from some 35 States appeared personally before this committee to oppose the enactment of H. R. 1. Who were these 148 witnesses? They represented farmers, laborers, consumers, manufacturers, real estate owners, economists, editors, scientists, teachers and other important elements of our national life. Representatives of many outstanding national associations in various fields also appeared in opposition to this bill. I submit to you gentlemen that such testimony as this cannot be rebutted by ridicule, nor can the judgment or testimony of a rebuttal witness, whose publication is devoted to abuse of the multiple unit system of distribution, be substituted for that of such highly regarded and representative organizations. Moreover, I wish to point out to this committee that nowhere in this record will you find the testimony of a single witness in support of the bill who speaks with any authority for labor, the farmer, or the consumer.

A review of the record of these hearings shows that 65 witnesses appeared personally on behalf of agriculture, 46 on behalf of manufacturers and processors, 8 on behalf of labor, 6 on behalf of real estate, 7 on behalf of consumers, 4 outstanding economists and marketing experts, and 12 representing miscellaneous interest, all opposing and condemning H. R. 1. Some came as individuals, while many came representing companies, associations, and organizations.

Among those who appeared for agriculture in opposition to H. R. 1 were authorized representatives of the following:

The National Grange, American Farm Bureau Federation, National Council of Farmer Cooperatives, Maine Potato Growers, Inc., International Baby Chick Association, National Wool Growers Association, Massachusetts Fruit Growers Association, National Swine Growers Association, Michigan Bean Producers Association, Missouri Apple Growers Association, American National Livestock Association, Georgia, Florida, Alabama Peanut Association, Vermont Maple Cooperative, Inc., North Carolina Cotton Growers Cooperative Association, Producers Cooperative Commission Association, Empire State Potato Group, Connecticut Regional Marketing Authority, Ohio State Apiaries Cooperative Association, Carolinas Cooperatives Consolidated, Texas Citrus Fruit Growers Exchange, Michigan Bonded Fruit Growers Association, Pacific Egg Producers Cooperative, Inc., South Carolina Peach Growers Association, Pennsylvania Cooperative Potato Growers Association, Georgia Vegetables Growers Association, New York State Vegetables Growers Association, the Horticultural Society of Virginia, Lehigh Valley (Pa.) Cooperative Farmers, Mutual Orange Distributors, United Fruit Growers Association, Rio Grande Valley Citrus Exchange, Growers and Shippers Cooperative Union, Florida Avocado and Persian Lime Growers Association, Farmers Cooperative Exchange and North Carolina Cotton Growers Cooperative Association, the Fergus Falls (Minn.) Cooperative Creamery Association, the Eagle Valley (Minn.) Cocperative Creamery Association, Bellows Falls (Vt.) Cooperative Creamery, Inc., Mid-West Producers' Creameries, Inc., Denver (Iowa) Creamery Farmers' Cooperative Creamery.

Many other farm organizations and individual farmers and shippers appeared and condemned the bill, while the record shows that not a single representative of agriculture appeared in support of it.

The record of the hearings further shows that representatives of the following labor organizations appeared in opposition to H. R. 1:

Retail Clerks International Protective Association, Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of North America, International Typographical Union, National Brotherhood of Operative Potters, International Allied Printing Trades Association, Central Labor Union of Washington, D. C.

On the other hand, not a single representative of labor appeared in support of the bill.

The record further shows that the following consumer organizations appeared in opposition to H. R. 1:

American Home Economics Association, American Association of University Women, Massachusetts Committee on Consumer Legislation, Philadelphia Consumers Advisory Council, District of Columbia Federation of Women's Clubs.

Again, not a single representative of a consumer organization appeared in support of the bill.

In addition to these organizations there appeared, as I have already stated, 46 manufacturers and processors, 6 representatives of real estate, and 4 economists and marketing experts in opposition to the bill. We submit that these witnesses are better qualified to know what is best for their interests and the organizations for which they speak than is the publisher of an anti-chain-store trade paper, the executives of the National Association of Retail Druggists, the National Association of Retail Grocers, or the United States Wholesale Grocers Association.

The proponents of H. R. 1 have made several charges, without submitting supporting data, and I should like briefly to refer to certain of them, as obviously it would be impossible for me to refer to all of them.

1. They assert that multiple-store operators depress farm prices. Suffice it to say on this point that all the farm organizations and all the individual farmers who appeared before this committee testified to the contrary, while not a single farm witness appeared to substantiate this charge.

2. They assert that multiple-store operators depress real-estate values. As in the case of farm prices, every real-estate witness testified to the contrary.

3. They assert that multiple-store operators injure labor. The representatives of labor appeared before this committee condemning the bill, and testified that the opposite is the fact. Again, not a single labor witness appeared to substantiate this charge or to favor the bill.

4. The proponents of H. R. 1 continue to assert that the multiple-store distributors engage in the practice of loss-leader selling. Every chain-store executive who appeared and testified before this committee condemned severely the practice of loss-leader selling and stated that his company did not indulge in it. Mr. Adams, of the First National Stores, testified to the fact that the multiple-store distributors have cooperated with other distributors in fostering legislation in the various States to outlaw loss-leader selling. In fact, they cooperated in drafting a model bill to put an end to this vice.

5. One of the proponents stated again on rebuttal that the bank accounts of the multiple-unit distributors were concentrated in New York City. The proponents continue to make this statement, despite the fact that the record proves conclusively the contrary. Mr. Sams, president of the J. C. Penney Co., testified that 76 percent of the company's bank balances were deposited in over 1,550 banks, all outside New York City.

Mr. Adams, of the First National Stores, stated that our company's bank accounts are all in the New England States and at least 80 percent are in the country banks. We have no bank account in New York City.

I will later ask leave to file a statement from the Safeway Stores, Inc., showing that in the 993 towns in the United States in which it does business it carries 1,130 bank accounts and that for the last 3 years less than 7½ percent of its cash was on deposit in cities in which Safeway does not operate, including New York City.

In the brief filed by the Great Atlantic & Pacific Tea Co. as a part of the record, it appears that that company maintains accounts in 3,517 banks located in all parts of the United States.

Moreover, a recent survey of the chain food industry shows that 94 percent of the bank deposits of the companies were in the States where the stores were located.

6. The proponents have asserted again that the stock of companies engaged in the multiple-store business is closely held. This charge has been repeated, in spite of the fact that the record discloses the contrary to be true. I ask leave at this time to insert in the record immediately following my statement exhibit A, a table showing that the stock of these companies is widely held throughout the United States. The table also shows an average of over 10 stockholders for each store, and further a close corelation between the number of stores and number of stockholders in each State.[1]

7. The proponents again asserted that companies engaged in multiple store distribution have interlocking directorates. I ask leave to file as exhibit B a table showing that these companies have practically no interlocking directorates.

8. One of the proponents of House bill 1 testified that producer-consumer campaigns conducted by the food chains to move farm surpluses shift consumer demand away from other products and eventually depress farm prices.

Many agriculture witnesses testified to the contrary. Also the United States Department of Agriculture, in a report on retail sales campaigns for farm products, released in December 1938, said:

"The campaigns are of special interest because they are the first widespread attempt to gear the retailer (the most remote and usually the least responsive link in the marketing chain) more closely into changing demand and supply conditions. Organized efforts of this kind, sometimes referred to as producer-consumer campaigns, were begun by the grocery chains in 1936. Since then other trade and retail groups have undertaken similar programs. At least 20 major agricultural products have had the sales support of such drives within the last 3 years."

Discussing the effects of these drives, the report said on page 3:

"Increases in prices to producers as a result of special sales efforts may come about in either or both of two ways. As a result of advertising or more prominent store display, consumers might be induced to buy more of a commodity at the same price (or the same quantity at a higher price). This is sometimes referred to as an upward shift in demand. The second way in which producers stand to benefit is from any narrowing of marketing spreads that may accompany the campaigns."

The Department of Agriculture said that while there may be a diverting of consumer purchases, "there can be little doubt of the value of any program that helps to relieve groups of producers who are in an especially unfavorable price circumstance, especially if the program results in a narrowing of marketing spreads" (p. 14).

9. The proponents of H. R. 1 have repeatedly stated that the independent merchants are declining in number and in their proportion of the total food business done in the United States.

The facts do not support this contention.

I have here, to file with the committee for the record, a statement dealing with the number of stores and volume of sales of independent and chain food stores. This statement covers the years 1929, 1933, and 1935—taken from the United States Census of Distribution—and the years 1936 to 1939, taken from the Progressive Grocer, the trade magazine that has been cited frequently by the proponents of H. R. 1 during this hearing in support of their contentions.

These figures show:

A. The independent food-store sales for 1935 increased $1,090,000,000, or 39 percent, over 1933, which are the last Census of Distribution dates.

B. The chain food-store sales for 1935 increased $257,000,000, or 12 percent, over 1933.

C. The percentage of total food business done by chain stores in 1935, as compared with 1933, declined, while during the same period the total percentage done by independents has increased.

D. The number of independent food stores in 1935 increased 51,362, or 20 percent over 1933.

Mr. Chairman, may I file this statement for insertion in the record at this point in my remarks?[2]

10. During this hearing the proponents have repeatedly stated that the chain stores are or threaten to be a monopoly. In the light of irrefutable evidence in the record, it is apparent that no monopoly exists, there is no potential threat of monopoly, and there is no possibility of monopoly in retail distribution.

It seems very strange to me that a few witnesses who purport to represent retailers doing 77 percent of the volume of business in the United States are seeking through legislation to destroy or cripple their multiple-store competitors who do 23 percent of the business—claiming that the 23 percent have or threaten to obtain a monopoly. This seems especially strange in the light of the fact that in 1935 there were 304,398 independent grocery and combination stores in the United States as compared with 48,239 chain outlets doing the same type of business. For 1939, according to our best estimate, the number of these independents has increased over 1935, while the number of chain outlets has declined to approximately 40,000. Moreover, in all lines of retailing there were 1,474,149 independent stores in operation in 1935 as compared with 127,482 chain outlets in operation in that year. These facts, I believe, clearly refute any charge of monopoly and remove any basis for fear of monopoly.

Before leaving these points, I want to recall to the committee's attention the brief, entitled "Keep Market Street Open," which Mr. Sams presented at the conclusion of his testimony. This brief shows where companies have their headquarters, where they operate, how many stockholders they have, how shares are distributed, who are their directors, and many other facts pertinent to this issue. All source material is documented for immediate reference.

H. R. 1 is not in any sense a revenue measure. If this bill were enacted into law, it would add great burdens to the consumers of this country, who are entitled to have the necessities of life distributed at the lowest reasonable cost. Moreover, the record shows that the Federal, State, and local governments would lose many millions of dollars annually in direct revenue, to say nothing of the indirect taxes which would be lost.

It is punitive taxation at its worst, designed solely to destroy an efficient, modern, and up-to-date method of distribution. It sets a precedent for the destruction by taxation of any business or endeavor operated upon a multiple-unit basis. Mr. Patrick E. Gorman, an important labor leader, testified that the principle of this bill, carried to its logical end, would permit the taxation and destruction of national and international labor unions. Mr. O'Neal, president of the American Farm Bureau Federation, testified that the philosophy of this bill would permit taxation of farmers' cooperatives which, in essence, are integrated organizations not greatly different in nature and operation from chains. The possibility of H. R. 1, even in its present form, being construed to cover retail automobile dealers has been seriously discussed at these hearings, as has also the possibility of amending the bill to cover manufacturer's branches, chain wholesalers, and chain oil refineries. Voluntary chains, because of their centralized control and close similarity to corporate chains in their operations, would probably be construed as being covered by this bill.

In my opinion the principle involved in this bill is a perversion of the taxing power of the United States since it would be used to destroy a legitimate business, and I am sure that this committee, with its knowledge of taxation, will not want to set a precedent of this character, because once established it is a direct step away from our democratic form of government.

I believe that the record demonstrates that the economies of distribution present in the multiple store system are available to 108,000 retailers in the food field alone who have joined voluntary groups, as compared with only 40,000 food stores operated by corporate chains. These voluntary and cooperative organizations, as well as the efficient independent stores, do not need and have not sought to destroy their competitors through discriminatory measures such as House Resolution 1. These groups are doing an efficient job in the field of distribution and are furnishing keen competition to companies engaged in the multiple-store system.

Companies engaged in multiple-store distribution have been subjected to reckless and unfounded charges for a number of years by a few individuals who hope to benefit from the destruction of what witnesses who have testified believe to be the soundest, most economical and efficient method of distribution yet devised. This hearing has afforded the first opportunity of presenting to a committee of the Congress the facts concerning our business, and the opportunity thus afforded has been welcomed by our company, and I am sure by all multiple store companies.

Company executives who have appeared have endeavored to present factual information to acquaint this committee with the development of the multiple-store system of distribution, the policies, methods, and practices followed by the companies, the benefits and assistance to producers, manufacturers, and processors of a wide range of commodities produced or manufactured in the United States, and finally the social and economic contribution to the public welfare. It has never been the policy of my company, either at this hearing or elsewhere, and I am sure that it is not the policy of any other company engaged in the same method of distribution, to condemn or criticize other methods or systems of distribution. I believe that there is ample room in our economy for each method of distribution, and that by encouraging each method producers, laborers, manufacturers, and consumers will reap the greatest benefits.

At this point, Mr. Chairman, I ask leave of the committee to file certain documents for inclusion in the record at the close of my statement. These documents have been handed to me by representatives of various companies and relate only to specific statements made by proponents in their rebuttal.

Permit me to express the deep appreciation of my company for the patient, thorough, and fair manner in which this committee has conducted this hearing. I am confident that this feeling is shared by every chain store company representative that has appeared at the hearing. I do not wish to burden your committee with further testimony, because I believe that the record clearly demonstrates beyond question the unsoundness of H. R. 1.

Thank you very much.

APPENDIX

The statement referred to by Mr. Burkard is as follows:

SALES AND NUMBER OF CHAIN AND INDEPENDENT FOOD STORES, 1929–39

Official figures on total food-store sales are available only for the three census years of 1929, 1933, and 1935. All food stores include grocery, combination, delicatessen, bakeries, meats and sea food, fruit and vegetable markets, dairy-products stores, etc. Sales were as follows: [3]

[3] Census of Business: 1935. Retail Distribution, vol. I. United States Summary, pp. 2–04 and 3–04.

Sales of chain and independent grocery and combination grocery and meat stores only in the 3 census years were as follows:

1929	$7,352,791,000	$2,833,979,000	$4,518,812,000	38.5
1935	6,352,420,000	2,466,588,000	3,885,832,000	38.8

The sales of all retail food stores declined materially between 1929 and 1933 due to the depression. The decline in the sales of independents for this period was greater than that of chains. This was undoubtedly due, at least in part, to the fact that consumers with reduced purchasing power took advantage of lower chain-store prices. Between 1933 and 1935 the sales of all retail food stores materially increased. The increase in the sales of independent food stores amounted to more than a billion dollars, or 39 percent, and the increase in the sale of food chains was $257,588,000, or 11.7 percent. In other words, independent food sales declined more from 1929 to 1933 but recovered more from 1933 to 1935, so that the proportion of food business going to the chains was about the same in 1935 as in 1929.

The percentage of food business done by chain-store organizations is overstated, and the amount of food business is understated, because it does not take into account sales of food in stores other than food stores, or in food stores other than grocery and combination stores. For example, according to the 1935 census, country general stores had sales of $1,110,403,000. More than half of the sales of these stores consist of food products, and 96.5 percent of these were independent stores. Thus, in country general stores alone, another $535,000,000 worth of food was sold in independent stores even if only one-half of their sales were food products. This together with sales of other types of food stores would reduce the proportion of food sold by chain organizations in 1935 to 32.8 percent instead of 38.8 percent given in the table above.

In addition to country general stores many other stores that are not classified as food stores sell food products although the volume of their food sales is not known. Feed stores, general merchandise stores, and department stores are examples. The amount of food sold by house-to-house peddlers and roadside stands is not known, or is incompletely known.

According to the 1935 census, the sales of eating and drinking places amounted to $2,390,860,000. If only half of these sales consisted of food, another $1,195,000,000 is added to the food bill of the country. Hotels, Pullman cars, hospitals, and clubs are other places where food is sold in large quantities.

All of these places, ranging from country general stores to private clubs, must raise the food sales of the country, in one form or another, by a few billion dollars. Exclusive of food produced for home consumption, the value of all food sales probably is close to $15,000,000,000. In that case, sales of food by chain organizations are well below 30 percent of the total, and the largest food chain in the country does less than 7 percent of the total food business, and in the matter of food sold at retail for off-premise consumption, probably not more than 8 to 9 percent of the country's total.

Although official data are lacking for years subsequent to 1935, estimates of the food business of the country for these later years have been made by the Progressive Grocer, a trade publication. The classification of grocery and combination stores in this publication differs from the census classification in that they include other types of food stores. For this reason they are not strictly comparable with census figures, nevertheless I am submitting them as a possible indication of the trend.

Year	Independents	Chains	Total	Chain, percent of total
1936	$5,188,000,000	$2,638,000,000	$7,826,000,000	33.71
1937	5,458,000,000	2,698,000,000	8,156,000,000	33.08
1938	5,076,000,000	2,657,000,000	7,733,000,000	34.36
1939	4,990,000,000	2,900,000,000	7,890,000,000	36.76

[1] Facts in Food and Grocery Distribution, January 1940, published by the Progressive Grocer, 171 Sixth Avenue, New York, N. Y., p. 4.

The number of chain and independent grocery and combination stores in census years was as follows:

Year	Independents	Chain

Thus between 1929 and 1935 the number of independent grocery and combination stores increased by 70,316, or 30 percent, while the chains decreased by 4,379, or 8.3 percent. The change in number is even more startling in 1939. It is estimated by our trade association that there were no more than 40,000 chain grocery and combination stores by the first of this year. This estimate is confirmed by Facts in Food and Grocery Distribution, the booklet previously cited. According to this estimate the number of chain grocery and combination stores has declined more than 12,000 in the 11-year period, 1929–30, or nearly 24 percent.

The number of independent grocery and combination stores in 1939 is estimated in Facts in Food and Grocery Distribution to have been 386,000, a total of nearly 152,000 more stores than reported by the census of 1929. While these figures may not be strictly comparable they do reflect the very large increase in the number of independent stores, despite the charges of proponents of H. R. 1 that the independent is being driven out of business.

For all lines of retailing the number of chain and independent stores is given below for the 3 census years: [4]

1929	1,295,114	144,606	103,438	1,543,158
1935	1,474,147	127,482	52,330	1,653,961

[1] "All others" include such retail outlets as utility-operated stores, mail-order houses, direct selling, commissaries, etc.

So far as I know, there has been no reliable estimate made since 1935 of the total number of retail outlets for all lines of trade.

OF WISCONSIN

EDITORIAL FROM SOCIAL JUSTICE

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the July 1, 1940, issue of Father Coughlin's Social Justice:

[From Social Justice of July 1, 1940]

APING JOHN BULL

Is Mr. Roosevelt, consciously or not, aping John Bull?

John Bull, we remember, promised military aid to the defense of Poland, Finland, Norway, Belgium, and France. Relying upon the British promise, the brave defenders of these countries often defied their own better judgment and stood up against unbeatable odds, spurred by the thought that the British would come. Time after time the British ran out on their promises.

Mr. Roosevelt promised every assistance short of war—and then some—to Premier Reynaud to carry on the defense of France. So confident was Reynaud in the Roosevelt promise to "fix things up" at home that he held out against the counsel of his own countrymen. Then came the Roosevelt canvass of Congress and the fateful week-end telegram to Reynaud: "Of course, I did not mean fighting men; that's up to Congress." And M. Reynaud, like many another disillusioned chancellor, resigned.

The John Bullers are always long on promises and short on performance.

The 1932 platform of Mr. Roosevelt's political party was glorious for its promises. It is still good as new; the promises are practically untouched. Instead, we have the inglorious record of their nonfulfillment in 1940.

Townsend Convention

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1940

KEYNOTE ADDRESS OF DR. FRANCIS E. TOWNSEND

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, the Townsend organization is holding its fifth national convention in St. Louis, Mo. Delegates from every State in the Union are in attendance. At the opening session Dr. Francis E. Townsend, the founder of the movement, delivered a keynote address. I ask leave to include this address in an extension of my remarks. The address follows:

COMPLETE TEXT OF DR. TOWNSEND'S KEYNOTE ADDRESS AT CONVENTION

We come before you in the most solemn period in our Nation's history. The United States of America and the future of our people are at stake.

During my visit to the Republican National Convention in Philadelphia, I found little realization of the gravity of our situation. The delegates seemed more like grown-up schoolboys at play. I am reasonably certain that the Democratic Convention in Chicago will not reflect any higher degree of statesmanship or knowledge of our national peril.

The mightiest revolution in the history of mankind has taken place in Europe. A single totalitarian power has swept into absolute control of every inch of Europe's continental coast line from the Arctic Circle to the Spanish border. Four hundred millions of people and an entire continent with its resources have fallen under the domination of a single despotic leader. In the Far East another dictatorship, not friendly to the United States, is commanding comparable strength and absorbing the land and resources of its neighbors.

Between these powers there lies the mighty Russian Empire—another vast continental monopoly of completely controlled production, distribution, and trade. The United States is indeed isolated. We have no one to look to but ourselves and the intelligence of those we delegate to represent us.

DICTATORS FREE TO ACT

The three great dictatorships of Europe and Asia have no one to question them. They are not beset by financial worries; there is never any question about what they can afford. If they have gold, they use it; if they have no gold, they use goods. They may be compared to the elder Rockefeller in dealing with independent oil producers—or to a powerful string of chain stores in competing with the corner grocer. They are utterly ruthless in subjugating the rights of individuals and nations to the demands of their nationalistic aims.

In this mightiest of revolutions, the rules we have known in the past have been swept aside. The world moves in new ways. Never has democracy faced such a challenge. It is up to the people of America to prove that the ideals by which we have lived and grown great can triumph over the world-crushing forces of domineering overlords.

With these thoughts in mind, I attended the Republican Convention in Philadelphia. It was my conviction that the delegates assembled there would be sobered and exhalted by the responsibilities entrusted to them—that they would be considering the wretched plight of 10,000,000 men without jobs—that they would be sympathetic to the demands of 10,000,000 of our elder citizens left without hope in a world their energies had helped to create.

I dared to hope that they would realize that the first line of national defense is the health and well-being of all our citizens.

But what did I find? Just the usual convention picture. Similar in every way to the conventions of preceding years—except, perhaps, that the delegates were a little more vociferous, a little more given to horseplay than they were in 1936 when New Deal popularity was at its height. There were the usual swarm of job seekers ready to cheer their heads off for the candidate whose selection might land them a soft berth. There were elephants parading the street. There were joyous celebrants in the cafes and bars intent on smashing each other's straw hats. There were organized cheering sections for the Grand Old Party—shouting college yells until their overstrained throats gave out. And this, my friends, is not political claptrap.

I am, myself, a registered Republican. We gather here as representatives of all political faiths. We have put our cause above political party faiths.

WHAT WE MUST DO

I know, and you know, that unless there is a veritable uprising in the land, the Democratic Convention in Chicago will be but a repetition of what we have seen in Philadelphia. We must solemnly realize that the United States of America—and everything we hold dear—is at stake. Future generations will point to us and ask what service we performed in the hour of our Nation's peril.

We must build a city invincible.

"I dreamed in a dream," said Walt Whitman, "that I saw a city invincible to the attacks of the whole of the rest of the earth. I dreamed that was the new city of friends."

It is in that spirit of friendship and toleration—a toleration broad enough to cover race, creed, and politics—that we hopefully gather here in convention to build a bulwark in the face of desperate times. We pledge to the work that we do the intelligence of our brains, the work of our hands, and the strength and full affection of our hearts. We realize that we are members—one of another—and together we worship the Father in spirit and in truth. It is indeed our task to make His kingdom come here on earth.

In this spirit of consecrated service to mankind, we come before you with solemn warning: This Nation—founded on patriot blood—trembles on the brink of an abyss. Those to whom we have delegated power seem to have closed their eyes, but we—the people—are awake. And we intend to save America from all perils, including both those within and without.

The industrial activities of the entire world are geared to wartime production—the machine-tool industry and most of our factories are devoted to the ghastly business of creating instruments of destruction.

We do not wish to create a war scare or to join in predictions that war planes are likely to bomb Denver or St. Louis tomorrow, but we do bring you an even more frightening picture.

What will happen to our economy—this boasted American economy—when peace is finally declared?

The normal crops of Europe have been crushed beneath tractor, wheel, and marching feet. A few short months and the Old World will face continental famine. Russia, the potential bread basket of Europe, has been unable to secure sufficient machinery; it is not making the exports of food that were promised. A world torn with strife cannot return to normalcy at the mere signing of peace treaties.

The outlook for foreign trade is bleak, indeed. Reciprocal trade treaties are now mere subjects for academic discussion. We face a permanent loss of about $6,000,000,000 in annual world trade, together with the resultant loss of hundreds of thousands of jobs. Russian purchases in the United States last month fell to $2,750,000, compared with a monthly average of close to ten millions. Nations that were formerly our customers are now under the dominion of Adolf Hitler and will buy little or nothing. What trade we will have will be based on barter. The days of favorable trade balances are gone.

We are faced with the necessity of discarding our old squirrel-like philosophies and seeking ways and means to distribute our goods instead of burying gold in the unresponsive soil at Fort Knox. Our national policy has been to imitate old King Midas; we have turned the goods our own people need into imported gold. There is nothing for advocates of such policies to do save follow the classical example of Midas and jump in the river—to come up later with jackass ears.

STRIKING AT REPUTATIONS

Instead of seeking answers to our problems, national political conventions, says Westbrook Pegler, are largely concerned with tearing the reputations of potential candidates into shreds. If a man takes a drink, he is a drunkard. If a candidate comes to the convention well advertised, he is presumed to have bought his delegates and to have questionable connections with Wall Street. If he is an independent, he is accused of being a wily stooge of sinister forces.

It is inconceivable that any man should be the public's choice. If he is a Catholic, he is supposed to be in the service of the Vatican; if a Jew, he is strongly suspected of being a Communist and an international banker in the employ of Hitler at one and the same time. If a Protestant, he is a prohibitionist and a dangerous bigot; while if he ever spoke favorably toward union labor, he is a treacherous "red" hired by Joe Stalin. And, we may add, if he be so unfortunate as to have humanitarian ideals and favor security for the aged and a decent, Christian living for the rest of his fellow beings, he is branded as a "crackpot" without question.

Our statesmen and political leaders do not seem to be aware of the desperate plight of the Nation. If peace should suddenly descend upon the earth, it could scarcely be termed an unqualified blessing, for our country faces the worst catastrophe from an economic standpoint that civilized man may ever see. There will be more millions without jobs than we can imagine.

Considering the current advances of technology and the ultimate cessation of war activity, it is not too much to state that we may look for at least 21,000,000 men parading the streets without means of sustenance. No nation could exist for long under such a condition. The threat of bloody revolution would be upon our hands.

There is an answer, and that answer is in this solemn conference: We are not gathered here to seek political jobs nor to gratify personal ambition, but, rather, to build for the good of all mankind.

In our recovery plan we have the key to America's salvation.

We are here dedicated to the highest patriotic service. We have come together voluntarily to build that city invincible—that new city of friends that can withstand the attacks of the rest of the earth.

When we part at the close of this convention we know that each of us must go forth with the load of an overburdened society upon his shoulders; we know that it is up to us to turn the tide of disaster from a world that the Supreme Economist intended should be a commonwealth for all men. Each of us must solemnly realize that we can look only to ourselves for the fulfillment of this task. The burden is yours and mine. Humbly, proudly, and unflinchingly we will take up the challenge of that burden. We have the weapon and the answer. We are confident that we shall accomplish a victory.

Official surveys indicate that our farms and factories are now operating at less than half of their capacity. It is physically possible to have an abundance of useful goods—it must be made financially possible—that is our demand.

The enactment of the Townsend recovery plan, to which our hearts and souls and minds are dedicated, immediately will place into circulation the necessary billions of dollars to keep our industrial machine functioning. We will substitute the abundant life for the criminal activities and hates in which the world is now engaged. The retirement of our aged will make up for the loss of world-wide markets and immediately give to our industrialists, our farmers, and our businessmen a home market of almost unlimited proportions.

Natural demands for food, clothing, and shelter for the people of this Nation—for the young and for the old—for the unemployed and the oppressed—have never been implemented with money. We have never known how great effective demand could be. America's market is right here at home, and we propose to prove it.

With the enactment of our bill now before the Congress of the United States, we, the elder citizens of America, give to the world a new design for living, a new leadership under God. We shall furnish mankind with a sample of the kingdom of heaven on earth, and, in doing this, we shall outlaw war eventually—outlaw starvation of the innocent and oppression of the weak. We shall rise to the full stature of the sons and daughters of the one and only King.

Our Flag: Display It, Respect It—Apostrophe to Our National Flag

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANDREW C. SCHIFFLER

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1940

POEM BY WILLIAM T. KERR, PHILADELPHIA, FOUNDER AND NATIONAL PRESIDENT, AMERICAN FLAG DAY ASSOCIATION

Mr. SCHIFFLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following Apostrophe to Our National Flag by William T. Kerr, Philadelphia, founder and national president, American Flag Day Association:

APOSTROPHE TO OUR NATIONAL FLAG

(By William T. Kerr, Philadelphia, founder and national president, American Flag Day Association)

Pride of all America
Admired by all the World!
  Floating o'er every schoolhouse,
  On every hilltop,
  in every valley and plain.
Liberty's school master!
Tyranny's scourge at all times in every clime and nation.
Laughing to scorn the teachings of Monarchy's "divine right"!
Setting at naught the claims of princes and potentates!
Standard of freedom
  civil and religious!
Emblem of a united people, the greatest and grandest Nation
  sun e'er shone o'er:
  knowing no master, fearing no king, kneeling to none but Almighty God!

Marking the pathway for other nations to tread!
The beacon light of civilization!
"Old Glory" we salute thee!
There is no stain on any stripe
in all thy years of life!
The luster of thy stars
Shines out more brightly as Time rolls on!
Born June 14, 1777
Midst cannon's roar and blast of musketry!
Standard of Washington!
of Lincoln! and all the long line of America's patriots who gave their lives in war and spent their strength in peace for righteousness.
Foreign foes throughout great wars fell 'neath thy withering glances While mistaken brethren who for a time forgot thee
Now love thee all the more!
Proudly aloft thou wavest, welcoming freedom-loving seekers but crying
"Back" to every foe of America's greatness,
"Our free institutions, handiwork
"of our illustrious forefathers
"Must not be destroyed, Hands off!"
Beautiful starry banner! there is none fairer or grander anywhere.
We rejoice with thee on this thy natal day.
Long may thy stripes and stars
Fly to the breeze, bidding defiance to thy foes, proclaiming liberty!
Long may thou vigil keep
O'er millions patriots homes,
Stamping indelibly, deep into the minds of all,
That free America,
Than which there is None greater now in all the earth,
Will yet greater be,
when every son and daughter of thy soil, and every other in our midst shall know naught save
One God!
One people!
One language! and
One flag "Old Glory"!
Yours and mine.
Teach its history!
Proclaim it to all in picture, song, and story,
Let none forget its cost in blood!
and untold sacrifice.

"Old Glory" speaks: "Americans, what you are I am, don't let the red flag of communism or anarchy supplant me."

Republicans Out of Step With Willkie

OF

HON. JOHN W. BOEHNE, JR.

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1940

Mr. BOEHNE. Mr. Speaker, during the past month or so there appeared in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a series of four or five statements by a number of my Republican colleagues from Indiana—particularly Messrs. JOHNSON, GILLIE, SPRINGER, and LANDIS—attacking trade agreements. Although these statements seem to have a common origin, they were made before the Republicans nominated Mr. Wendell Willkie as their standard bearer. In view of Mr. Willkie's stanch advocacy of the principle of trade agreements, I wonder what my Republican colleagues will now say about the trade-agreements program.

Just to keep the RECORD straight, I want to quote two statements from the writings of Mr. Willkie on the subject of trade agreements. The first is from Fortune Magazine of April 1940, after the extension of the Trade Agreements Act in the House and before it was voted upon in the Senate, as follows:

Take the problem of the Hull trade agreements, for example. Here again there has been a tendency for the Democrats to huddle in one corner shouting their enthusiasm, and the Republicans to huddle in another prophesying calamity. We, the people, had better confer by ourselves. * * *

Now obviously it will not do for one great nation to become a free-trade country by itself. For the United States to erase its tariffs all at once would be ruinous to our people and many of our industries. The present Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, who is wise and temperate, realizes this. And so he adopted the reciprocal trade agreements as a step toward increasing our foreign business gradually. Under this policy the United States takes up the problem of tariffs with each country separately; lists the products that it would like to export; studies a similar list submitted by the other country, and then a deal is arranged, each country making such concessions as it can, with the least possible harm and the most possible benefit to its own people. This agreement is then extended to apply to other countries too. What could be simpler or more in accord with common sense? What could be better qualified to benefit us, the people, as a whole? Of course, we have to make sacrifices. But the point is that, owing to the way the agreements are negotiated, the sacrifices are always, and should always be, less than the benefits gained. That is, we, the people, profit.

The other is from the Saturday Evening Post of June 22, 1940, about the time of the convening of the Republican National Convention at Philadelphia, as follows:

Americans have demonstrated that they are as good businessmen as the people in other countries. They can bargain efficiently in their domestic trade, and they can bargain with equal efficiency in their foreign trade. We had a foreign market worth billions of dollars to us once. To be exact, it was worh $5,240,000,000 in 1929—enough to provide thousands of the jobs which the unemployed are looking for. We may never get all of this trade back, but we can certainly get part of it back. Trade treaties are a step in that direction.

These excerpts are not merely a few sentences taken from their context, as some of my colleagues from Indiana did with respect to President Roosevelt's statement in 1932 in their recent extension of remarks, but are substantial paragraphs apparently expressing the considered views of the Republican candidate before he had seen the weak, contradictory, and vacillating plank on foreign trade which was adopted by the Republicans at Philadelphia.

In spite of certain newspaper reports of what Mr. Willkie has later said about trade agreements, I think it is a little premature to bury the trade-agreements program, because Hitler has voided some agreements. Let us not throw up the sponge quite so soon. There are yet beneficial agreements with Canada, Cuba, Brazil, Colombia, Venezuela, and other Latin-American countries. There ought to be others in order to strengthen the solidarity of the Western Hemisphere. As Mr. Willkie is reported to have said at the convention:

After this is all over we are going to have to have larger trade areas if we maintain our living standards without deficit financing. The way to do it is through agreements.

Therefore the thing to do is to keep this program in existence as far as possible, strengthen and expand its area of operation, and be prepared for a better economic peace than is proposed in the Republican platform which offers another Hawley-Smoot war-provoking tariff plank.

INDIANA AND TRADE AGREEMENTS

The trade-agreements program has been one of the major forces in improving the condition of Indiana farmers and others since the present administration came into power. Under this administration the farm cash income of Indiana, excluding Government payments, rose from $143,000,000 in 1932 to $260,000,000 in 1939. That is a key figure. It alone is a sufficient reply to my colleagues.

Without attempting to answer their garbled and untrue charges that any program of this administration has been injurious to farmers, I want to submit a few official figures on the relationship of the program to the State of Indiana which my colleagues omitted in their statements.

Conditions of Indiana industries under the Hawley-Smoot tariff period, 1929–39

[1] The Hawley-Smoot Tariff Act became effective on June 18, 1930, hence that year was not included; the year 1933 was included because the Trade Agreements Act was not authorized until June 1934; only 4 agreements had been negotiated by the end of 1935.

Another Trade Agreement Fiasco

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1940

ARTICLE FROM NEW YORK DAILY NEWS RECORD

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following news item appearing in the Daily News Record, of New York City, under date of June 26, 1930. This is another trade agreement fiasco.

CANADA VOTES 10-PERCENT TAX ON IMPORTS—ONLY GOODS UNDER BRITISH PREFERENTIAL TARIFF NOT INCLUDED

OTTAWA, ONTARIO, June 25.—Canada's war budget, submitted to Parliament yesterday, provides for an immediately effective tax of 10 percent on all imports from the United States and other countries not under the British preferential tariff, and for an increase to 75 percent from 50 percent in the maximum wartime excess-profits tax.

Since the sales tax of 8 percent on dressed and dyed furs is imposed at the initial point of processing and not on the finished garments, this tax is increased to 12 percent, so as to be in line with the rate of 8 percent on finished cloth garments.

There are heavy increases in income taxes, making them the greatest in Canada's history, with special war income tax on earnings of $600 yearly and more. Taxes on new automobiles are 10 percent up to $700, and up to 80 percent on values in excess of $1,200. Higher taxes are imposed on smokers' supplies.

The Republican Platform

OF

HON. SHERMAN MINTON

OF INDIANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 3 (legislative day of Monday, July 1), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM HARTFORD TIMES

Mr. MINTON. Mr. President, one of the candidates before the Republican National Convention whom the public does not remember is a man by the name of Gannett. Mr. Gannett has a chain of newspapers. I have not always been in agreement with Mr. Gannett, as he will readily admit and as most of us who know the circumstances will understand; but Mr. Gannett seems to know something about the Republican platform which was adopted at Philadelphia.

In the Hartford Times of June 27 is an editorial entitled "The Republican Platform." The Hartford Times is one of Mr. Gannett's newspapers, and this is Mr. Gannett's estimate of his own party's platform. I ask unanimous consent that the editorial be printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Hartford (Conn.) Times of June 27, 1940.]

THE REPUBLICAN PLATFORM

Of the Republican platform, honest appraisal can say little more than that it is a queer jumble of traditional political folderol, contradictions, and glaring attempt to be all things to all voters. Its most palpable artificialities are its straddling on foreign policy and its hypocritical castigation of the New Deal while, at the same time, embracing most of its chief policies, as on farm subsidy, social security, labor, etc. The platform is a confused statement born of confused minds.

Republican leaders labored long and tediously over the foreign policy plank. The struggle between interventionists and isolationists resulted in a straddling declaration.

On the one hand, "we favor extension * * * of such aid as shall not be in violation of international law or inconsistent with the requirements of our own national defense."

On the other hand, the party "is firmly opposed to involving this Nation in foreign war."

Irrespective who the Presidential candidate may be, he will have no difficulty being both interventionist and isolationist as the campaign occasion and location may require. There is abundant elasticity in the phrases "requirements of our national defense" as limiting or expanding our help to other nations, and "involving this Nation in foreign war," as marking safe limits against involvement. Both phrases can mean what the candidate feels they should mean.

Even more two-faced is the platform on outstanding domestic issues. Since the election verdict is almost certain to lie in the West, the farm issue is of prime political significance. The Republican Party outdeals the New Deal on Federal subsidies. "The farmer is entitled to a profit price for his products."

Until a balance has been established between labor, industry, and agriculture, "we propose to provide benefit payments * * * free from Government-dominated production control." That is going beyond the New Deal which has wisely seen the necessity of controlling production if subsidies are not to stimulate expanded acreage and ever-mounting surpluses.

The platform favors "adequate farm credit at the lowest interest rates * * *" under "ultimate farmer ownership and control." That is another outright bid for the farm vote.

Like the New Deal, the platform also favors "Federal acquisition of nonproductive farm lands." It would "foster Government refinancing of the heavy farm-debt load." That must mean extension of the present Government farm-loan plan.

On another important New Deal policy, that of social security, the Republicans are more than converted to it. They "favor the extension of old-age benefits * * * to the extent that revenues raised for this purpose will permit." An obvious bid for the Townsend vote.

In view of the generosity displayed in the farm and social security planks the later promise that public expenditures, "other than those for national defense and relief," shall be "cut to levels necessary for the essential services of Government," does not mean a thing. For, if farm subsidies and social security benefits are deemed essential, there obviously can be no cutting of expenditures.

As a campaign document, the Republican platform is a typical and traditional deliverance. As an honest statement of national policy by a major political party, it is a travesty.

The American Negro Exposition in Chicago

REMARKS

HON. ARTHUR W. MITCHELL

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1940

Mr. MITCHELL. Mr. Speaker, tomorrow marks the opening of a unique but important exposition in Chicago. This exposition is, in fact, the celebration of the seventy-fifth anniversary of the emancipation of the Negro in this country. Congress has generously appropriated funds for the exposition, and it is my hope that every Member of Congress will visit this exposition. It opens tomorrow, July 4, and will be open until Labor Day, September 2.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous to extend my remarks in the RECORD and to include therein a letter which I received from the President of the United States on this matter, to include the commission which he issued to me as the commissioner of this exposition, and to include a telegram I have received from the director of the exposition together with my reply thereto.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, it is so ordered.

There was no objection.

The matter referred to follows:

ARTHUR W. MITCHELL,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.:

Senator SLATTERY and Dr. Patterson met here Wednesday, confirmed Mr. Lightfoot's appointment, and were most enthusiastic over progress of exposition. A program is being arranged for the 4th of July opening. President Roosevelt will press button 1 o'clock eastern standard time. Hope you will have your greetings here by wire in plenty of time. President Roosevelt also will send greetings. Federal appropriations not yet in hand, but progressing.

CLAUDE A. BARNETT.

JULY 3, 1940.

MAYOR EDWARD J. KELLY AND THE MEMBERS OF THE COMMISSION OF THE AMERICAN NEGRO EXPOSITION, Care of Mr. Truman K. Gibson, Jr., Director, 3632 South Parkway, Chicago, Ill.:

Heartiest congratulations upon the great work you have done in making ready the American Negro Exposition. I regard this exposition, showing to the world as it does the progress made by the Negro in America during the first 75 years of his freedom, a distinct milestone in the progress of the American Nation. The Negro has developed into a substantial American citizen, although due recognition has not been given him. The exhibits which you are showing the American public will do much in bringing about this recognition which up to this time has been so unjustly withheld from him. In fact, the exposition has already done much in the way of bringing about better understanding and good will between the races. This is evidenced by the enthusiastic interest shown in the exposition by the Legislature and the Governor of Illinois, by Mayor Edward J. Kelly and the people of Chicago, by the various departments of the United States Government, by the Members of the Congress, both in the House and in the Senate, and, finally, by the President and the members of his Cabinet. I regard this as our supreme educational effort.

It has given me pleasure to work with your commission. My bill, which secured for the commission an appropriation of $75,000 from the Federal Government, has given me as much, if not more, genuine satisfaction than any single thing I have done since I became a Member of Congress. It is with deep regret that I am unable to be present at the opening of the exposition. I shall come to Chicago at the earliest possible moment and shall continue to do all in my power to aid you in the fine job you are doing, thus rendering the American Negro and the American Nation a distinct service.

ARTHUR W. MITCHELL.

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 5, 1940.

Hon. ARTHUR W. MITCHELL,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. MITCHELL: I have just had the pleasure of signing commissions appointing you, Senator Slattery, and President Patterson, of Tuskegee, as members of the auxiliary commission provided for in the act of Congress approved May 24, 1940, to authorize an appropriation to assist in defraying the expenses of the American Negro Exposition to be held in Chicago, Ill., during 1940 (Public, No. 522, 76th Cong.). When you are organized, I hope the commission will select as its secretary-treasurer some thoroughly qualified person, preferably someone from a Chicago bank.

I thank you for accepting this service and trust that it may prove most interesting and enjoyable to you.

Very sincerely yours,

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT

President of the United States of America

To All Who Shall See These Presents, Greeting:

Know ye, that reposing special trust and confidence in the integrity and ability of ARTHUR W. MITCHELL, a Member of the House of Representatives from the State of Illinois, I do appoint him a member of the auxiliary commission charged with the expenditure of the funds appropriated by Congress to assist in defraying the expenses of the American Negro Exposition to be held in Chicago, Ill., July 4 to September 2, 1940, which auxiliary commission shall work in conjunction with the Afra-Merican Emancipation Exposition Commission appointed by the Governor of the State of Illinois, and do authorize and empower him to execute and fulfil the duties of this commission with all the powers and privileges thereunto of right appertaining during the pleasure of the President of the United States for the time being.

In testimony whereof I have caused to seal of the United States to be hereunto affixed.

Done at the city of Washington this 5th day of June, in the year of our Lord 1940, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and sixty-fourth.

Secretary of State.

Washington Editor Urges Support for Mundt Amendment in Pollution Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KARL E. MUNDT

Wednesday, July 3, 1940

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, according to an announcement by the gentleman from Texas, Congressman MANSFIELD, chairman of the House conferees on the pollution bill, S. 685, he is going to bring the pollution bill back to the House on Tuesday, July 9, to ask for further instructions to the conferees. After several meetings the conferees have been unable to agree as to whether to accept the so-called Mundt amendment providing that no new stream pollution shall be permitted without approval of the United States Public Health Service or to ratify S. 685 in its original version, which simply appropriates money to study the problem, and sets up no restraints or restrictions against either existing or future forms of pollution.

When this legislation was last before us, the House, by a 2-to-1 vote, ratified the Mundt amendment, which has the united support of all national conservation organizations in America. This amendment was a compromise between those who preferred stricter legislation to control pollution and those who feel that nothing should be done by the Government to protect the public waters of America. Senate bill 685, with the Mundt amendment, does nothing about prevailing forms and sources of pollution, but it does take the forward-looking step of establishing standards and setting up a procedure by which detrimental types of new and future pollution may be regulated or restricted by the Government. If America is to do anything more courageous about the problem than simply turning the public waters over to the polluters themselves, it can proceed no more slowly and reasonably than the provisions of the Mundt amendment. Without that amendment S. 685 is a wasteful expenditure of the taxpayer's money, and without that amendment S. 685 contains not a word or syllable which would control or regulate the pollution of American streams. In fact, S. 685, without that amendment, is a definite backward step, since by implication it notifies polluters that the Government will not interfere with their nefarious practices and gives them carte blanche to continue poisoning the peoples' waters.

Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity of expressing my appreciation to the House conferees for upholding the House position in the conferences on this legislation. It is my hope and expectation that this body will again reaffirm its support of the Mundt amendment and I hope that every friend of conservation, every friend of public health, and every friend of a cleaner and better out of doors will be present on Tuesday, July 9, to vote for this amendment, so that at long last this country make take one small but definitely forward step in solving the age-old problem of pollution.

MAKE IT REAL

A congressional resolution authorizing the District of Columbia, Pennsylvania, Virginia, West Virginia, and Maryland to work together in a voluntary program of pollution control for the Potomac River watershed is now waiting the President's signature.

This is a good thing and we are all for it. But lest anybody be deceived that it can accomplish very much we have to point out all voluntary projects of this sort usually bog down. But there is pending now before a conference committee of House and Senate a bill by Senator BARKLEY, amended in the House on a motion by Representative MUNDT, of South Dakota, which may do some good if the Mundt amendment is preserved. It would provide that no new stream pollution would be permitted without approval of the United States Public Health Service. But lacking this amendment, the Barkley bill is mainly a "pork barrel" project.

If the Mundt amendment is dropped, the whole thing may as well be dropped. Political pork is too expensive today.

Elimination of "Fifth Column" Activities

OF

HON. OVERTON BROOKS

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1940

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, in the month of April 1939, I introduced in this Congress a bill which would require the registration of all aliens coming into the United States. I have made speeches on behalf of this bill, and I have urged consideration of it. Sometime after the introduction of my bill the Judiciary Committee of the House of Representatives adopted a comprehensive bill containing very similar provisions to the one which I had introduced, with the additional feature of requiring fingerprinting of aliens. This bill, called the Smith bill, came up for consideration about a year ago in the House and was passed. It was only about 3 weeks ago that the Senate finally acted upon this bill and the President has just signed it. It is now the law of the United States, and under the terms of the bill all aliens within our country must be registered and fingerprinted. In this manner, law-abiding aliens who honestly love this country and respect its institutions are protected and safeguarded. At the same time the enemy alien within our borders will be fingerprinted and registered and watched and promptly arrested in the event of any violation of our laws.

Another step which has recently been taken in the drive by Congress to eliminate "fifth column" activities in the United States is section 9 of the Hatch bill which requires the Civil Service Commission to approve each application for a position from the standpoint of the patriotism and loyalty of the applicant for a Government job before he can receive the position. In this way the Civil Service Commission now refuses to certify to any department of Government for any position any person who is a member of the Communist Party, the German bund, or any other communistic or Nazi organization.

Recently during hearings before the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives, the committee aggressively and militarily demanded assurances that the Civil Service Commission would not approve anyone for employment "who had 'fifth column' " tendencies. As an additional safeguard the committee demanded in reference to War Department applications that the War Department have the right also to pass upon the patriotic qualifications of every applicant, and in the event there was doubt about the patriotism of any applicant certified by the Commission, the Secretary of War might yet have the authority to refuse to accept the appointee. I am introducing a bill, Mr. Speaker, which in the event of any emergency, will speed up the trial of any "fifth column" violator. For instance where an individual, whether he be alien or citizen, is charged with the crime of espionage, sabotage, or anything which might be known as an un-American crime, he shall be brought to trial within not more than 15 days after the arrest. Under the terms of this bill all preliminary motions and pleas shall be disposed of at the time of the trial and appeals from the decisions of the trial courts shall be heard at the earliest possible moment. I want to say in reference to this bill that when the safety of our Nation is in jeopardy, and every department of government and every governmental official is bending every energy to place our people in a position to defend themselves properly, any "fifth columnist" who seeks at this critical time in the affairs of the Nation to stay the hand of government should be immediately arrested and given a prompt trial with the proper punishment for his crime. Crime such as espionage and sabotage in time of peace are most despicable and those guilty should be punished severely.

About a year ago the Military Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives amended the bill covering the penalty for the crime of espionage during time of peace. At this time the maximum penalty was increased from 10 to 20 years. Of course, spying in time of war as well as treason is punishable with the penalty of death.

A recent report of the Dies committee of the House of Representatives makes the statement that most of the legislation necessary for the handling of the enemy-alien situation is already on the statute books. The great need is for prompt and effective enforcement rather than for more laws. Congress has recognized this recommendation of the Dies committee and we have recently provided for an increase of more than 600 agents of the Federal Bureau of Investigation. It is hoped that this additional number of agents will be sufficient to properly enforce our "fifth column" laws and to promptly visit proper punishment upon those "who bite the hand that feeds them." Should additional F. B. I. agents be needed for this, I am ready to vote for further funds for this purpose. Mr. Speaker, this session of Congress has already authorized the expenditure of between five and seven billion dollars on national defense. Within the next few months additional billions may be necessary and our people are ready and willing to make the sacrifice necessary, whatever it may be, to provide proper defense for our land and our people.

In 1 year of "blitzkrieg" warfare Germany has conquered eight peaceful and unoffending countries and now is proceeding to the battle of England, which will perhaps begin soon. In 8 years prior to the present war, it is estimated that Germany under Hitler has expended over $100,000,000,000 on its vast military system. It is the most warlike nation at the present time ever seen in the annals of history. To date it had prospered by the sword; but in doing so, it has taken the lives of millions of innocent people and has spread untold misery and suffering throughout the world.

Then said Jesus unto him, Put up again thy sword into his place: for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword.

Just as surely as it is written in the Scriptures, so surely will Hitler fall and the German menace be effectively curbed.

The countries that have been conquered by Germany failed to realize the gravity of the situation before the attack and failed, perhaps, to willingly make the sacrifices necessary as a people to protect themselves against a foe armed to the teeth and without moral restraint. One by one they succumbed to the totalitarian warfare and to defeat. In desperation General Weygand, of the French high command, cried out to his soldiers, "Hold tight to the soil of France."

Although there is cause for alarm in this country, at the same time we have many reasons to rejoice. The critical events of the past year have molded our country into a united people. Again we displayed a wholesome respect and a deep reverence for our traditions and our institutions and our flag, which shows a rejuvenated patriotism. Again, we as a people are beginning to realize that we must not only live within our Nation but must live for our Nation. Again, we feel the quickening urge that a land worth living for is worth fighting for and that this is a nation worthy of all of the toil, the labor, and the sacrifices which we must be called upon to make. When therefore we hear Kate Smith on the radio in the evening every red-blooded American feels a deeper admiration and a greater love for the last great Republic in the entire world, as he hears—

God bless America,
Land that I love,
Stand beside her and guide her
Through the night with a light from above;
From the mountains, to the prairies,
To the oceans white with foam,
God bless America,
My home, sweet home.

And God will bless America. It is a land of peace and happiness and contentment. We want to keep it such.

Universal Empire

OF
HON. BUTLER B. HARE
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 3, 1940

Mr. HARE. Mr. Speaker, when I was a student at college, it was the custom of the institution to require each applicant for graduation, following the completion of the required course of studies, to prepare and deliver a speech at commencement on a subject assigned him by the college faculty. It was my good fortune to meet the usual requirements, the subject assigned me being Universal Empire. In the light of my subsequent training and experience, I would probably make some minor changes in the speech if called upon to discuss the same subject today; but in view of the present situation in Europe and the thought I endeavored to convey at that time, I have asked permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD and include therein the speech I made upon graduation at Newberry College, Newberry, S. C., June 13, 1899:

UNIVERSAL EMPIRE

The love of power—power which gives authority to command one's fellows—is one of the strongest passions of the human soul. This passion, like all other passions, grows by what it feeds upon. A little power begets a longing for more power. Complete control over a few leads to a desire for control over many. Thus it is that rulers are seldom satisfied with the conquest of one nation. There is always just one more to be brought under their power; and when the nearest and strongest have been conquered, then it is they begin to dream of universal empire. Then it is they see the finger of destiny pointing their way and marking them for some greater work. They begin to call themselves benefactors. They speak of missions. Then it is they discover that what they once believed to be selfishness is after all pure and disinterested love for their fellow man. They must be of service to their unfortunate and deluded brothers. There is a great burden of responsibility placed upon them, but they must bear it.

If destiny has pointed her finger at a Roman, it's the Roman burden that must be taken up; if at a Moslem, it's the Moslem burden that must be taken up; if at a Spaniard, it's the Spanish burden that must be taken up; if at a Frenchman, it's the French burden that must be taken up; if at an Englishman, it's the English burden that must be taken up; and if destiny has pointed two fingers, one at England and the other at America, then it's the white man's burden that must be taken up.

These sons of destiny are exceedingly thoughtful and considerate people. They have always been so. In all ages they have reasoned alike and come to the same conclusion. Hear one of them: "I'm the object of destiny. I'm duly impressed with a sense of my great duty to my unhappy brothers. Duty demands that I shall take up their heaviest burden first."

If the unhappy deluded brothers cannot at once understand and appreciate the love and solicitude of their benefactors, if they ask for a little explanation, if they dare object and plead their ability to bear for a little longer at least their own burdens, then the great hearts of their deliverers are so moved with compasion that they resolve from a high sense of duty to take up at least the greatest burden, though the bearer be put beneath the ground. Thus the most brutal conqueror often in the end has been able to plead philanthropic or religious motives as his excuse for countless murders.

I would not have you think that I have particular reference to the little philanthropic job we are now doing some thousands of miles across the Pacific. While it may be that history is repeating itself in this case with some minor factors changed and that our little job is not essentially different from the general type of such work, yet it is not of the present I desire to speak. I prefer to follow in the well-beaten paths—the paths made by my predecessors on other commencement days—paths which suggest other ages and other men.

It grieves me to think that I shall now be forced to say some very uncomplimentary things about two of my best historical friends. Two friends who have come to my rescue in times of doubt, who have given me utterance when my tongue was about to cleave to the roof of my mouth, and who have stood between me and utter confusion and shame. They have been true and useful in other days and I shall not at this time fail to make mention of them. I refer to Mohammed and Napoleon. They shall prove my contention though it be to their own shame.

However, there comes to memory a third name—the name of another true and tried friend—a name that served a good purpose on many another day and many another subject, but a name although unsuited for this day and this subject. O immortal

Washington, illustrious Father of thy Country, how shall I pass thee by on this occasion! I call my professors to witness that this is my first offense of omission. Thou wast neither fool nor genius. Thou wast ever a modest man and contented thyself with being the father of but one country.

We said a moment ago that the most brutal conquerors in their efforts for universal empire had been able to plead philanthropic or religious motives as their excuse for wholesale murder. Mohammed began his career by seeking a little more power than he as a private individual could command. Attaching some half-dozen followers to himself by well-fabricated accounts of visions and revelation which he claimed to have had, he quits the calling of a peaceful trader and turns to that of a bandit. Success in capturing a few small caravans and the cry of persecution bring him other partisans to whom he promises much spoil in this life and immunity in the life to come. This movement from this small beginning in a few years sweeps over the half of two nations. Followers flocked to him by the thousands. He begins to believe his own stories and his disciples believed more and more in him. The people of the desert were fired by religious enthusiasm and love of spoil as no people ever before. The whole of Europe was threatened. A mighty kingdom was founded. Universal empire beckoned the Moslem on. Love for men's souls is the excuse the world is given for the longest and most barbarous struggle that stains the pages of history.

Napoleon was a soldier of fortune and no doubt thought at the beginning of his career that a very small fortune would satisfy him. But his desire for power increased with his success until a morbid passion to rule became the one and only passion of his soul. There was nothing to which he would not stoop to gratify this passion. The love of power became his god and there was nothing too sacred to be sacrificed upon its altar. This deity begot in him a belief in destiny and destiny pointed to universal empire. And yet this brutal despiser of all mankind succeeded in persuading himself that love for the principles of the French Revolution and devotion to the downtrodden millions of the earth inspired him, animated and controlled him in all his rapine.

Now why was it that these and other men failed to attain universal dominion? Success seemed to be within their grasp. There were thousands of their contemporaries who believed in their destiny and were ready to bow down and worship the ruler of all the earth.

Deluded beings. They had not considered the great law of growth, which after all is but the law of necessary and inevitable change. They had forgotten the great distinctions which God has made in races. They did not realize, as many now do not realize, that laws and customs cannot be successfully imposed upon a people from without; that institutions to be beneficial to a people must be the outgrowth of the peculiar life and environment of that people. No, as long as nations persist in producing diversity and not uniformity in races; as long as the axis of the earth remains inclined 23½° to the plane of its orbit making zones of varying temperature; as long as the sentiment of patriotism is kept alive in the human breast and there are men whose hearts are stirred by the love of home and native land; so long will universal empire remain the dream of ambitious genius, the phantom of fools.

On Willkie-Hull Trade Treaties

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WADE H. KITCHENS

OF ARKANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1940

ARTICLE BY WENDELL L. WILLKIE

Mr. KITCHENS. Mr. Speaker, it is gratifying to know that the Republican candidate for President, Hon. Wendell L. Willkie, at one fell swoop brushed aside and annihilated the fictitious and misleading arguments and stubborn opposition of high, Smoot-Hawley tariff standpatters, and approves Cordell Hull's trade-treaty program. In this connection, I incorporate as a part of my remarks a statement of the Republican candidate for President which appeared in the April edition of Fortune magazine:

[From Fortune for April 1940]

WE, THE PEOPLE—A FOUNDATION FOR A POLITICAL PLATFORM FOR RECOVERY

(By Wendell L. Willkie)

FOREIGN POLICY—TRADE

But underlying the immediate issues arising out of the war there is a deeper need. We, the people, want to know where we are being led. We want some reasonable and effective standard by which we can measure our foreign policy, year after year. And this standard, to be realistic, must be harmonious with our domestic policy. Just as it is necessary to put our own house in order on a businesslike basis, so it will be necessary, in the long run, to develop a businesslike foreign policy. The aim of such a policy would be, on the one hand, to protect our interests against the encroachment of others; but, on the other hand, to further our interests, increase our markets, and put our capital to work by helping other countries to make a profit, too. This is a sound business principle. But hitherto it has been obscured in our foreign policy by emotionalism and domestic politics.

Take the problem of the Hull trade agreements, for example. Here again there has been a tendency for the Democrats to huddle in one corner shouting their enthusiasm, and the Republicans to huddle in another, prophesying calamity. We, the people, had better confer by ourselves.

One of the things that made this country great was the fact that it represented the greatest free-trade area in the world. Its citizens have been able to ship their products for several thousand miles, up and down and crosswise, without trade restrictions or tariff barriers. If Europe had been like this, the history of the world would make pleasanter reading. Of course, in view of the discrepancy in standards of living, this sort of free trade cannot be world-wide. Yet the importance of trade to us is incalculable. Before the depression our foreign trade totaled in the neighborhood of $9,000,000,000 a year; at the bottom of the depression it had shrunk to $3,000,000,000 a year. We thus lost a $6,000,000,000 business, and rather more than half of it represented a decline in our exports. Obviously, if we could get that market back today it would mean a lot to the man who is looking for a job, or the farmer who is looking for a buyer. But, while our foreign trade has recovered to about $5,000,000,000, further recovery is closed because all the great trading nations of the world, including our own, have set up tariff walls to keep out each other's products.

Now, obviously, it will not do for one great nation to become a free-trade country by itself. For the United States to erase its tariffs all at once would be ruinous to our people and many of our industries. The present Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, who is wise and temperate, realizes this. And so he adopted the reciprocal-trade agreements as a step toward increasing our foreign business gradually. Under this policy the United States takes up the problem of tariffs with each country separately, lists the products that it would like to export, studies a similar list submitted by the other country, and then a deal is arranged, each country making such concessions as it can with the least possible harm and the most possible benefit to its own people. This agreement is then extended to apply to other countries too. What could be simpler or more in accord with common sense? What could be better qualified to benefit us, the people, as a whole? Of course, we have to make sacrifices. But the point is that, owing to the way the agreements are negotiated, the sacrifices are always, and should always be, less than the benefits gained. That is, we, the people, profit.

We do not put much faith in the figures cited by the Republicans to show how damaging these Hull agreements have been, or in the figures cited by the Democrats to show how profitable they have been. It may be years before conclusive results can be shown. But it is inconceivable to us that prosperity can be reestablished without any foreign trade. And it seems clear that if we are to have foreign trade it must be done on a reciprocal basis. We, the most successful people in the world at business and industry, know that there are two parties to every trade, and that one cannot always profit at the expense of the other. It is of vital importance to us that the other party profit too.

America Must Marshal All Its Forces for the Testing Time

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JENNINGS RANDOLPH

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1940

Mr. RANDOLPH. Mr. Speaker, on the eve of another Fourth of July observance, I desire to place in the RECORD a few sentences from a most challenging and thought-provoking article which appeared in the New York Times magazine section of Sunday, June 30. There is much truth in the writing of James B. Reston, who wirelessed the story from London. He graphically tells of the break-down of the democracies in Europe, and gives reasons which are becoming apparent to those who read and look behind the mere recital of war dispatches. All of the material is worth reprinting, but I shall use only the final thoughts, as follows:

If the history of this appalling tragedy teaches us anything, it teaches us that we in the United States, who ourselves have been following the paths of least resistance in internal and international affairs for years, must face up to the responsibilities of defending the Nation, without illusion and regardless of personal sacrifice.

We must all learn the lessons of these last 7 years. Our generals now see that the old theory of a defensive position in warfare is as obsolete as the bow and arrow. Our admirals must recognize, as most of them now do, that without equality in the air sea power is crippled. Our air officers must admit, as the Germans have proved, that the air arm is now most effective under command of those who are directing the land forces. Our manufacturers, labor, and political leaders must now see the necessity for patching up their squabbles and getting down to work. And the people of the United States—every man and woman—must remember that war is no more than a simple test of strength, that a nation is no stronger than the collective will power of its people.

America's Destiny

OF

HON. EVERETT M. DIRKSEN

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1940

ADDRESS OF PHILIP D. REED

Mr. DIRKSEN. Mr. Speaker, recently there convened in the Nation's Capital several thousand young businessmen representing the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce. They assembled here in annual convention to take thought of the pressing problems of the day and to seek information. Many notable addresses were delivered to this group, including that of Mr. Philip D. Reed, chairman of the board of the General Electric Co. It is a vital message and deserving of careful study and for that reason I am asking the consent of the House for its inclusion in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

I am told that the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce comprises approximately 100,000 young business and professional men between the ages of 21 and 35, and that you come from every State in the Union as well as Hawaii and Alaska. May I say that the very existence of the Junior Chamber as an active, vital agency for the exchange of views and the development of leadership is a most heartening and reassuring thing in these dark days.

I venture to say that every one of you in this room feels deeply and personally the responsibility, shared today with older men, but which in the course of a few short years will be transferred almost wholly to your generation—the responsibility of guiding, directing, and administering the destiny of the United States of America. What that task will comprise, what new conditions will then exist, no one can accurately foretell. But it requires no clairvoyance to see that the next 5 years will in all likelihood be the most vitally important ones in the history of our Nation. The things to be done during that period, the legislation to be adopted, the leadership to be developed, the reaction and response of the American people to the events which lie ahead in the struggle between dictatorship and democracy will in my judgment irrevocably fashion the pattern of life to which we younger men, our children and our children's children will of necessity conform.

The interests, therefore, of the generation you represent are greater in terms of the years ahead than those of any other part of our adult population. It follows that your generation must not only make its influence felt during these formative years, but that it must base its judgments and its action upon a real understanding of the issues, the trends, and the problems with which we as a nation are confronted.

Today we are in the first throes of organizing an enormous program of national defense. No one, I think, will doubt this country's need of greatly enlarged military, naval, and air defenses. To accomplish this herculean task quickly, efficiently, and well, there must be the closest kind of cooperation and team work between Government, industrial management, and labor. It is inconceivable that there should be a lack of it from any quarter, for the ultimate purpose and objective of this program is the preservation of our homes, our institutions, and our way of life. Patience and understanding will be needed. Delays and disappointments will occur. Sacrifices and concessions will be required. But as Americans all—and always—with the vitality and resourcefulness and organizational ability that have enabled us to create the greatest and most efficient production machine in history, we will do this job and we will do it well.

One month from now our two great political parties will have selected their candidates for high office and the campaigns will be getting under way. The responsibility that falls upon the delegates charged with the duty of selecting the Presidential and Vice Presidential candidates in this period of world crisis is exceeded only by that which must rest upon the shoulders of the men selected.

The great issues today are not those we are accustomed to associate with party politics. They are cosmic questions, affecting on the one hand our relationships and ability to live with the other peoples of the world, and on the other hand the review and redetermination of our own doctrines of self-government. As normal human beings we all want to find the right answer to these vitally important questions. There can be no doubt of the sincerity and loyalty of our political, industrial, and labor leaders, but they and all of us must recognize before it is too late that the problems before us are far larger than the individual interests of any party, section, or group.

Large portions of the world's population have in recent years surrendered democratic freedom for dictatorship. The state has replaced the individual. These changes abroad have evidenced themselves in this country in many small ways. Each step is comparatively insignificant when taken by itself, but in the aggregate they constitute a definite and unmistakable trend toward centralization and enlargement of government powers and toward government by men rather than by laws.

We have been through 10 years of serious economic disorder. During that period we have made progress in certain directions, but none at all in others. For example, no one can question the fact that very real social progress has been made. The value and desirability of these accomplishments from the social standpoint are self-evident. Nor would any of us wish to see them lost, if we as a Nation can support and justify their continuation. The difficulty is that social legislation almost invariably costs money, large sums of money, and can be supported only if the economic condition of the country is healthy and prosperous. We all agree, I am sure, that American citizens should not be permitted to starve, that "made" work is better than the dole, that old-age and unemployment insurance and guaranteed bank deposits are fine and worthy things, that maximum hours and minimum wages are all to the good in sweatshop industries, that reclamation and rehabilitation of the soil is essential for the future of America, that slum clearance and low-cost housing are much to be desired. But I repeat that these enactments cost money, billions in the aggregate, and they can be supported through the years only if our economic system is sound and successful.

The fact is, however, that the economic record of the past decade is just as disappointing as the social record is gratifying. In a recent editorial Fortune magazine points out that our national income is back to 1919, our unemployment problem completely unsolved, our national debt up nineteen billions (now amounting to $1,250 per family), and that, comparing the period 1933–39 with 1923–29, the only significant increases among 22 basic economic measurements were in population, strikes, strikers, Federal taxes, Federal expenditures, and national debt. All the other items show a decline varying from 9 percent to 84 percent, and include manufacturing employment, industrial production, wholesale prices, factory pay rolls, national income, new construction, and corporate financing.

We must, I submit, place more emphasis on economic recovery, lest, failing to achieve it, we are forced to abandon—as we surely would be—the social advances of the last decade. For government cannot create wealth. All it can do is redistribute existing wealth. A great deal of new wealth must be created to support our social program, and this can be done only by increasing output—the production of useful goods. To reach this goal we must move forward on the economic front.

Oliver Wendell Holmes once said:

"The longing for certainty and repose is in every human mind. But certainty is generally illusion and repose is not the destiny of man."

I do not know the circumstances which prompted Holmes to make that statement, but if it was true then, how deeply, how desperately, true it is today. Certainty—that is to say, assured security—is generally illusion, and repose—that is to say, escape from hard work—is not the destiny of man. That quotation, gentlemen, is heavy with truth. May we all heed and profit by it.

The question of what is wrong with America's economic system, what has caused the long-continued apathy in our industrial and financial mechanisms, has produced a long list of conflicting explanations and as many suggestions, equally conflicting, for the correction of the difficulty. Stemming from totally different concepts of the cause of our lagging activity, the proposed corrective measures are not only diverse and inconsistent, but certain of them would alter fundamentally our traditional view of government and its functions and the jealously guarded freedom of action which American citizens have so long enjoyed.

This brings us face to face with a serious problem—a problem that is real, because it goes to the roots of our system of constitutional democracy, a problem that cannot be ignored. Let us examine ourselves as adult Americans. Are we good judges, competent critics, and intelligent readers of our country's history? Are we well enough grounded in political economy to judge what is good for our future, and what is bad? Do we understand the fundamentals of the American system under which we have grown up? Lacking that knowledge of fundamentals, how can we distinguish between proposals which are consistent with the pattern of that system and those which would impair and destroy it? Can we fashion for ourselves some kind of simple projector by which the trends and tendencies of the day can be clearly viewed and contrasted with the doctrines upon which this Nation was founded? These questions, gentlemen, are far easier to ask than to answer.

We are told that the average American has received no more than a seventh-grade schooling. It is clear, therefore, that the ordinary citizen cannot be expected to understand and pass intelligent judgment upon the complex questions which are ever before us in business, banking, agriculture, government, and many other fields. But it is he, nevertheless, who will determine whether and to what extent America will continue to live by the principles so firmly established by our forefathers. What can we do to keep these simple and fundamental doctrines ever before us?

No one knows better than I the difficulty of keeping even reasonably well-informed on the major problems of the day and the hours of reading and study it takes to satisfy not a New England but merely a midwestern conscience that one's views and pronouncements on current questions are not simply parroted from his favorite columnist but are bottomed by thoughtful analysis and honest conviction. And because our Government is and must be active in so many fields, and because the legislative and administrative questions before it are so diverse and numerous, it is most difficult to preserve perspective, to see the forest despite the trees, and to maintain an objective and consistent viewpoint. The task of thinking simply, unemotionally, and directly has perhaps never been more difficult and surely never more urgently needed than in this forty-first year of the twentieth century.

Formula for thinking, like rules for making friends and influencing people, must be open to the charge of oversimplification and must prove to some extent ineffectual. Nevertheless, in this disturbed and complex day in which we live, when in foreign lands cutlaws and iconoclasts seem successfully to be defying the validity of the virtues we have always embraced, when character and integrity appear almost to inhibit rather than to help one's cause, it may not be unprofitable for each of us to sit down quietly and restate to ourselves as simply and briefly as we can the fundamental principles which made, and if we hold firmly to them, which will preserve, our American way of life.

Were we each to do this, the enumerations would doubtless differ, both in number of items and in the order of importance of the common ones. The central core, however, would surely be the same. If from that core we could formulate a simple one-page statement, a primer if you like, of the doctrines of American self-government, and if we could spread that statement far and wide across the land for every American to read and live by, the present trends toward government by men rather than by laws, toward enlargement and centralization of government functions and toward government by small but articulate pressure groups, would be arrested in their tracks.

And were I asked to set down in brief and simple fashion the items I would include in a primer of American self-government, they would be these seven:

Our American Constitution is of inestimable value. In clear language it safeguards the fundamental rights of the individual. It limits the powers of government to those expressly and by clear implication granted to it. Because amendment is difficult and time consuming, it stands as a bulwark against hurried, ill-considered, or emotional change. The first item of my primer of American self-government is, therefore:

1. Understand, honor, and preserve the Constitution of the United States.

American government, whether national, State, or local, comprises three branches, which in order to prevent concentration of power must always be kept separate and distinct. They are the legislative branch, whose duty it is to enact all laws subject only to the principles and limitations laid down by the Constitution; the executive branch, whose duty it is to administer, but never to make, the laws of the land and to operate all government services; and the judicial branch, whose duty it is to interpret the laws made by the legislature, to decide whether they conform to the Constitution, and whether acts or omissions of the people or the other departments of government are in accordance with the law. The second item of my primer is, therefore:

2. Keep forever separate and distinct the legislative, executive, and judicial functions of government.

Government is created by and belongs to the people. It has no rights or powers except as the people grant them. The cost of government must be paid for by the people through taxation, and the tendency is for government to grow and become increasingly costly. Because government is not like private business, in which competition and the profit motive provide a tremendous incentive to careful planning and efficient operation, government is inherently less efficient than private business. Therefore it should be permitted to do only those things which government alone can properly do and which are necessary for the welfare of the people. Thus the third item of my primer becomes:

3. Remember that government belongs to the people, is inherently inefficient, and that its activities should be limited to those which government alone can perform.

Of the many rights and guarantees which Americans enjoy under the Federal and State constitutions, perhaps the most important are freedom of speech, freedom of worship according to one's own conscience, and freedom of decision and action in such matters as where to live, what kind of work to engage in, whom to work for, and at what pay. This freedom of action, coupled with the right of the American citizen to have and to hold the fruits of his labor and to save or dispose of them as he wishes, is called the enterprise system, and it provides opportunity and incentive to improve one's position in life. Our fourth item, accordingly, is:

4. Be vigilant for freedom of speech, freedom of worship, and freedom of action.

The enterprise system under which thousands of private businesses and millions of men and women are constantly searching for new, better, and more useful products and services, and for ways to improve and lower the cost of existing ones, has produced a standard of living in this country higher than any which the world has ever known. The enterprise system cannot function successfully without incentive to improve, expand, and to create new enterprises. Accordingly, if the profits of business are taxed inordinately, or if restraints and limitations are imposed which deprive the managers of reasonable freedom of action, or if Government competes or threatens to compete with private business, the enterprise system will languish. These things should therefore be avoided; and if they are, the inherent incentives of the system will cause business to expand, to create new enterprises, and profitably to produce ever better, ever cheaper goods for more people to buy. Along this road lies progress and the only permanent solution of our unemployment problem. The fifth item is therefore:

5. Cherish the system of free enterprise which made America great.

Thrift and economy are still the great virtues they were in our grandmothers' time. Debt burdens the future, and too much of it impairs one's credit. Borrowing, therefore, should be resorted to only in periods of real emergency. These principles apply equally to Government and to private citizens. The difficulty is that Government can borrow more readily than the citizen, and having borrowed for the benefit of one group, it is very difficult not to do so for other organized groups. Our national debt has risen enormously in the past 10 years despite substantial increases in taxation. All this money must some day be repaid out of future taxes. Our immediate problem is to stop piling up more debt. This is not easy; indeed, for the moment it is impossible. The safeguard we must seek is widespread understanding of the problem, plus realistic and courageous leadership. Briefly stated, our sixth item becomes—

6. Respect thrift and economy and beware of debt.

Integrity of contract and respect for the rights of others are foundation stones of civilization. They have been all but destroyed in many quarters of the world, and until they are restored barbarism will stalk the earth. Let us keep the candle of integrity burning brightly in America. If we do so, we shall one day use it to rekindle the flame of mutual trust, fair dealing, and respect for others in a suffering and chastened world. The seventh and last item of our primer is therefore:

7. Above all, let us be scrupulous in keeping our word and in respecting the rights of others.

This, then, is one primer of American self-government. If each of you would write your own, I am sure I would be satisfied to accept them. For it seems to me that the principles are so simple, so clear, that having thought them through we may say of them in the language of our forefathers, "These truths we hold to be self-evident."

But thinking on these subjects, and particularly thinking through on them, is not sufficiently widespread. Is it not our task as Americans to encourage and stimulate such thinking in every way at our command? For if our educators, our business and professional men, our churchmen, and our farmers, our trade and civic organizations would write their primers of American self-government and tell the story on a national scale through the press, the radio, the pulpit, the classroom, and the public forum, how could we fail to reinculcate in the minds of our 130,000,000 home-loving citizens the rules for living the American way?

And now in closing let me say that I have deliberately avoided anything but passing reference to the wars abroad. Tragic and disastrous as they are for those involved and for ourselves, and essential as it is for us to view them realistically and to prepare for bitter times ahead, let us emphatically remember that these wars may obscure but they cannot and will not cure our domestic ills. Indeed, if on a peacetime basis we view dangerous tendencies toward the extension and concentration of government, toward the creation of too powerful bureaucracies and toward unparalleled enlargement of our national debt, is it not clear that the preparation for or actual engagement in war must speed and aggravate these tendencies? Let us, therefore, keep our vision unclouded by emotionalism, and let us recognize that conditions beyond our borders make ever more compelling the need for understanding, for teaching, and for living our primer of American self-government.

Resignation of Secretary Woodring

OF

HON. THOMAS E. MARTIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1940

Mr. MARTIN of IOWA. Mr. Speaker, it is fitting at this time to express on the floor of the House my appreciation and admiration of the outstanding service rendered by Hon. Harry H. Woodring as Secretary of War, especially in the field of personnel legislation. I will confine my remarks mostly to that field because that is the field in which I have had the privilege to work with him most during my term in the Seventy-sixth Congress.

Mr. Woodring demonstrated time after time a keen understanding and appreciation of the vital importance of morale in the Army. He made it his business to make thorough and careful study of the many and complicated and complex problems affecting the Army personnel.

The splendid cooperation he gave the Committee on Military Affairs throughout our study and consideration of the Army promotion bill in this Congress helped very materially to accomplish a fundamental improvement in personnel legislation of permanent character and far-reaching importance. Truly it can be said the Army and the Nation have benefited much by his valuable service. In his resignation the Army and Nation have lost one of the most able and progressive Secretaries of War.

I prepared the foregoing statement immediately following Mr. Woodring's resignation and from that day to this I have been waiting with great expectancy the revelation of the true reason for his resignation. The following associated press article appeared in the Washington Post for Friday, June 21:

FORCED OUT FOR TRYING TO SAVE DEFENSES, WOODRING IS QUOTED

TOPEKA, KANS., June 20.—The Capital said tonight that Harry H. Woodring told friends in Topeka three weeks ago a "small clique of international financiers" was seeking to force him out as Secretary of War because he opposed "stripping our defenses to aid the Allies."

The Cabinet officer, who resigned suddenly today to make way for President Roosevelt's appointment of Henry L. Stimson, a Republican, made his assertion June 1 after his arrival to receive an honorary degree from Washburn College, the paper said.

It added that Woodring asked that the statement not be published until after his resignation.

"I'm an advocate of adequate defense but I will never stand for sending American boys into Europe's shambles," the former Kansas Governor was quoted. "There is a comparatively small clique of international financiers who want the United States to declare war and get into the European mess with everything we have, including our manpower.

"I'm not going to stand for it and I'm not going to resign until forced to do so.

"They don't like me because I'm against stripping our own defenses for the sake of trying to stop Hitler 3,000 miles away. Eventually they will force me to resign, and I'll be darned glad to come back to Kansas where the people have their feet on the ground and are not easily swayed by demagogues and subtle propaganda."

(The White House yesterday declined to make public Woodring's letter of resignation, declaring it was "too personal.")

Another Associated Press article appeared in the Washington Evening Star last night, as follows:

WOODRING EXPECTED TO REVEAL STORY OF HIS RESIGNATION

KANSAS CITY, July 2.—The Star in a special dispatch from Topeka said today Harry Woodring was considering open discussion next week of events which led to his resignation as Secretary of War.

The former Governor, who returned to Topeka last night, will be guest of honor at a banquet there July 9. The Star quoted him as saying there was a definite likelihood he would discuss his position on affairs and his Cabinet resignation at that time.

If the reason for Secretary Woodring's resignation is based upon his opposition to "stripping our defenses to aid the Allies" I will very gladly commend him for his service in that respect in addition to my foregoing commendation for his keen and sympathetic understanding of the problems of personnel legislation and the effect of such legislation on the morale of our Army.

I only hope that the Senate Committee on Military Affairs will continue their investigation of this most important matter until they have clarified the entire situation leading to Mr. Woodring's resignation. I believe it is of the utmost importance to our entire Nation to discover and to publish the causes for Mr. Woodring's resignation to enable us all to see clearly the path we are traveling in national defense and our international relations bearing thereon. These are exceedingly dangerous times and the developments regarding the shift in the Cabinet in this field call for far more than ordinary study and consideration by all of us.

Let us hope that the Senate Committee on Military Affairs will supply us with the facts and if they fail to do so, let us hope that President Roosevelt and Mr. Woodring will see the importance of publishing the full facts of the case to the end that the American public will be fully and correctly informed on affairs of such moment.

Status and Plans for Completion of the Inventories of the Historical Records Survey

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. USHER L. BURDICK

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1940

ADDRESS BY SARGENT B. CHILD

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include the following extracts from an address made by Sargent B. Child, Director, the Historical Records Survey, Division of Professional and Service Projects, Work Projects Administration:

Nationally, the Historical Records Survey projects no longer operate as one of the Federal arts projects but as a unit within the research and records section of W. P. A., headed by Mr. Harvey E. Becknell, which, in turn, is a part of the Professional and Service Division, which is under the administration of Mrs. Florence Kerr. Since the major part of our work is in the field of public records, this change has resulted in a much closer integration of our work with the general research activities being carried on by the Work Projects Administration. The research and records section technically directs many research projects in the fields of public administration and political science. The procedures developed in relation to these projects have been of great practical use in planning Historical Records Survey projects. Conversely, the resources of the archives of State and local governments have been made usable by the Survey for the other research activities. Further, the actual use of our inventories by the other projects has brought forth valuable suggestions for improving the quality of the information contained in them.

The emphasis of the Survey program in 45 States has continued to be on county archives, and in New England we have continued to emphasize the town archives. In many projects it has been difficult to enlarge or to make permanent our editorial personnel due to the operation of the 18-month ruling in the present law, which requires that each certified person be severed from W. P. A. pay roll after he or she has worked 18 months. Many editors later return to their old desks, but many do not, and, therefore, it has been necessary to continue to train new editors. We are establishing subeditorial offices in some States to compile preliminary editorial drafts of inventories. While we have widened the editorial bottle neck in many States, we have not completely solved the problem. However, we have gone a long way in what we consider to be the right direction. In spite of this, the field work has crept ahead of the editorial work in many States, not only in the listing of town and county archives but also in the listing of State and municipal archives. Publications of State archives have appeared in three States during the past year, and we expect that by September 1 of this year that 7 more State projects will be represented by publications in this field. Three States have issued inventories and municipal archives, and it seems quite clear that at least a dozen additional State projects will have issued inventories of municipal archives by September 1, 1940. To those who have advised us to complete the inventories of county and town archives before the inventories of municipal and State archives are undertaken, we must answer quite frankly that we do not intend to lessen the emphasis of county and town archives. We must defer, however, to the wishes of the 51 sponsors and the thousand-and-one cosponsors, who donate large sums to cover publication costs as well as other nonlabor costs, when they ask us to issue inventories of State and municipal records.

I know that a number of you are interested in learning something about the quality and the quantity of the inventories and guides which have already been issued. I shall not attempt to take your time by giving you a long list of those who have endorsed the publications of the Historical Records Survey, nor to give you a large number of cold statistics to indicate exactly how many offices have been inventoried, in how many counties by how many workers, who have consumed so many man-hours. I do think, however, that

A few statements of fairly recent date may not be out of place here. Let us start with the Survey of Federal Archives. The work published by this section has been welcomed by librarians, Federal officials, and others. Mr. James A. McMillen, librarian of the Louisiana State University, recently wrote: "I am very much pleased with the character of the work done by the Survey of Federal Archives, as is demonstrated by the volumes delivered to us. We were especially interested in securing copies of translations of the records of the Spanish Governors of West Florida, because of the great local demand for these records. Judging from the copies of the first 10 volumes which were delivered to us, the translating and editing have been entrusted to people capable of doing a scholarly and reliable job. This is quite reassuring and confirms our belief that Louisiana State University, in sponsoring this project, was performing a useful service to both Louisiana and the world of scholarship." After receiving the California judiciary section of the Inventory of Federal Archives, the clerk of the United States district court at San Francisco stated: "I have read the book from cover to cover and find it well arranged and the information it contains will be very helpful. Your office should be highly commended for compiling and publishing this book."

This series of inventories which contain the records of the various Federal agencies, in the 48 States, is well on toward completion. The project has been completed and closed in Missouri, and it is rapidly approaching completion, including the publication of the product, in 10 additional States. In another year's time practically all the regular inventories will have been completed. Two hundred and ninety volumes have already been issued for the Survey of Federal Archives, and approximately 95 additional volumes have been approved for publication, many of which are now being mimeographed.

The registers of ships which have been maintained in the customs ports since 1789 contain valuable sources of information for the history of shipping and commerce. In addition, the information concerning owners' names, occupation, and residence provides data which is much sought after for purposes of genealogical research. They also contain information regarding the physical details of ship construction which is valuable to model builders and persons interested in ship design.

The large demand from various sources for the data contained in the registers is the basis for a project which is under the supervision of the Survey of Federal Archives section. The aim of this project is to publish a volume or series of volumes for each port, giving the information contained in the registers in a uniform form from 1789 to date. The volume for Plymouth, Mass., has already been published; those for other New England ports will follow.

Another reason for operating this project is the fact that none of the older ports has complete series of ship registers. This is due to the fact that many volumes were crated and sent to Washington in 1880 in order to establish claims arising out of the French spoliations of the Napoleonic period. The latter are now located in The National Archives. The value of this work may be indicated by quoting from a recent letter by Mr. J. W. McElroy, deputy archivist for New England: "Mr. Samuel Eliot Morison, who had been asked by the New England Quarterly to review the Essex Institute's recent Ship Registers of Newburyport, recalled that this project was carrying on similar activities, and by telephone requested copies of all ship registers thus far produced by the project, so that he might compare the two. He told me later that he had found that the work of The National Archives W. P. A. project compared favorably with that of the Essex Institute, in accuracy and clarity, and in general appeared to be a very scholarly piece of work."

Let us review the county and town archives section. Inventories of the archives of over 350 counties have been issued and another 75 have been approved for publication. In a recent letter to Lieutenant Colonel Mathews, State administrator of Work Projects Administration in Pennsylvania, Mr. J. P. Breedlove, librarian emeritus of Duke University library, wrote: "The inventories of county archives of the several States have been coming to the Duke University library quite frequently this year. We are glad to have these inventories, for they are a very valuable aid to graduate students, members of the faculty, and others who are studying county history and government, and who are writing on this subject. These inventories will be used quite a good deal in all the university libraries in the country in the next few years." A letter from Mr. F. F. Holbrook, director of Historical Society of West Pennsylvania, states: "I have had some experience in inventorying county archives, and the present offering (inventory of the Wayne County archives) seems to me to have all the earmarks of a most competent and thoroughgoing job. As * * * a supporter of the Government's enlightened policies in this direction, I welcome this and other previous offerings of yours as contributions to our cultural advancement." The Governor of the State of Oregon, Mr. Charles A. Sprague, in a letter to Mr. E. J. Griffith, State Work Projects administrator, wrote: "I want to acknowledge receipt of the inventory of the county archives of Josephine County. I can see where this may be of value for reference purposes. I notice that 'Dog licenses' follow 'Dance permits' and 'Dance permits' follow 'Authority to solemnize marriage.' I suppose that is a proper sequence. At any rate, young married folks today seem to want to dance and own dogs, so Josephine County is set up just right." Another letter, from Miss Margaret C. Norton, superintendent of the division of archives of the Illinois State Library, states: "Our experience in Illinois has been that the archives survey has done a great deal to interest people in the preservation of records and that it has particularly been popular with the State officials, whose records have been inventoried. It would have been almost impossible for us to have moved into our new State archives building and to have inventoried, unfolded, and otherwise prepared for use the records which came into the building without the assistance of survey workers. We are very enthused over the work as done in Illinois."

The inventories of 50 towns and cities in New England have appeared and another 25 have been approved for publication. Two key volumes on town offices to which I have referred earlier are being mimeographed at the present time in New England. The Massachusetts volume will contain 250 town offices.

I have already commented upon the fact that there has been little publication up to the present time in the field of State archives and municipal archives. We expect to have a rather heavy production in both of these fields due to circumstances which I have mentioned earlier. With reference to the guides and inventories of manuscript materials and the check lists of American imprints, I am glad that I can defer to Mrs. Eliot and Mr. McMurtrie to give you a more complete report than time permits me to give here. I do wish to point out, however, that we are greatly concerned with the problem of how to meet the demand which is increasing both in insistence and in volume for the publications in these two divisions of the Survey.

More progress has been made this year than in any past year with the publication of the inventories of church archives. This is due to the fact that more labor has been available. When the archives of the counties have been inventoried and rechecked, the majority of the workers in most States undertake the listing of church archives. In order to speed up production of the volumes of this series, we are permitting inventories of the various denominational archives to be issued by dioceses, by synod, by association, and occasionally by city, instead of waiting until all of the archives of a particular denomination have been listed in a State. While only 30 volumes have appeared thus far, an equal number have been approved and are being mimeographed. I think it is fair to estimate that more than 1,000 workers have been engaged in inventorying church archives. They have collected data on more than 90,000 churches during the past 4 years.

In the field of American portraits we have added no publications to the 2 volumes which were noted last year covering 2,700 portraits in Massachusetts. However, where the listing of portraits does not interfere with the regular program of the other divisions of the Survey, workers are now busy in all of the New England States. Check lists of portraits for New York, Pennsylvania, and South Carolina are also being compiled. The New Jersey project will begin work in this field before July 1, 1940.

I am glad to report that the compilation of the Messages and the Papers of the Presidents, 1898–1938, has been completed by the Columbia University unit of the New York City survey. This important series of volumes will be published in the near future. An index to the Executive orders has also been completed by the same unit of the New York City project and will be published before October of this year. You have been interested in the compilation of an annotated bibliography of American history which has been carried on during the last 4 years. This tremendous compilation of 29,000 annotated titles is within 2 percent of being completed. In the near future it is expected to break down the files of this material into several hundred subject fields and send each to a specialist for review. While this review is being made, all titles and annotations will be rechecked. It is expected that the bibliography will begin to go to press by the end of the calendar year. A bibliography of American musical activity has also been completed by the Survey in the District of Columbia and will be issued by July 15, 1940.

Now, let us look a few moments to the future. I have already stated that I believe, now that the transition from the Federal project to a series of State-wide projects has been made safely, that the Historical Records Survey is stronger today than it was a year ago. I do not base this statement merely upon my own observations, and those of the regional supervisors nor upon the reports sent to us by the State supervisors. I think it is rather obvious to anyone who realizes the magnitude of the support which has come from the State librarians, the State archivists, the secretaries of state, and even the Governors themselves, cannot help but acknowledge that the Survey has grown in influence, in usefulness, and in its public service. Less time is devoted today by the State supervisors and their field assistants in obtaining the permission of public officials to inventory their records. In fact, the State supervisors in some States have to decide the priority of granting the requests made by numerous public officials that an inventory be made of the archives under their jurisdiction. These decisions must be made under the present circumstances on a basis of which town, county, or department of a State government can pay for the publication of the inventory, instead of upon the value or importance of one county over another or one State department over another. Everything else being equal, the supervisor will choose, of course, the more important from a historical or governmental point of view.

In terms of manpower the Survey has also gained strength. The policy of the Work Projects Administration, working in the interest of economy, is to encourage more large State-wide projects and fewer local projects which employ relatively few people. We have absorbed a number of local projects, and it is estimated that approximately 10,000 persons are now engaged in some phase of the work of the Historical Records Survey and its allied projects. The present employment, therefore, exceeds any peak of employment which the survey has had in the past.

It is inevitable that with the passage of another year a larger number of persons have learned about the purposes, the activities, and the publications of the Survey. Nor are these persons merely interested individuals; many of them represent libraries and historical or educational institutions, and they usually request that they be placed on the mailing list to receive copies of our publications. If the person is a college librarian, he frequently quotes the opinions of several members of the faculty and gives the number of students which the library serves; if it is a librarian of a great city library, his letter is likely to contain statistics which lead us to believe that the needs of thousands of literate citizens cannot be covered; and if it is the custodian or curator of a historical society, we are made aware of the unusual holdings in American history of that institution and of the fact that this is another depository which must be placed on our mailing list. The problem of furnishing additional libraries and institutions, which are not now on the mailing list, with copies of our guides, check lists, and inventories, is one that is most baffling to us. We have not yet found a way to solve it. We think it is probable that we will be able to establish a few additional regional depositories for the inventories published in the neighboring States. It seems utterly unfair to us, nevertheless, to ask local officials of a county, which is already struggling with its budget, to contribute money to publish an inventory, a great majority of copies of which are to be distributed in other counties and in other States. It is becoming more and more difficult to expect the officials in financially poor but historically rich counties to become enthusiastic about publishing 250 copies of an inventory of their records, many copies of which are to go to the Boston Public Library, the Hall of Records in Annapolis, the State Library in Florida, the University of South Dakota, the Princeton University Library, the Historical Society of Wisconsin, or the University of Oregon, to mention but a few of the Nation-wide depositories. We are equally troubled in asking boards of trustees of historical societies for funds to publish their holdings for Nation-wide distribution. Since we confess that we ourselves have not been able to find a solution to this increasingly pressing problem, we invite you in all sincerity to suggest ways and means which may lead to a solution.

It is most encouraging to us to learn that students in increasing numbers in post-graduate schools are using the inventories prepared and edited by those who have been for the time being at least unemployed. This is a relatively new note in American education. We hope that the Survey may continue to serve these students by continuing to keep the libraries of the universities which they are attending on the mailing list. We are impressed by letters from librarians of denominational libraries asking for inventories of the archives of other denominations. We like to see this evidence of mutual interest and respect between the various religious bodies in this country, but we have not yet learned how to meet their needs.

Recently we have discovered that by reprinting the historical sketch and the governmental organization essay of the county and town inventories, county and town boards of education will contribute enough money for these reprints to permit an adequate supply to be published for the schools and also to permit the purchase of a sufficient amount of paper on which the complete inventories may be mimeographed. In a growing number of States we are discovering that the local governing bodies wish to print the inventories. This occurs, however, only in the more prosperous sections of the country. We cannot expect now or in the future, however, that inventories of valuable public records or of manuscript material or of church archives can be printed in the less prosperous communities.

I say, in summary, to those of you who are receiving copies of the Survey publications, I hope you may continue to receive them. If you do remain on the mailing list you will receive the publications in increasing numbers. To those of you who may desire to have copies of these volumes sent to the institutions which you represent, I say that I hope your requests may be granted but first we must cooperate in an effort to find a solution to the publication problem.

In looking toward the future, you may wonder what else the Survey may undertake besides increasing the rate of publication of the State and municipal archives inventories as well as those for the Federal agencies in the States, the counties, and the towns. The cautious expansion of the survey of American portraits has already been mentioned. I cannot emphasize too greatly the policy we must follow of not undertaking new tasks which will modify our present speed-up program. In States which have both manpower and materials, we are starting work on records created by or relating to the American Negro. These inventories will follow the present patterns established in the manuscript, and church records departments. Indexes to source material in the public records inventories relating to the American Negro will also be created.

We are also studying the possibilities of compiling special inventories which will be guides to all sources of vital statistics in the public records and church records in the Nation. While this appears to be a tremendous undertaking, it may prove to be relatively simple. There is a growing demand in Federal and State agencies, not to mention private agencies such as insurance companies, to find out just what data exists in each State and in each county relating to birth, marriages, and deaths. To make this data available, we have simply to lift the vital statistics entries from the inventories already published and add to them similar entries from our files which contain many times the amount already published. While the resulting compilation would not be complete, it would be most useful and 6 or 8 months after a vital statistics inventory for a State had been issued, a supplementary volume could be issued based upon material located subsequently to that which now has been compiled.

Another task which is being studied has to do with the microfilming of newspapers, particularly those files which have been published since the beginning of the pulp era of American journalism. I do not think it necessary for me to tell you of the storage problem which confronts librarians with reference to newspaper holdings. It would be ideal to microfilm all complete files of newspapers of historical or social value. But since this task is too large and too expensive to be undertaken even by a large army such as the Historical Records Survey, it might not be unwise to discuss at least the possibility covering certain very valuable newspapers from 1865 to 1910. These newspapers not only take up very valuable space but they are disintegrating at a rate that startles researchers in many fields of scholarship. Making indexes to newspapers which fall apart when handled is scarcely an activity which we can intelligently endorse. If this source material can be preserved on film and then indexed, we feel we would be doing a great service. The present stumbling block is the cost of the film and equipment; a problem with which most of you are quite familiar. One sometimes is astonished, however, upon realizing the comparative costs of microfilming versus the cost of storage of these tons of newspapers over a period of years. For a sponsor or a group of sponsors, however, the labor costs for undertaking such a piece of work are practically nil.

Democracy and Defense

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. EMANUEL CELLER, OF NEW YORK

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include my address over station WEVD on June 28, 1940, as follows:

Democracy, among other things, is a government in which minorities and majorities have equal rights—free speech, freedom of religion, freedom of press—the right to order their lives in their own way. The touchstone of democracy is that the individual himself has dignity and knows that he has worth and cannot be ordered around or carried in the vest pocket of a vile dictator like Hitler or a despicable group headed by a Mussolini or a Stalin.

It is well to recall to mind in these days of world doubt and despair that democracy is not a new or untried invention. It is as old as the hills. It has matured through the centuries. In Britain and in America, at least, its roots have grown deep into the soil.

Democracy is worth fighting for. We in the United States particularly have a democracy worthy of defense, despite its faults and defects, many as there may appear to be. Be it remembered that these blemishes are far outweighed by wholesome advantages. In the language of William James, our democracy has, of all governments, brought the "greatest good to the greatest number."

Let me point out that democracy cannot always be defended by merely preserving peace. Remember people have perished by peace as well as by war. Ancient Rome wanted peace and hired other people to fight their battles. Those hired mercenaries in turn overcame Rome. To mention current history, Holland, Belgium, Denmark, Norway, and Finland deeply and sincerely desired peace. With one exception these peace-loving countries are in ruins today.

Peace is a worthy ideal but there is an ideal even more compelling—justice. To live democracy must, at all costs, preserve justice; otherwise it would be a mere ghost of its glorious past. We have preserved justice in this land of ours for more than 150 years. Our first thought, therefore, should be the defense of our just democracy.

Just as our forefathers in inaugurating our great democracy and experiment in human freedom on this continent were willing to stake their all on its success, we, too, should be willing to give our all, our property, our lives, our sacred honor, to defend that which is no longer an experiment but an assured worthy success.

Democracy should not be static. It should change with the times. We must not only talk democracy, we must live it. We must always strive to direct it toward a better order, to create more happiness for our people. We must see to it that democracy is not checkmated, is not curtailed, but rather that it is encouraged and made more embracing in its benign influences. Above all, we must defend our democracy from within and from without.

We must meet the competition of dictator countries. We must be prepared to match their armaments. But, also, the enemy lurks within. There are many Trojan horses within our confines. We must uncover insidious penetrations into this fair land of ours by Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin. At times these vultures have conquered without firing a shot. I am confident that our democracy can fight and conquer hidden as well as unhidden foes. To do this, we must have intelligent leadership. That leadership resides in the personality of President Roosevelt. He has wisely asked that we arm ourselves clear up to the hilt. He urges this because he knows, and you know, that unless we do so, democracy is dead—dead as a door nail.

A revolutionary, dictator movement—the very antithesis of democracy—in a comparatively short space of time, because of lack of preparedness of its enemies—has swallowed most of the continent of Europe. In the East, similarly, Japan, aping the axis powers, is establishing its undemocratic sovereignty over Asia and threatens us from across the Pacific. In between the two movements lies the Russian bear, which has crushed all the democracy it could seize for the time being. It gluts for more. Yesterday it was Estonia and Latvia. Today Bessarabia.

The last vestige of democracy in Europe—England—is about to be attacked by land, sea, and air. Its downfall means the downfall of a democratic empire covering one-fourth of the globe. If England falls the Western Hemisphere will be all that will be left of democracy. We must preserve what little democracy may remain. In order to fight we must prepare with a two-ocean Navy and with huge land and air forces.

In that armed preparedness there is something more involved than submarines, airplanes, tanks, and Garands. There must be a weeding out of those forces which make for dissension among our people. There must be a will to prevent internal strife, racial and religious prejudice. There must be a willingness to sacrifice, an unquenchable love of freedom and an insistence upon the individual rights of man. A democracy, disunited and discontented, becomes an easy target for the war lords.

Defending democracy at this juncture means preparedness. It is argued in certain quarters that military, aerial, and naval preparedness militates against and is inconsistent with democracy. That is damnably untrue. It emanates from the enemies and not the friends of democracy.

During the last World War we armed and trained over 4,000,000 men and sent 2,000,000 soldiers to France. Our fleet was built up to reach a staggering tonnage. That was militarism with a vengeance. Yet our democracy remained intact. It emerged unimpaired from such a crisis. Keep this in mind. We have had 31 Presidents. Each, under our Constitution, has been endowed with tremendous power. They have been Commanders in Chief of our Army and Navy. Despite their power, not one of them has ever sought to subvert the Government or to override the will of the people on any essential point. This is all the more remarkable because at least seven of these men were chosen because of conspicuous military service. I refer to Washington, Jackson, Harrison, Zachary Taylor, Grant, Garfield, and Theodore Roosevelt. The military point of view, so deeply imbued in these men, did not affect their democracy. All of them advanced the cause of democracy. Furthermore, during 150 years we have been engaged in numerous wars—the Revolutionary War, the War of 1812, the Mexican War, the Civil War, the Spanish-American War, the Philippine Insurrection, not including the numerous frontier and Indian wars. Despite the military campaigns involved, there has been an ever-growing list of benefits from our widening democracy. To name a few celebrated examples, I cite the emancipation of the Negroes after the Civil War; the seventeenth amendment, in 1913, which made our Senate more responsible to the popular will by providing for their direct election; the right of franchise extended to women in 1920; the lame-duck amendment in 1933.

During these 150 years our civil liberties have been gradually encouraged. In the early days of our history there were, for example, all manner of religious bars against Catholics, Quakers, Jews, and atheists.

In New Hampshire suffrage was limited to Protestant taxpayers. In South Carolina, only to free, white men, believing in God, heaven and hell, with a freehold of 50 acres. A Governor of South Carolina had to be possessed of 10,000 pounds of property, comparable to a million dollars or more today.

States have been educated gradually to relax these prohibitions. We have traveled long distances along the paths of democracy and will continue to do so.

The founders of the Republic, be it remembered, were not all quiet old gentleman in stocks, living honorable and prophetic lives for the uplifting of us, their putative descendants. They were a very human lot of people, who, liking to win, were not overnice about the means. We have made great strides in morals since those days.

Let us emphasize the advancements made by labor, with consequent shorter hours, higher wages, and better conditions. There has never been any undue interference with the freedom of the press, free assemblage. Whenever attempts have been made to restrict, as before the Civil War, the literature of the abolitionists, the courts intervened. Same held true recently for birth-control documents. We have created great benefits for our youth through the C. C. C. and the National Youth Administration. We now have old-age protection as provided in the Social Security Act. We have various loan agencies to help those who cannot help themselves, such as R. F. C. and H. O. L. C. We have arranged for slum clearance through the Federal Housing Administration. Farmers have been helped in innumerable ways. In the various bills recently passed by Congress for military and naval preparedness, there were included therein safeguards for agricultural and industrial workers. In this way our democracy goes hand in hand with defense.

Lastly permit me to point with pride to the greatest example of democracy—the nomination of Wendell Willkie. Here is a man granted the highest honor within the gift of one of our great parties who a short time ago was "unbossed, unwept, unhonored, and unsung." By sheer force of character and personality he overwhelmed the delegates and became the standard bearer of the Republican Party.

Our democracy marches on. It girds its loins to defend itself from all its enemies, here or abroad, seen or unseen.

Will Democracy Survive?

OF

HON. USHER L. BURDICK

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. CHARLES G. BINDERUP

Mr. BURDICK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, I include the following radio talk by Hon. Charles G. Binderup, June 2, 1940, over stations KMMJ, Grand Island, Nebr., and KGFW, Kearney, Nebr.:

ANNOUNCER. We are pleased to again present this morning Mr. Charles G. Binderup, former Congressman from Nebraska, on the regular Sunday morning series known as Binderup's Financial School of the Air. These programs are a part of the educational program of the Constitutional Money League of America, a nonprofit, nonpartisan organization with headquarters at Washington, D. C., which organization recently published the first textbook of its kind for schools, teaching the true fundamentals of our money system. Also as a part of their educational program, the Constitutional Money League of America publishes a monthly magazine, the Constitutional Money Advocate, and distributes books and free literature on the subjects discussed over these programs.

Mr. Binderup, last Sunday we were proud to have you present Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS, senior Senator from Nebraska, and Prof. Irving Fisher, of Yale University, in an electrical transcription of the radio talks which you personally conducted over a Washington, D. C., station last summer. Their subject was 100 percent reserves back of demand deposits as a means of preventing depressions and bank failures. What will the subject be this morning, Mr. Binderup?

Mr. BINDERUP. I am pleased to greet our radio audience and my congenial announcer, Mr. Petersen. My subject for today is to explain definitely how and why money is the only wheel of distribution, a phrase oftentimes made, a subject seldom understood.

I am just in receipt of a very fine letter asking me if I think our democratic form of government will survive the terrific strain brought about by this continued depression which has lasted over 20 years and has refused to be solved by pouring money into the "tax-exempt, interest-bearing, Government bond rat hole" that has no bottom.

WILL DEMOCRACY SURVIVE?

The answer to the question depends absolutely upon how democracy operates the three component parts of the capitalistic system. Our capitalistic system of government may be likened to a three-wheel cart, the wheels being production, distribution, and consumption. If at any time any one of these three wheels lags behind in strength or fails to carry its load, the entire cart collapses. These wheels must carry a human cargo. The welfare of humanity depends on these three wheels each doing its part. Nations have invariably failed by always using the production wheel as the master wheel, which they have guarded, supported, and cared for in every way, while the two neglected rear wheels, consumption and distribution, have been allowed to follow as best they could in some old rut in any shape without care or consideration. Laboring under this illogical plan, we have wondered why Uncle Sam's three-wheeled cart has broken down about every 7 years. It will continue to break down more often as it grows older, unless we change the wheels around and give our attention to distribution (money) as the master wheel, for everyone knows that distribution has always found the beaten path for the consumption wheel. By that I mean we have always been able to consume what has been distributed to us. The wheels of distribution and consumption have ever paved the way for production, i. e., show a distributing and consuming power and the production wheel always follows, and it will continue to follow until we have exhausted labor or the natural resources of the earth. There is no limit, my friends, to prosperity until one of these factors have been exhausted. For every nation that was once and is no more, time has written the following epitaph on the pages of history: "Died because its people failed to solve the problem of equitable distribution."

We have, through the development of our natural resources and through the progress of science, increased our capacity to produce to a very great degree. but the fact is, and the difficulty has been, that whenever we have approached a maximum of production, one of the three wheels of our capitalistic system has broken down, namely, the distribution wheel (by which I mean our money system).

Twenty-seven times in our Nation's history, whenever we have approached a time when we attempted to satisfy the wants of our people, when we have approached a maximum of production and a maximum of consumption; whenever we have neared that standard of living to which the great resources of our Nation and the energy and integrity of its people so justly entitle them, the one part of our capitalistic system, the wheel of distribution (the monetary system) has broken down, bringing misery, want, and starvation to millions of our people and threatening our very democracy.

Will democracy survive? Yes; if we return to the Constitution and once and for all rightly solve this one part of our capitalistic system, the monetary system of our country, through Government monetary issue and control, as advocated by the Constitutional Money League of America, Washington, D. C.

How often it has been said that money is the only wheel of distribution for trade and commerce. It is no wonder that the people do not understand what is meant by this phrase, as 97 percent of our money is so definitely intangible. If I should say a freight or express car or truck was the wheels of commerce and distribution everybody would say, "Of course they are." Everybody can see that. But when I tell you that none of these can function as instrumentalities of distribution unless assisted by money, the arch vehicle of trade and commerce and distribution, people just cannot understand that without money there cannot possibly be trade, commerce, or distribution.

Let me picture an extreme case that we may fully understand the power of money, and just how and why money is the wheel of distribution. Suppose all the money were taken out of circulation. Do you realize that the entire Nation would stand still? Distribution would be at zero. We would then have 100 percent unemployment. Not one single man, woman, or child would have a job. Every freight or express car or truck would be standing still, for there would be no money for gas. Our cities would black out and water hydrants would be dry, for we would have no way of paying labor. Every doctor, lawyer, or merchant would be out trying to find something to eat out in the forest or field, trying to get food directly from Mother Earth, as all commerce would be at a standstill. Do you realize that in 10 days the people in the cities would be starving to death, and there would be murder and chaos in the mad scramble to get something to eat? You would be murdered by the hungry mob if they thought you had a slice of bread in your possession. Take our money out of circulation and civilization will perish immediately.

The plan to preserve and promote civilization with Government monetary issue and control is so simple. You can read the plan in Uncle Sam's Hospital Chart in 10 minutes, and any child in the eighth grade can understand it.

So, as we explained, with all the money out of circulation, we would have 100-percent unemployment and the Nation would die. Now, suppose half of the money were taken out of circulation as it is at present. Can you vision with me that half of commerce is standing still; that only half of labor is employed, of that labor and the farmer is only half paid? Let me repeat, if you take all the money out of circulation, we would have 100-percent unemployment, no one would have a job and the price of farm commodities would be at zero. Then with only half the money in circulation, is it difficult for you to understand that half of labor would be unemployed and the price of commodities would be at half price? Well, if you can understand this, then you do understand the money question, for that is all there is to it.

Now, to further prove that money is the only wheel of distribution, and trade and commerce, let me relate the following incident:

One day John Jones found a $5 bill in an old strong box that had been hidden away for 50 years. It was real money, a Government receipt for services rendered, Uncle Sam's note, a greenback. Now, when John spent this $5 for goods or services he not alone benefited himself, but he started trade and commerce to the extent of this $5 to the benefit of the entire Nation, for it continued traveling throughout the veins and arteries of distribution, transferring goods or services in trade and commerce from one to another, to the extent of $5 a week. Because statistics prove that a dollar changes hands on the average of once a week, this $5 bill created $5 times 52 weeks, or $260 in transactions a year. So I say it was not John alone who profited by finding this money, but merchants, farmers, or laboring men did $5 more business a week forever after, just because John found this $5 and spent it into the channels of business. We all profited in expanded business to this extent. Yes, this $5 is still going on and on traveling and perfecting $5 of transactions a week, solving the unemployment problem to this extent. Let me further state, there is not a power on earth that can stop this $5 from performing its services to humanity every week as a distributor of goods and services, helping to overcome unemployment and raising the price level by supplying a demand for goods.

Of course, someone could exchange his own goods or services for this $5 bill and then deliberately burn it up or destroy it, although he would become criminally liable to Uncle Sam for destroying this kind of money, regardless of the fact that the bankers destroy our money (bankers' credit money) by the billions whenever they feel like it. Or, he could lock up this $5 and keep it from circulating. But in all events he would have lost his own services or goods which he had exchanged for it. Other than this unlikely condition, I say the $5 John put into circulation, when he found it and spent it could not be stopped from doing its services to humanity, creating its $260 in transactions a year and business would be just that much better. May I stress most emphatically that not one penny of this $260 in additional business could have been possible, had John not found this $5. Business would have been short this amount in transactions and the national income would have been short accordingly. In other words, it would have been a brake on distribution and prosperity to just exactly this extent.

Now let me go further. This $5 bill had been out of circulation for 50 years. Thus by being lost, the same as hoarded, for 50 years, it had hindered or prevented the flow of trade and commerce and distribution to the extent of five times 52 weeks times 50 years, or a total of $13,000 in business transactions had been stopped because this $5 was lost. And because John discovered this $5, $13,000 in new business will be created every 50 years from now on. Every man, woman, and child will receive his or her prorated share of this benefit in added distribution, added business, forever. To this extent John was responsible for solving the unemployment situation by putting $5 again into circulation.

Now, friends, this miniature illustration should be interesting when it is led on into greater figures. Let us follow the dollars in larger amounts under the same undisputed philosophy, as explained about the $5 bill somebody had taken out of circulation and which was later found by John.

It was on May 18, 1920, that there was committed against the people of the United States the greatest crime ever committed against a trusting public, when 52 bankers held a secret meeting in the Treasury Building at Washington, D. C., and took $10,000,000,000 of the people's money out of circulation, as related in the book, Uncle Sam's Hospital Chart, the facts of which are taken from Senate Document 310.

At this time these bankers destroyed $10,000,000,000 of the people's money. But this was a different kind of money than the $5 bill which John found. This was pen-and-ink money, ledger-entry money, which is created by our banking system out of thin air and likewise vanishes when so commanded by the system, into thin air. But this kind of money is just as much used as money as Uncle Sam's own real money. In fact, it makes up 97 percent of our money.

It was just 20 years ago since this crime was committed from which we have never recovered. Let us see just how much business was blocked by this destruction of the Nation's circulating medium of exchange, money. Remember, a dollar changes hands on an average of once a week. The $10,000,000,000 destroyed on May 18, 1920, stopped trade and commerce to the extent of $10,000,000,000 times 52 weeks times 20 years, or $10,400,000,000,000 of business transactions to date.

In other words, the action of the bankers in this secret meeting blocked just $10,400,000,000,000 in transactions and not one single penny, not one red cent of these business transactions was possible without this money. I challenge the world to deny it.

In 1929 this same bunch of international bankers met again and took away from the people $8,000,000,000, which, according to the same statistics, robbed the people of $4,160,000,000,000 in business transactions. Again, in 1937, the same procedure by our banking system took away from the people $3,000,000,000 of our medium of exchange, or $468,000,000,000 in business transactions. So, by stopping dollars in these cases alone, the same as the illustration of John and his $5, these bankers stopped this vast amount of business by taking away from the people the wheel of distribution—money—in the total amount of $15,028,000,000,000 (fifteen trillion, twenty-eight billion dollars) of business transactions since the crime of May 18, 1920. And the people wonder why the factories are empty or running part time. You hear them say, "What in the world has happened to business? What has happened, that we are in want in the midst of plenty? Who stopped the clock?" They wonder why people could not pay their taxes and interest, and why the Nation has doubled its national debt; why 1,500,000 farmers lost their farms by foreclosure, and 20,000,000 laboring men lost their jobs and homes. They wonder why a great Nation with unlimited resources and labor went bankrupt in the midst of plenty. Why are "reds" and radicals springing up among our own people? Where did they come from? The Fascists and Nazis, and other foreign military organizations that are forming to oppose our Government, have become so serious a problem that Congress has deemed it necessary to form a Committee under Congressman DIES to stop or hinder free speech, the very foundation of a free democracy. I say "Why?", especially when Congressman DIES knows the fundamental reason and still persists in administering palliatives to Uncle Sam in place of prescribing the fundamental cure, when he knows, as any man with common sense knows, you cannot stop communism and fascism and Bund organizations, and other foreign influences against our Government with prison or deportation, with shot and shell, or sword or gun, for every time you catch one and inflict punishment, a hundred others are born. But I know a way you can stop all this. I know a way you can successfully choke to death every sign of these foreign "isms." You can destroy their motive until they will come to hate their own philosophy. Just choke to death with honor and righteousness and fairness their reason for resorting to these un-Christian, uncivilized plans. Make restitution for the crimes of 1920, 1929, and 1937. Put the money back into circulation. Recreate jobs and rebuild homes, the units in the foundation of our Government. Move the capitol from New York back to Washington, and I don't mean move the agents of the hidden government to Washington, I mean power and principle.

Yes, my friends, out of these poor skeletons of humanity you can make the greatest citizens. Help them to get a job and a home and they will beg to become American citizens and help and cooperate in a great democracy, when our Government again deserves this compliment. All it takes is justice, the very foundation on which our democracy was originally builded.

The question is asked, "Will democracy survive?" Yes, if we, the people will rightly balance the load on our three-wheeled capitalistic cart. If we will abide by the Constitution in article 1, section 8, "Congress shall coin all money and regulate the value thereof," by controlling volume and velocity of money as explained in our monthly magazine or in our book, Uncle Sam's Hospital Chart, or in the textbook which we have just recently completed for schools, teaching the basic principles of constitutional money, or by following these radio broadcasts called Binderup's Financial School of the Air every Sunday at 9 a. m. over Station KMMJ, Grand Island, Nebr., and at 12:30 p. m. over station KGFW, Kearney, Nebr.

ANNOUNCER. Thank you. You have just listened to Mr. Charles G. Binderup, former Congressman from Nebraska, in another of the series known as Binderup's Financial School of the Air. We will have Mr. Binderup with us again next Sunday at this same time, 9 a. m., for another of his interesting talks on national problems of the day. Be sure to listen and advise your friends to tune in.

Free literature on the subjects discussed will be mailed upon request. Just address a letter or postal card to the Constitutional Money League of America, Washington, D. C., or to the station to which you are listening. We will see you again next Sunday, Mr. Binderup.

Third Term for President Roosevelt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 3 (legislative day of Monday, July 1), 1940

ARTICLE BY HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. SCHWELLENBACH. Mr. President, in the July issue of Current History there appears a very interesting and informative article by the distinguished Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. GUFFEY]. I ask that the article be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From Current History and Forum for July 1940]

F. D. R. MUST RUN AGAIN

(By Senator JOSEPH F. GUFFEY, United States Senator from the State of Pennsylvania)

I am for Franklin D. Roosevelt for President in 1940, to serve his people and the Nation for another term in the White House.

Will he accept the nomination the Democratic National Convention will undoubtedly tender him in July? He must. The people are demanding it.

During the summer of 1939 one of the most astute of all Washington political observers, Charles Michelson, veteran political writer and publicity director for the Democratic National Committee, declared it his opinion that the President would prefer a case of hives to 4 years more of the heartache that being President means. And he added:

"It will not be an easy choice at that. Circumstances might arise that would make it impossible for him to lay down his burden. The world may be at war, with or without threat of involvement; or some other equally acute emergency may eventuate that would forbid change of administration. The man in the White House is not the kind of an individual who would let his personal desire interfere with what seemed to him to be his duty."

Circumstances have arisen which make it impossible for Franklin D. Roosevelt to lay down his burden. A deadly and devastating war grips Europe and threatens to spread to our hemisphere.

Roosevelt's call from the people rests not merely upon the demand for a strong man to lead in this hour of emergency, but likewise upon the need for a consolidation and extension of the great social gains he has begun. That he has not already consolidated these gains is not his fault. As a matter of cold political fact, if Roosevelt is elected to the Presidency again, he will have an opportunity to serve his first real term of office. Roosevelt's first term, which began in 1933, was canceled, vetoed, by the Supreme Court. His second term, which began in 1937, has been hampered by Tories and political ingrates.

He should, at least, be given an opportunity for 4 years in the White House with assurance that his program will no longer be torn apart by Court decisions or emasculated by selfish interests who have stabbed at him from behind his back.

All should agree that, irrespective of another term for Roosevelt, there must be another term for his ideas. Are there no other Democratic leaders qualified to be President? Of course there are. But where is the candidate that can be trusted to embody and carry forward these ideas and these programs of the New Deal as effectively as President Roosevelt? Regardless of their loyalty for the New Deal, and their zeal in making those principles effective, no New Deal leader can approach Roosevelt in popular appeal or forceful guidance of the people toward his objectives.

The people themselves are answering the question for us. They are saying that so far there appears to be only one to guarantee the continued enjoyment of the many social, industrial, agricultural, educational, and cultural gains that have been made under his administration, and that one is Franklin D. Roosevelt himself.

As a practical politician, I say that talk against another term for Roosevelt is bad politics. Those who hold office of trust in the United States Government talk with a bad grace of limiting the President to two terms. A quarter of the membership of the Senate has served more than two terms of 6 years each, and another quarter of the Senators are serving their second term—and hoping for a third. Three-fourths of the membership of the House of Representatives are serving a second term or more. Our Federal judges are appointed for life.

We need experience in public life, and most of all in the Presidency. Will Senators who have served from 10 to 30 years argue that another Presidential term would violate a "sacred tradition" of two terms? Will they contend that it is morally wrong or politically unwise for a President to serve longer than 8 elected years? Can Senators who have served since the World War convince us that we must get rid of Roosevelt because he has been in the White House since 1933?

Some members of the Democratic Party say they have such high regard for President Roosevelt that they feel sure he will not challenge the third-term myth. Some of these men have had such high regard for Mr. Roosevelt that they have balked, filibustered, or mutilated some of the President's measures taken during the last 3 years.

Let us examine this tradition more closely. It is supposed to rest upon the words and example of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson. There was calm, measured logic in Washington's statement of his position on the question. It was outlined in his letter to Lafayette on April 28, 1788, in which he reviewed various issues raised in the Constitution then under discussion. He wrote:

"There are other points on which opinions would be more likely to vary. As, for instance, on the ineligibility of the same person for President after he should have served a certain course of years. * * * There cannot, in my judgment, be the least danger that the President will by any practical intrigue ever be able to continue himself one moment in office, much less perpetuate himself in it—but in the last stage of corrupted morals and political depravity. * * *

"Under an extended view of this part of the subject, I can see no propriety in precluding ourselves from the services of any man who, on some great emergency, shall be deemed universally most capable of serving the public."

Such was the final judgment of the Father of his Country, the first President. Jefferson favored a single term of 4 to 6 years, yet he served two terms totaling 8 years. He admitted that he might serve three terms under certain conditions, and he controlled Presidential policy for 16 years after he left office.

The two-term tradition is a political taboo which we should have discarded long ago. As Jay Franklin has said:

"Freedom from taboos in every other walk of life than politics has been responsible for much of our national progress. The third term taboo is only a lamp which should have been puffed out long ago, just to show that we could do it. The common sense of politics is to keep a good man as long as he is useful and to get rid of a bad President as soon as his incapacity is evident."

We have modified many of our political practices as the Republic grew and needs changed. We changed our Constitution to collect a Federal income tax. We elect United States Senators by direct vote of the people instead of by legislatures as was the custom for more than a century. We have given women the suffrage—against the howls of those lovers of tradition who declared we should not shake off this taboo against women exercising this fundamental right of citizenship. We have seen the Supreme Court recently follow the will of the people in social legislation rather than stick to archaic constructions of law.

Traditions have no validity except when the value of their fundamental premises remains unimpaired. Jefferson feared that America might have a king if a third term were permitting, making exception only of Washington and himself. If monarchy threatens America, then his reasons hold. But who believes that a monarchy would be possible in the United States today?

If traditions had never been broken, George Washington and the revolutionary patriots would never have taken up arms, Abraham Lincoln would never have freed the slaves.

Surely, then, we need not cling to a tradition that, in these times of crises in world affairs, has no rhyme nor reason for continued existence.

I favor another term for President Roosevelt as an American. I know what he has done to save America, our people, our peace, our free institutions, our faith in God and man.

I favor another term because I am a liberal and I believe in democracy. Our people realize the real issue. The real fight we face is between liberalism as represented by Roosevelt and reactionary toryism as represented by judges and lawyers who cheated the people out of the benefits of Roosevelt's leadership in his first term and the ingrates and middle-of-the-roaders who have tried to stifle his program in his second term. The people want our liberal democracy to continue. They know that Roosevelt alone can insure its safe continuation.

These are dangerous and critical times. We can afford nothing but our very best man in the White House. What other man than Roosevelt could match the dignity of a king and queen, representing us as their hosts in a manner that made the whole Nation proud of him, and at the same time know and feel the problems of the unemployed miners of Pennsylvania and the hardships of the struggling farmers of the Middle West?

In these times of real danger to America—danger from within and from without—we need a real leader, someone who can really represent our democratic will to survive. And we know that in Franklin D. Roosevelt we have such a leader.

But, some may contend, the President may seize the power to make himself a dictator, particularly with his increased emergency powers in this crisis of national defense. Such a fear has been deliberately fostered at other times in our history in order to thwart the will of the people. The hollowness of this pretense is easily seen. If the President might seize dictatorial powers, it is obvious that he could do so as easily in the first and second as in the third term. If the people of their own volition give more power to a President, they still operate within the framework of democracy. They cannot give him power beyond that permitted under the Constitution. No matter how often the people elect a President, they still control his operations and the boundaries of his duties, through their elected representatives—in the Congress.

It is an insult to the intelligence of the American people to argue that Franklin D. Roosevelt would seek to become a dictator. Such a position could be defended only on the ground that the people are not able to govern themselves, that Congress and the courts may be expected to abdicate their functions and prerogatives, and that President Roosevelt himself would seize by force of arms authority not granted him by the Constitution and the people.

As Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes has said: "Our democracy does not rest upon any such flimsy foundation as those who persist in invoking the 'sacred tradition' would have us believe. Our institutions are firmly founded upon the ultimate right of the people to decide for themselves whom they wish to have to serve them and the manner in which they shall be served.

"If the people can give, the people can also take away. If they can be trusted to elect a President for one or two terms, they can be trusted to decide for themselves whether they want a President to serve them for three terms. In the final analysis, the safety of our institutions depends upon the ballot box, and so long as we safeguard that right, so long will our Nation be a free, self-governing democracy. * * *

"Moreover, it should be remembered that the Presidency is not a despotic office but is responsible to an alert and independent Congress. No matter how long a President might remain in office, he would still be subjected to the democratic processes, checked by the Congress and the judiciary, and exposed to the watchful eyes of a critical free press."

Can any "danger" of another term for Roosevelt compare with the risk we run of having forced upon this country a figurehead, a stuffed shirt, an incompetent middle of the roader, or a young and inexperienced man? Everyone in America knows that we need now as never before a man with mature knowledge of the world, knowledge of America, the ability of leadership, determination and courage. Can any political fixers who would oust Roosevelt on the pretext of a tradition fail to believe that if they do they will be branded throughout this country as the professional embezzlers of the rights of a free and democratic people?

We Americans know that to our people Roosevelt is not just a name in the papers, as are other possible candidates for the Presidency. Almost every American old enough for school has by this time actually seen President Roosevelt. He has seen and been seen by more of our people than has any other man in the United States.

The people do not want shadow candidates now. They want Roosevelt, because they trust him and his leadership. They demand that the leadership he has given them since 1933 be continued.

Who is supporting President Roosevelt for a third term? The farmer whose land was saved by the New Deal, the factory worker who got decent hours and working conditions and the right to stand up and bargain with his employer like a man, the sharecropper of the South, the migratory worker of the West, the honest businessman who has been saved from bankruptcy, the men out of a job who got relief work on self-respecting terms, the old people who got pensions, the citizens who are the beneficiaries of a greater social justice.

President Roosevelt has said: "The social and economic forces which have been mismanaged abroad until they have resulted in revolution, dictatorship, and war are the same as those which we here are struggling to adjust peacefully at home."

The amazing energy and courage with which Franklin D. Roosevelt has met the challenge which leaders of countries now at war failed to meet is demonstrated by headlines from almost any daily paper.

"Federal public assistance benefits 17,880,000 persons. * * * C. C. C. provides useful work and training for 2,000,000 youths. * * * P. W. A. makes possible 80 percent of all construction in the United States. * * * Government interest rates lowest in history. * * *" and so on through countless daily news dispatches.

These headlines tell a doubly significant story. First of all, they indicate the tremendously wide influence which the idea that "something is going on in Washington" has come to play in the daily routine and normal life of everybody in the Nation. Social security, new as it is, has become an established fact of American life. So it is with measure after measure inaugurated by President Roosevelt. There could be no greater tribute to the soundness of these measures than that their application has become a matter of course. Furthermore, the American citizen accepts them as his right. The New Deal is made up of rights guaranteed the citizen unrecognized by his Government before 1933. He wants those rights continued—with President Roosevelt still in command.

I recognize this movement for another term as the most remarkable development I have experienced in my 44 years of practical politics.

It is a movement not sponsored by newspapers, nor by political leaders meeting in back rooms to "put Roosevelt over" for the nomination soon to be made. It is a demand on the part of the people for the victorious completion of his program, and for continued leadership in the time of gravest international crisis since 1917.

All that can be said against another term is that it has never been done before. To which I answer that we never had such conditions to be remedied before. We have never had such leadership before. We did not have Franklin D. Roosevelt in the White House before 1933.

Good Behavior of Judges

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EMANUEL CELLER

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1940

MINORITY REPORT OF HON. EMANUEL CELLER, OF NEW YORK

Mr. CELLER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

MINORITY REPORT OF HON. EMANUEL CELLER, OF NEW YORK (TO ACCOMPANY H. R. 5939)

It is with great reluctance that I must differ from the views expressed by our esteemed chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, Mr. SUMNERS of Texas. However, H. R. 5939, providing for a rather novel "trial of good behavior" of United States district judges, is so transcendental in importance, and so fraught with intense interest, that I would indeed be derelict in my duties as a Member of Congress and ranking member of the Committee on the Judiciary if I would not express my views, although they may not be in accord with those of our distinguished chairman.

The underlying purpose of the plan proposed is partly a sort of mild chastisement of the Senate. The Senators have frequently, it is charged, not done their duty as members of a tribunal hearing impeachment charges preferred by the House. Particularly as in the last impeachment trial, the Senators go in and out of the chamber during the trial—few, if any, remain throughout the proceedings yet all have a solemn duty to perform. But because the Senators may not do their full duty is no valid reason for setting up the novel proceeding embodied in this bill. The proper remedy is for the Senators to perform their duty.

GOOD BEHAVIOR IS NOT A JUSTICIABLE QUESTION

Under the Sumners bill, the court, composed of three circuit judges as selected by the Chief Justice of the United States Supreme Court, hears the charges preferred by the House of Representatives against a district judge. The Attorney General prosecutes. These charges shall grow out of the "good behavior" provision of the Constitution. Section 1 of article III of the Constitution states, among other things, that "The judges, both of the Supreme and inferior courts, shall hold their offices during good behavior * * *." The charges, therefore, that this new court must sift is the lack or failure of good behavior, that is, misbehavior. What is good behavior? The Constitution does not define it. The instant bill does not define it. What does it mean? What is good behavior to one man may be bad behavior to another. What is one man's meat may be another man's poison. What is good grounds to one man may be "coffee grounds" to another. President Green, of the American Federation of Labor, would undoubtedly hold Mr. Lewis, of the C. I. O., guilty of bad behavior; while Mr. Lewis would undoubtedly hold Mr. Green similarly guilty of bad behavior. When Cleveland, in the Pullman strikes, called out the troops, a vast number of people wanted him impeached, while on the other hand many people praised him to the skies. Who knows where the truth lies? Who knows what is good behavior? The common criminal can claim violation of the due-process clause of the Constitution if the law under which he has been indicted is vague and indefinite, or the indictment itself is ambiguous or indefinable. Certainly, when one is charged with bad behavior, he is indeed at a loss to know what that means. He can and will invoke the charge of violation of due process, in this new court.

Remember, also, in impeachment the Senate can only convict for "high crimes and misdemeanors" and then only by a two-thirds vote. In the new court, conviction can be for misbehavior and by a majority of three judges. A vote of two of the three judges is all that is necessary. Be the dissent ever so strong the judge must be removed. The right of appeal to the Supreme Court does not cure the vice of the bill.

THIS BILL WILL STRIKE AT THE INDEPENDENCE OF THE JUDICIARY

We often grow impatient with the courts and the judges, especially when they decide against us. But all sensible men in retrospect are grateful to the judges and the courts, primarily, for their protecting of our liberties; for their protecting the weak against the strong, the poor against the rich, the subject against the ruler, and the humble citizen against the harshness of government. We are often tempted, at times, to strike at and punish the judges. But we must remember that judicial independence is essential to any government designed for free men. The courts must be made as impervious as possible against unnecessary or unwarranted attacks from either the executive or legislative branches of the Government. Montesquieu said, "There can be no liberty if the power of judging be not separate from the legislative and executive powers." This bill would make easier and more frequent the attacks on the judges and the courts. It is claimed that the remedy of impeachment is difficult and cumbersome. I believe that is as it should be. The power to attack the courts should be sparingly, if ever, used. Impeachment is difficult. It should remain so. The constitutional fathers so intended.

Frankly, are our courts so bad? Our district judges are as conscientious, courageous, and intelligent a lot of judges as can be found in any land. As a class, they are comparatively free from corruption, chicanery, and fraud. Occasionally, there may be one or two who misbehave. These occasions are rare. Even the diamond has flaws; the sun has its spots. The judges as a class are entitled to a few renegades. In 148 years since the Constitution only 9 judges have been impeached, a very good record. Of the 9 judges impeached, 5 were found innocent. There have been only 4 judges found guilty and removed in 148 years.

WHY IS THE BILL LIMITED TO THE TRIAL OF DISTRICT JUDGES?

The President appoints all the judges, the district as well as the circuit judges. The Presidential appointees as circuit judges can try district judges, why could not Presidential appointees as district judges try circuit judges?

TRIAL OF A DISTRICT JUDGE IS IMPORTANT

The author of the bill says that he limits his bill to the trial of district judges because they are not as important as the other judges, and that the only time when "impeachment" should be invoked should be in case of judges higher than the district court. He says "the commentators on the British Constitution all recognize 'impeachment' as not an ordinary proceeding, but as a proceeding to be called into action in extraordinary times and conditions." But, unfortunately, the author of the bill fails to realize that the framers of the Constitution understood the transcendent importance of "impeachment"; they were familiar with the writings on British "impeachment"; they, nevertheless, said indisputably, it must be exercised in case of removal of all judges, high or low. They recognized that the office of district judge was important enough to warrant "impeachment." If they felt differently they would have said so. Thus, only an amendment to the Constitution can bring about the remedy suggested by Representative SUMNERS.

WHY LIMIT THE TRIBUNAL TO CIRCUIT JUDGES?

If three circuit judges can constitute a court, the bill, with just as much grace and logic, could just as well provide a tribunal, to be appointed by the President or by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, of three ordinary citizens. Why limit the court to circuit judges? It could be three justices of the peace, or three presidents of three chambers of commerce, or three Liberty Leaguers, or the butcher, the baker, the candlestick maker? If it is constitutional for us as Members of Congress to set up a court to be composed of three circuit judges, it is equally as constitutional for us to set up a court to be composed of three Daughters of the American Revolution.

FOR 150 YEARS REMOVAL OF DISTRICT JUDGES HAS ONLY BEEN BY IMPEACHMENT

To my mind, the best argument against the validity of this proposed bill is this novelty. Can it for one moment be supposed that the framers of the Constitution intended to vest Congress with an important power and then so skillfully conceal it that it could not be discovered save after 150 years?

THE INDEPENDENCE OF JUDGES

I herewith quote from a very interesting article by Merrill E. Otis, reprinted from the Kansas City Law Review, December 1936 issue:

"'This independence of judges,' Alexander Hamilton wrote long since, 'is equally requisite to guard the Constitution and the rights of individuals. * * * The precautions for their responsibility are comprised in the article respecting impeachments. They are liable to be impeached for malconduct by the House of Representatives, and tried by the Senate, and if convicted may be dismissed from office and disqualified from holding any other. This is the only provision on the point, which is consistent with the necessary independence of the judicial character.'[1] And long since John Marshall said: 'Is it not to the last degree important that he (the judge) should be rendered perfectly and completely independent, with nothing to influence or control him but God and his conscience? * * * I have always thought from my earliest youth till now, that the greatest scourge an angry Heaven ever inflicted upon an ungrateful and a sinning people was an ignorant, a corrupt, or a dependent judiciary.'"[2]

The writings of Hamilton and Madison in the Federalist clearly indicate that limitation of removal or dismissal of judges only by conviction upon impeachment was to insure absolute independence of the judiciary. That theory has never heretofore been questioned. The instant bill flees in the face of the views of Madison, Hamilton, and Marshall.

CONGRESS CANNOT LEGISLATE CONCERNING THE TERMS AND TENURE OF OFFICE OF THE JUDGES

The author of the bill might be on firmer ground if there were nothing in the Constitution concerning inferior Federal courts except section 1 of article III, authorizing Congress to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court. Congress, I think, might under that provision have the right (1) to provide what judges the courts constituted should have, (2) to determine how they should be chosen, (3) to determine the terms and tenure, (4) to provide for removal. But that provision does not stand alone. And there is where the proponent of the bill makes his mistake. It must be read with other provisions concerning the courts. It must be read with the other provisions of section 1 of article III, namely: "The judges * * * of the inferior courts shall hold their offices during good behavior." It must be read with section 2 of article I: "The House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment" and with section 3 of the same article: "The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments."

Congress does not have the power to legislate concerning the terms of the judges. The Constitution fixes the terms—"life, during good behavior." Removal affects the term of a judge. Removal, therefore, has also been withdrawn from legislative power.

When the Constitution vests the House with the exclusive power to impeach, it prohibits, plainly, as if it said so in so many words, the vesting of that power in an attorney general or in any other entity. When it vests the Senate exclusively with power to try "impeachments" it prohibits, equally, the vesting of that power in some other existing or new tribunal.

"Impeachment" is not defined in the Constitution, yet when that instrument was drawn and adopted all knew what "impeachment" meant. It had a clear, historic meaning. It was the method employed in England and her colonies "to reach those in high places guilty of official delinquencies or maladministration." In other words, it meant "removal for misconduct."

Thus the Constitution provided the exclusive method of "removal." Congress cannot legislate any "removal" changes.

SENATE IS THE ONLY TRIBUNAL OF REMOVAL

The Constitution was so carefully drawn, each sentence and phrase so painstakingly reviewed and weighed, that every word of that document was intended to have significance. It must be especially true of the powerful word, "sole." It is used twice significantly: The House shall have the "sole" power of impeachment—the Senate shall have the "sole" power to try all impeachments. The framers were not content to say the House shall have power or the Senate shall have power. They were not content to rely upon the rule expressio unius exclusio alterius est. They wanted to make sure beyond peradventure of a doubt that every other body, group, entity, and official were excluded either to "impeach" or to "try" the "impeachment." They said the House could "solely" institute the charges while the Senate could "solely" hear the charges of removal. They did not even let the matter rest there—so meticulous were they in their choice of words. They wrote, "The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments." Thus to the emphasis given the word "sole" they added the further emphasis arising from the word "all."

Is it not idle, therefore, to construe these clauses, "The House of Representatives * * * shall have the sole power of impeachment," and, "The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments," as though they read: "The House of Representatives shall * * * have the sole power of impeachment, provided, however, the Congress may vest exactly the same power, called by a different name (court to try issue of good behavior) in a court of three circuit judges appointed by the Chief Justice of the United States"; and, "The Senate shall have the sole power to try all impeachments, provided, however, the Congress may take that power away from the Senate and vest exactly that same power, called by a different name, in a court of three circuit judges or in any kind of a court Congress may establish."

INTENT OF FRAMERS OF CONSTITUTION IN DEBATE CONCERNING OUSTER OF JUDGES

A study of the debates in the Constitutional Convention, and particularly those of Monday, August 27, 1787, clearly indicate that the framers of the Constitution intended only one method of ouster of judges, "impeachment." It was on that day that they discussed the provision that judges should hold office during good behavior. Delegate Dickinson, of Delaware, proposed, as a method for removing judges, additional to impeachment, that they "may be removed by the Executive on the application by the Senate and House of Representatives." (It is not recorded that he argued that what the Congress may do, it may undo.) The champions of an independent judiciary were stirred to vigorous and immediate dissent. The proposal almost unanimously was voted down.[3] Would not the framers of the Constitution have been surprised to learn that, themselves spurning an alternative of impeachment almost identical with it, unwittingly they had empowered Congress to adopt any alternative it chose?

The power to try judges, or remove them from office, would clearly be limited to impeachable offenses, under the general doctrine that where a constitution names certain things as constituting offenses, and gives specific powers with reference to certain subject matter, it is intended to be exclusive. Mr. Cooley, in his work on Constitutional Limitations (8th ed., p. 139), quotes this rule, as follows:

"Another rule of construction is that when the Constitution defines the circumstances under which a right may be exercised or a penalty imposed, the specification is an implied prohibition against legislative interference to add to the condition or to extend the penalty to other cases."

The Supreme Court of Mississippi, in State v. J. J. Henry (87 Mississippi Reports 125, 40 Southern Reporter 152), under clause (d) of the first syllabus, says:

"Where the Constitution enumerates power granted or denied, it must be held to have named all of the powers so dealt with and as being, with the necessary implications, the sole limit of authority or restriction."

To the same effect is the case of Rhode Island v. Massachusetts (12 Pet. 657, 9 L. ed. 1233); and Myers v. United States (272 U. S. 52, 71 L. ed. 160).

CANNOT ISOLATE ANY PARTICULAR PROVISION OF CONSTITUTION

Section 1, article III, of the Constitution, concerning good behavior, and section 4, article II, concerning impeachment, are not unrelated. The majority report holds that the proposed legislation is not dependent on the provision of the Constitution with reference to impeachments, and "has no relationship whatever with impeachment." I cannot accept this interpretation of the Constitution. The one article supplements and defines the others. The "good behavior" mentioned in section 1, article II, means freedom from "treason, bribery, or other high crimes and misdemeanors," as mentioned in section 4 of article II. In addition, the above two sections must be read with section 2, article I, of the Constitution, which provides that "The House of Representatives * * * shall have sole power of impeachment," and with section 3 of article I, which reads: "The Senate shall have sole power to try all impeachments." Therefore, the right to impeach resides solely and exclusively in the House of Representatives, and the right to try the accused judges lies solely and exclusively in the Senate. Shall we say that the Constitution has given exclusive power to the Senate to try the judges in all cases but that Congress, nevertheless, can give this power to some other tribunal merely by calling it some other name, like the "court of ouster"?

I now freely insert passages from an article of the distinguished United States District Judge Merrill E. Otis, entitled "A Proposed Tribunal: Is It Constitutional?"

"We have now available Madison's notes on the debates in the Constitutional Convention, which the then 36-year-old Virginian, thereafter called 'the Father of the Constitution,' daily took down in a sort of shorthand of his own devising and afterward transcribed. He was seldom absent from any session. His transcribed notes fill 550 printed pages. In them are recorded accurate abstracts of the discussions of the framers, as proposal after proposal was presented and considered. Madison heard and marked what was said concerning methods for securing the responsibility of public officers and what was said concerning measures designed to secure the independence of the judges. He heard the greatest lawyers discuss these and related matters on the floor of the Convention, Wilson, Hamilton, Gouverneur Morris, lawyers learned in all the English and Colonial precedents. But he did not record as coming from any of his fellow delegates even one suggestion that Congress would be empowered impliedly in the Constitution to provide an easier way to remove from office justices and judges. What was so obvious then to the authors of the Federalist was obvious also to their colleagues, that, under the Constitution, removal of justices and of judges after conviction on 'impeachment' was the 'only' way.

"Elliot's Debates have been almost the only source of our information touching the arguments made in the several State conventions for and against the ratification of the Constitution. A thorough search of that monumental and useful compilation, filling 1,550 printed pages, reveals to the student that in not one of the conventions did a single delegate suggest that the Constitution authorize Congress to provide an easier way to remove justices and judges than the impeachment process. No one in the State conventions suggested that the author of the Federalist was wrong when he said that the impeachment process was the 'only' way.

"But the 1,550 printed pages of Elliot's Debates do contain some things which strongly corroborate the Federalist. One of these is the resolution of the New York State convention, which ratified the Constitution, at the same time recommending the adoption of amendments, among which was this proposed amendment:

" 'That the court for the trial of impeachments shall consist of the Senate, the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, and the first or senior judge, for the time being, of the highest court of general and ordinary common law jurisdiction in each State; that the Congress shall, by standing laws, designate the courts in the respective States answering this description, and, in States having no courts exactly answering this description, shall designate some other court, preferring such, if any there be, whose judge or judges may hold their places during good behavior: Provided, That no more than one judge, other than judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, shall come from one State.

" 'That the Congress be authorized to pass laws for compensating the judges for such services, and for compelling their attendance; and that a majority, at least, of the said judges shall sit as members thereof; that each member shall, previous to the entering upon any trial, take an oath or affirmation honestly and impartially to hear and determine the cause; and that a majority of the members present shall be necessary to a conviction.' "

The New York convention was not satisfied with the Court of Impeachment provided in the Constitution and desired a differently constituted court, a court in which should sit not only the Members of the Senate but also the high-ranking judges, and which more nearly would be a court in fact as well as in theory. But the New York convention realized that only by amendment of the Constitution could any change be effective. How incompatible was the action of the New York convention with a belief that Congress had the power to create any kind of a court for the trial of at least certain public officers, namely, justices and judges, on charges of misconduct brought against them.

Search the writings of the fathers and not a single word will be found supporting the theory that the Constitution impliedly authorizes legislative provision of an easy way to remove or get rid of erring or misbehaving judges. The hard way of "impeachment" is the only way. In all the opinions of all the courts since the beginning of the Republic there is not even one little dictum that supports the Sumners theory of removal.

Not a single bill was ever introduced in either House in all those years providing for an easier legislative method of removal of judges. Of course, measures were offered for changes, but only by way of constitutional amendment.

Jefferson had no use for the Federal courts, and he developed a strong public opinion against them. He and many officials at the time desired changes. Within 2 months after the trial of Aaron Burr a resolution was introduced in Congress (the same resolution was pressed again in 1808, 1811, and 1812), proposing, not the creation by Congress of a court for the trial of judges but a constitutional amendment fixing a limited term of office for Federal judges and for their removal by the President on the address of two-thirds of each House. (See Warren's The Supreme Court in United States History, vol. I, p. 313.)

Jefferson never had the slightest doubt that under the Constitution the judges could be removed only after conviction on "impeachment." His many letters indubitably proved this. (See Works of Jefferson, vol. 15, p. 389; vol. 1, p. 120.)

[3] See Warren's, The Making of the Constitution, 532.

CONCLUSION

If removal of district judges may be set up by act of Congress, a circuit court of appeals judge similarly may be removed; a member of the Supreme Court may be similarly removed; in fact, any civil officer may be removed without trial by jury and with no appeal.

Section 3, article I, of the Constitution imbues the Senate with the sole power to try all impeachments. It was intended to and does place the judges on a high plane of independence, where they could act without fear or favor, subject only to difficult removal by the Senate. The constitutional provision of impeachment does not permit the removal of judges by the method proposed in the instant bill, simply by making a change in the method and in the name of the tribunal set up to hear the impeachment charges. A rose by any other name smells just as sweet. Congress is inhibited from passing bills of attainder. Congress cannot pass bills of attainder by calling them bills of decapitation and exile. Congress could do all that by token of the argument used by the proponents of this bill. Likewise with the instant bill. All they would need to do is to change the name and method of removal.

The Foreign Policy of the United States

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Saturday, June 22, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN D. DINGELL, OF MICHIGAN, BEFORE THE ELEANOR ROOSEVELT LEAGUE OF WOMEN AT DETROIT, MICH.

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address I made before the Eleanor Roosevelt League of Women at Detroit on June 29, 1940:

Madam Chairman, distinguished guests, members of the Eleanor Roosevelt League of Women, and fellow citizens, I have been asked to speak to you tonight concerning the foreign policy of the United States. In the comparatively short time available to me there will be no time to go into great detail. I shall endeavor merely to touch upon some phases that seem at this time most important for consideration. It is indeed fitting that we should discuss this subject tonight. With much of the world ravaged by war and with forces abroad menacing the security of the United States, it is imperative that we as American citizens be informed about the foreign policy of our great democracy.

At the outset let me call attention to some general principles underlying the foreign policy of the administration. President Roosevelt, in his inaugural address of March 4, 1933, dedicated the United States "to the policy of the good neighbor—the neighbor who resolutely respects himself and, because he does so, respects the rights of others—the neighbor who respects his obligations and respects the sanctity of his agreements in and with a world of neighbors." The United States considers the good-neighbor policy inherently reciprocal in nature. Our Government endeavors to treat with scrupulous respect the rights of other countries and their nationals, and expects similar consideration from other nations for the rights of the United States and the rights of our people.

In harmony with this policy the Government has endeavored to keep alive and strengthen various principles of order under law among nations. The Government has proclaimed that there should be scrupulous respect for the pledged word in international relations; that nations should respect each other's independence; that disputes among nations should be settled by none but methods of peaceful adjustment; and that trade and other economic relationships among nations should be conducted on the principles of fair dealing and equal treatment. Our Government has persistently endeavored to keep alive these fundamental principles in international relations. It continues to advocate them as principles which should be put into effect, when the present war is over, to make possible a stable international order.

You and I are, of course, aware that these are ominous days for the people of the world. The forces of aggression are on the march, leaving in their path widespread misery, death, and destruction. Millions of people have been forced to give up their liberties; nation after nation has been deprived of independence. Each day brings new and terrifying developments. In the light of these developments we must give vigilant and constant attention to the defense of our own Nation.

Events abroad lately have caused this Government to speed up all defense activities. The Congress has made extensive appropriations for national defense; it has provided for a tremendous increase in our military and naval forces. The Executive has taken steps to coordinate in a broad way the various defense activities of the Nation.

The President said in his address of May 16 to Congress that our defenses must be invulnerable and our security absolute. I agree entirely with the President in this statement. It has been my position in Congress that we should maintain an adequate national defense. In the House of Representatives just 2 years ago I stated my position in these words:

"I am as peaceful by nature as any Member on this floor. I am a practical pacifist who prefers peace to war; one who will make concessions and sacrifices for the sake of maintaining international amity. I am, however, practical enough to see the need of preparation for self-preservation when my neighbor is ill-disposed to be reasonable, when he seeks to misinterpret my every intention, and secretly, even openly, arms against me and mine."

While preparing our national defense to meet any emergency, it should not be assumed that the foreign policy of the United States neglects the cause of peace. I can say to you with assurance that the peace and security of the United States are the fundamental bases of the foreign policy of this administration. In the 7 years since President Roosevelt was first inaugurated there have been many civil and international armed conflicts throughout the world. During these conflicts it has been the policy of this administration to pursue a course of noninvolvement, while protecting with all reasonable means the lives and interests of citizens of the United States. The Government discourages the use of force as an instrument of national policy and, when conflicts have occurred, has endeavored to prevent the spread of hostilities. President Roosevelt recently has said that our ideal, our objective, is still peace at home and peace abroad. Nevertheless, he said "we stand ready not only to spend millions for defense but to give our service and even our lives for the maintenance of our American liberties."

This Government has sought to devise neutrality legislation designed to reduce the risks of involvement in war. The first legislation of this kind was enacted in 1935. It was revised in 1936, in 1937, and again in 1939. Up to the time of the last revision the neutrality legislation contained an inflexible embargo on the export of arms to belligerents.

When this arms embargo was first enacted, Secretary of State Hull warned against the dangers for our national security which were inherent in this type of policy. As time went on, it became increasingly clear that the arms-embargo policy, without adding anything to the security of this country, was an encouragement to heavily arming nations, intent on conquest and aggression.

When, early in 1939, consideration was given to the revision of existing neutrality legislation, the administration took the position that the involvement of the United States in controversies with belligerents was most likely to arise from the destruction of American lives—and not from the sale of arms—and that we could effectively diminish our risks only by keeping American nationals and vessels out of areas of special danger. The administration recommended, therefore, that the arms embargo be repealed and suggested enactment or reenactment of the following provisions: (1) To prohibit American vessels from entering combat areas, (2) to restrict travel by American citizens in combat areas, (3) to provide that the export of goods destined for belligerents should be preceded by transfer of title to the foreign purchaser, (4) to continue the existing legislation respecting loans and credits to nations at war, and (5) to regulate the solicitation and collection of funds for belligerents.

After the outbreak of the European war in September 1939 the public rallied to the support of this neutrality program. The program was substantially enacted by the Congress in a resolution approved by President Roosevelt on November 4, 1939.

The Neutrality Act of 1939 has now been in operation almost 8 months. It has justified the hopes of its proponents. Since its enactment we have been able to avoid dangerous controversies with belligerent nations. No American lives are known to have been lost on the high seas as a result of belligerent operations. Furthermore, no American vessel has been destroyed as a result of belligerent operations, although many vessels of other neutral countries have been sunk in the war areas. Thus, as a consequence of the Neutrality Act, we have avoided the destruction of American lives and American vessels, which in other times has resulted in serious controversies with belligerents.

Let me now turn to the subject of isolation. Throughout this administration the President and the Secretary of State have taken the position that we cannot as a nation isolate ourselves from the rest of the world; that events abroad may have a profund effect upon us; that we must be constantly alert to see that happenings elsewhere do not challenge the security of our own country. In this connection Secretary of State Hull said a few days ago:

"Our American history has not been achieved in isolation from the rest of mankind; there is no more dangerous folly than to think that its achievements can be preserved in isolation. It has been a part of a vast movement—in the Old World, as well as the New—which has opened new vistas in the destiny of man; which has carried human progress to new and exalted heights; which has, through scientific attainment, lessened the tyranny over man of the blind forces of nature; which, as never before, has expanded for the human race as a whole the opportunity for freedom of mind and of spirit. To this great stream of new ideas, new attainments, new cultural values, we have made our contribution; and we ourselves, in turn, have been nourished by it.".

Recent events have acted to vindicate this position, which has been consistently taken by the administration. At the present time the majority of the people of the United States appear to be convinced that we cannot isolate ourselves from the rest of the world. As an example I invite attention to the statement on June 25 of former President Hoover that there is no such thing as our isolation from wars which envelop two-thirds of all the people in the world, and that for us there is no such thing as economic, moral, intellectual, or spiritual isolation.

The impossibility of isolating curselves is apparent as a result of the invasion of a number of European countries. You are aware that European countries possess territories in this hemisphere from the Arctic Ocean to the southern part of the Atlantic Ocean. The possible transfer of these lands from one European power to another European power obviously is of real concern to the United States. The Government of the United States is well aware of this danger. A few days ago the Congress passed legislation providing that the United States would not recognize any transfer, and would not acquiesce in any attempt to transfer, any geographic region of this hemisphere from one non-American power to another non-American power. The bill further provides that if such transfer or attempt to transfer should appear likely, the United States should, in addition to other measures, immediately consult with the other American republics to determine upon the steps which should be taken to safeguard their common interest.

Those who counsel a policy of isolation should bear in mind that we cannot yet foresee the full effect of changes wrought by the European war. We are not sure of all the policies that will be adopted by the war lords if the British Empire should be destroyed. However, we can expect ruthless commercial competition and exploitation backed by military might and an ever-present threat to force submission to a new order.

In the Far East, Japan seems determined to follow up every possible advantage resulting from the European war and is advancing in a southerly direction with the blessing of the Axis powers. It now seems likely that French Indo-China and the Dutch East Indies will fall within the orbit of Japanese influence or domination. In that event, Japan would control important sources of supply of rubber, tin, and quinine, large quantities of which must be imported into the United States. We in this industrialized country cannot continue to enjoy our present standard of living without the free flow of these and other raw materials.

The invasion of Holland, in my opinion, was designed to orphan her colonies and thus give Japan the necessary excuse for the occupation of the Dutch East Indies. Moreover, this move, so skillfully calculated, was intended to deprive the United States of her ability to acquire these raw materials and to weaken us from a military standpoint. The production and free flow of these materials would be controlled to supply the so-called have nots, to the prejudice of industrialized countries like Great Britain, and particularly the United States. The lowering of the American standard of living in proportion to the loss of business would force our people to admit that after all what goes on in Europe and Asia is really a matter of our concern.

One of the most important phases of the foreign policy of the United States is that relating to the other American republics. I think it may be justly said that the present administration has achieved notable successes in our relations with these republics. We voluntarily renounced our right of intervention in Cuba by abrogating the Platt amendment. We withdrew our marines who had been stationed in Haiti. At the Montevideo Conference in 1933 we signed a convention condemning intervention in the internal or external affairs of other nations. We have sought to make effective the principles of liberal and equitable trade policies unanimously approved at the Montevideo Conference.

We took the initiative in suggesting the convocation of the inter-American conference for the maintenance of peace, which was held at Buenos Aires during December 1936, to give permanent effect to the growing friendship and confidence among the American Republics. At this conference the Republics affirmed the principles which were to guide their relations. There was perfected a mechanism for the avoidance and settlement of disputes which might disturb their peaceful relations and for consultation in the event that the peace of the Western Hemisphere is menaced. The 21 American Republics joined in the following declaration:

"That every act susceptible of disturbing the peace of America affects each and everyone of them, and justifies the initiation of the procedure of consultation provided for in the convention for the maintenance, preservation, and reestablishment of peace, executed at this conference."

In December 1938, at Lima, Peru, the American Republics adopted what is known as the Declaration of Lima. By this declaration the Republics pledged themselves to maintain and defend their integrity and independence against any form of aggression from outside this hemisphere.

This Government has developed the ideal of inter-American cooperation in every possible way. Military, naval, or air missions have been sent to a number of American Republics; civilian experts have been loaned to some American Republics to give technical advice, and closer cultural relations are being encouraged by a definite program.

This inter-American cooperation has also been extended to the economic field. In October 1939 the 21 American Republics created the Inter-American Economic and Financial Advisory Committee. This committee, which has recently been meeting in Washington, was set up to study economic problems arising from the war.

All of us now are especially interested in what effect the European war is having upon the Americas. Many new political and economic dangers have been thrust upon the American Republics, singly and collectively. Our Government, in cooperation with the other American Governments, has worked carefully and painstakingly to meet these dangers in order to protect the interests of this hemisphere. Within a few days after the outbreak of the war last September a consultative meeting was convened at Panama. At this meeting various steps were taken to protect this hemisphere from the harmful repercussions of war. Since then, efforts have been unceasing to assure that the Americas present a united front against the forces of aggression. At the present moment, preparations are being made for another meeting of the American Republics to consider problems arising from ominous international developments of recent weeks.

The formulation and execution of foreign policy in a changing world under war conditions are most trying and difficult in a democracy. Under a dictatorship, the will of the dictator is unchallenged and unchallengeable. But it is evident that by the democratic process the people, divided along every conceivable line of thought, give expression to their feeling and even demand alteration of an established policy. In a democracy during a crisis the aims, ideals, and aspirations of the various elements within the nation give expression to those forces within themselves which for years have remained latent or suppressed.

You will realize that these factors make extremely difficult the formulation and execution of foreign policy by our administration, especially in critical times as at present. However, I would not have you believe that there is any weakening of my faith in our representative form of government. These factors are mentioned merely to show the tremendous problems which our Government faces at this time. I am convinced that in the present crisis the divergent elements of the Nation will rise almost solidly to the support of the Government.

Many people in Michigan, as well as in other States, are much concerned lest this country should go to war. You are aware that the Constitution of the United States provides that the power to declare war shall rest with the Congress. As a Member of Congress, I can assure you that neither I, nor any of my colleagues so far as I am aware, would ever vote to declare war unless there was an unmistakable threat to the security of the United States.

The Defense Emergency and the National Labor Relations Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ABE MURDOCK

OF UTAH

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. ABE MURDOCK OF UTAH

Mr. MURDOCK of Utah. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address I made on the National Labor Relations Act:

The mighty figure of war, stalking across two continents, casts its shadow over our land. Abroad the terrible machinery of destruction is loosed and the earth trembles with the violence of a conflict engaging numbers of men so vast that no one mind can direct them or know what they do; a conflict employing engines of annihilation more terrifying than the world has seen. Man's power and knowledge, slowly accumulated for his benefit, is turned to the ugly business of death—death by violence and treachery, death for the participants and the civilians, death for the aggressor and the peaceful, death from the sky and on the ground and beneath the waters. No longer is a good will toward all men a defense against unbridled aggression; peace pacts and the devices of civilization are no guaranty against the terror. Swift and deadly wings draw nearer our shores; news reaches us with the happening of the events, and the rumble of the battle is heard across the water.

An uneasiness stirs our people, for if these things can happen to others, may they not reach us? Thankful for our protected position, we must secure our country against the fate which has befallen others who would be neutral; must see to it that our land is protected from the lightning which strikes in the night. To this end the President has proposed a program behind which a united people is gathered. That program I support; to huge and unprincipled forces we must oppose an unshakable defense sufficient to guarantee our inviolability. Partisanship is forgotten in striving for that objective and our people rise to make it clear that aggression will be beaten back from this hemisphere.

For on two matters there can be no divergence of opinion; as a people we are agreed in maintaining our independence from hostile powers, and in conserving our democratic way of life. The light of democracy is going out throughout the world; some countries have never known it; others, having know it, have relinquished it in the stress of domestic upheavals; and still others, preferring it, have abandoned it under the stress of their war efforts. Alone among the great countries of the world we maintain the hallmarks of the democratic way of life: civil liberties, religious freedom, democratically elected parliaments, free enterprise, free trade-unions, free elections, and a free press. Here alone among the great countries of the world the fire of democracy burns; we must tend that flame that in a day to come it may serve to light again the fires of democracy throughout the world.

We must guard it against the angry blasts that swirl across the ocean; our Navy, our Army, our air force, must be a shield against the foreign threat. To this end is the President's program directed. But even more we must be watchful that domestic groups—those same interests which have opposed every item of the President's wise and beneficent program—do not, under the specious argument of aiding the preparedness program, succeed in tearing down the liberal structure of legislation which has been so laboriously erected during the past 7 years. It is unhappily true that there are at the present time persons so unpatriotic that they would use the national emergency to further their ends. If they succeed in their aims a large part of the democratic liberties bestowed on the people in the last years will be lost. Shall we take steps to protect our democratic way of life from external aggression, and find that a large part of that democracy has disappeared within our borders? Shall we lose our democracy in preparing to defend it?

In this connection I am particularly concerned with the fate of the National Labor Relations Act, the bulwark of one of our great liberties—the freedom of working people to organize unions of their own choosing. For a hundred years this right has been conceded to exist; only for 3 years has it been effectively protected by law, and I need not point out that a right for which there is no remedy is no right at all. Ever since this guaranty was first incorporated in the codes under the National Industrial Recovery Act in 1933, it has met violent opposition from the forces of reaction. A self-constituted court of Liberty League lawyers declared the Wagner Act unconstitutional when it was first passed; the National Association of Manufacturers urged a continuing fight for its repeal; the law was openly and widely defied, and that defiance justified on the ground that the statute passed by Congress was not the law. That opposition, once so bitter, has not disappeared because of the holdings of the courts which have sustained the validity of the law, but is now seeking to accomplish on the floor of Congress what it could not accomplish at the bar of the Supreme Court. In this statute American workingmen have found a new and valuable liberty—freedom to organize and to bargain collectively—which certain interests would now take from them. No longer do those interests call for repeal of the statute, which they know to be politically impossible, but for its amendment—amendments designed ostensibly to "improve its administration" but actually designed so to weaken it that its promises will be nugatory.

And now, in addition to other arguments, they seek to turn the country's struggle for preparedness to their own account and to argue that the act interferes with that need.

A little history proves them wrong. During the World War it soon appeared that the instrumentalities for dealing with labor problems were inadequate. It was employers who first recognized that there should be a governmental agency with power to handle such matters, for it was the National Industrial Conference Board, an employer organization, which, in September of 1917, first suggested the formation of a War Labor Board, in a letter to the Council of National Defense. To carry out the proposal the Secretary of Labor created a War Labor Conference Board, which contained five employer representatives, five employee representatives, and two representatives of the public. In late March 1918, at the very peak of the war, this group unanimously recommended the appointment of a National War Labor Board, and also unanimously adopted a report stating the principles and policies to govern relations between workers and employers in war industries for the duration of the war.[1] Those principles, which were followed by the National War Labor Board, included the following:

"Right to organize: The right of workers to organize in trades-unions and to bargain collectively through chosen representatives is recognized and affirmed. This right shall not be denied, abridged, or interfered with by the employers in any manner whatsoever.

"Employers shall not discharge workers for membership in trade-unions, nor for legitimate trade-union activities."

The principles which I have just stated, which both employer and employee representatives adopted in March 1918 when the entire country was mobilized for war production, are exactly the principles of the National Labor Relations Act.

Real sanctions were provided to make those guaranties to labor effective; in the event the employer refused to comply with an award of the War Labor Board the Government had the power, which it exercised on at least two occasions,[2] to take over and operate the industry in accordance with the principles laid down by the War Labor Board. Today, before an employer is called on to obey any order of the National Labor Relations Board, the Board must first appeal to the courts for an order enforcing the Board's order; no matter how willful the employer's defiance of the Board there is no possibility of the Government taking over and operating his plant.

A comparison of the situation during the World War and today is instructive. Then we were at the peak of war production with every nerve strained to assure an unimpeded flow of goods abroad; today, while our efforts to assure production are great, the necessities are hardly so immediate. During the World War both industry and labor found it necessary to grant labor freedom to organize, for then, as now, the denial of that freedom led to strikes and interferences with production. In 1918, since the crisis was more serious, sanctions were imposed far more drastic than any which exist or which are proposed today. If anything, both business and labor found that freedom to organize was more essential to uninterrupted production in war than in peacetime.

In the light of that experience, how specious are the claims of those who say that the guaranties of the National Labor Relations Act may interfere with our defense program! If there is a lesson to be drawn from this history, it is that the scheme of the act should be supported by even greater sanctions than it carries at the present time. In facing the situation occasioned by our emergency defense needs, the National Labor Relations Act, and an effective and courageous administration of it, stands as one of the first bulwarks against interruptions through strikes and labor disputes. Nor do I, for one, think that the Government should jeopardize the fulfillment of its orders by assigning contracts to firms and persons whose refusal to accept peaceable methods for the settlement of labor disputes may result in strikes and interrupted production. In awarding contracts to such employers the Government runs a substantial risk that orders may not be promptly filled, for all our experience has shown that refusal to accept the principles of collective bargaining is one of the prolific causes of strikes. More, rather than less, freedom to organize; more, rather than less, collective bargaining; more rather than less, effective enforcement of the National Labor Relations Act is our need in carrying through the President's defense program.

For the better part of a year I have had the honor to be a member of the special committee of the House of Representatives to study the operations of the National Labor Relations Act and the administration of the National Labor Relations Board. The three majority members of the committee, whose sincerity I do not question but whose judgment in this instance seems to me misguided, have recommended certain changes in the National Labor Relations Act. My colleague, Representative HEALEY, of Massachusetts, and I have disagreed with these recommendations, which, it seems to us, would go far to deprive American labor of those rights which were thought to be so essential a part of the scheme for carrying the World War through to victory. Representative HEALEY and I can claim a large measure of sympathy for the objectives of the legislation, for we actively supported it when it was before the House of Representatives for passage, whereas the chairman of the committee, who concurs in the majority report, whatever his reasons or however sound those reasons were, voted against its passage when the act was adopted by the Congress.

I have here no time to discuss in detail each of the changes proposed by the majority, nor our reasons for feeling them unwise. I should like to indicate a few of the major proposals, and the manner in which they weaken the administration of the act or the act itself.

First, let me point out that both the great bodies of organized labor have opposed the amendments proposed by the majority of the committee. Immediately upon publication of the majority's recommendations, Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor, issued a statement in which he said:

"The amendments offered by the Smith committee as a whole strike in a destructive way at vital, fundamental principles of the Labor Relations Act. The American Federation of Labor has repeatedly stated and emphasized its opposition to any impairment of the fundamental principles of the Labor Relations Act in any way whatsoever. We again urge and insist that its principles and its fundamentals shall be preserved and protected. The Labor Relations Act still remains the magna carta of labor."

On the same day the Congress of Industrial Organizations, acting in behalf of its affiliated unions, gave out a statement which contained the following comment:

"Not a single amendment contained in H. R. 8813 is supported by the record of the hearings of the special committee to investigate the National Labor Relations Board. No evidence has been produced to justify these emasculatory amendments. The specific proposals are directed toward the destruction of the rights of labor guaranteed by the National Labor Relations Act."

The position taken by these two great labor organizations indicates clearly that labor itself does not consider that the proposed amendments are designed to assure more effective collective bargaining and a better protection of the rights of labor.

One of the principal recommendations of the majority of the committee is a proposal that the obligation of employers to bargain collectively, which is the very keystone on which the act rests, shall be modified in such a manner as to become meaningless. Historically, the duty to bargain collectively has a well-defined meaning which has been adopted by the courts. As one court has said:

"It (the act) contemplates the making of agreements between employer and employee which will serve as a working basis for the carrying on of the relationship. The act, it is true, does not require that the parties agree; but it does require that they negotiate in good faith with the view of reaching an agreement if possible; and mere discussion with the representatives of employees, with a fixed resolve upon the part of the employer not to enter into any agreement with them, even as to matters as to which there is no disagreement, does not satisfy its provisions."[3]

Other courts have adopted the same interpretation of the act. Now the majority proposes that the act be amended so that the only requirement shall be that "an employer or his representatives meet and confer with his employees or their representatives, listen to their complaints, discuss differences, and make every reasonable effort to compose such differences, but shall not be construed as compelling or coercing either party to reach an agreement or to submit counterproposals." Thus, at one stroke the majority would remove any requirement that the employer attempt in good faith to reach a written agreement covering wages, hours, and working conditions; the statutory mandate would be confined to a mere discussion of grievances, and the essence of collective bargaining includes proposals and counterproposals. In the Consolidated Edison case[4] the Supreme Court held that, "The act contemplates the making of contracts with labor organizations. That is the manifest objective in providing for collective bargaining." For years labor has striven to obtain written agreements assuring that certain wages, hours, and working conditions would be maintained. Such agreements reached as a result of collective bargaining are universally held to be desirable; even the majority of our committee does not challenge the importance of the written trade agreement in our industrial life. The refusal to enter into such agreements is a common cause of strikes and industrial disputes; if labor cannot achieve that objective by peaceful procedures under the National Labor Relations Act, it may be anticipated that it will seek to achieve it through the application of economic pressures, and to this extent the amendment invites the substitution of industrial conflict for the orderly processes of collective bargaining.

In various ways the majority seeks to exclude workers from the protection of the act. The most important respect in which this objective is sought to be achieved is by extending the meaning of the term "agricultural laborer." The present act excludes from the jurisdiction of the Board, agricultural laborers, and it is left to the courts to define who is or who is not an agricultural laborer. The majority has proposed that there be excluded from the act certain classes of employees whom the courts have already found not to be agricultural laborers, notably workers employed in the advanced stages of processing and preparing for market agricultural products. Concerning such workers one court has said,[5] "When the product of the soil leaves the farmer, as such, and enters a factory for processing and marketing it has entered upon the status of industry," and the court further commented, "In this status of this industry there would seem to be as much need for the remedial provisions of the Wagner Act, upon principle, as for any other industrial activity."

These workers employed in large packing and canning factories are no more agricultural employees than is the mechanic in a large automobile factory. The act at present in no sense regulates farmers or farm labor; the majority would adopt a fiction that a worker is engaged in agricultural labor even though working in a factory if he works upon agricultural products.

A second way in which the majority would limit the coverage of the act is found in their proposal that the protection of the law be denied "any employee who is shown by a preponderance of the testimony willfully to have engaged in violence or unlawful destruction or seizure of property in connection with any unfair labor dispute or unfair labor practice or in connection with labor organizational activities." This proposal is not wholly indefensible. Both the National Labor Relations Board and the courts have on numerous occasions held that employees guilty of felonies and serious misdemeanors arising out of labor disputes should not be entitled to the protection of the act, and with that principle everyone agrees. The difficulty with the proposal is that it goes too far. During strikes and other labor disputes, tempers rise; scuffles and fist fights may ensue. One of our courts, in considering this problem, used some apt language on the subject:[6]

"We think it must be conceded, however, that some disorder is unfortunately quite usual in any extensive or long-drawn-out strike. A strike is essentially a battle waged with economic weapons. Engaged in it are human beings whose feelings are stirred to the depths. Rising passions call for hot words. Hot words lead to blows on the picket line. The transformation from economic to physical combat by those engaged in the contest is difficult to prevent even when cool heads direct the fight. * * * We accordingly recently held that it was not intended by the act that minor disorders of this nature should deprive the striker of the possibility of reinstatement."

The amendment proposed by the majority would mean that an employee unjustly deprived of his means of employment by an employer for his legitimate union activity could not be reinstated if he had engaged in any kind of violence, however slight, and would, therefore, penalize such an employee not only under the criminal laws of the State and the Nation, but deprive him of the means of earning his living. The work of the Senate Committee on Civil Liberties has shown the extent to which agents provocateurs are used to stir up strife on picket lines in order to discredit the cause of strikers. Such an amendment, proposed by the majority, would mean that an employer could escape his obligation to reinstate men who have gone on strike in protest against the employer's unfair labor practices by the device of hiring agents to stir up trouble with his workers.

Another way in which the majority would withdraw the protection of the act from many workers is by limiting the period for which an employee might receive back pay to 6 months. At the present time, an employee discharged for his legitimate union membership or activity is entitled to receive back pay for the loss he has suffered through the employer's illegal act. While most of these cases are settled by agents of the Board within a short time of their happening, many of them must be decided by the Board after full hearing and, if the employer does not then comply with the order of the Board, must be litigated in the courts. The effect of this proposal would be to transfer the loss in cases lasting more than 6 months from the employer who has violated the law to the employee who is innocent of anything more than exercising his rights under the law. Under such circumstances it is to be expected that employers would fight the Board and their obligations under the law through every step of the courts, since no further liability could accrue while such litigation was pending. Thus labor would be asked to bear the burden of illegal actions by employers. Similar to this proposal is the requirement that charges of unfair labor practices be filed within 6 months after the unfair labor practices have been committed. In many cases employees might not, within the 6-month period, have the evidence which would prove that the employer had acted illegally. This period of 6 months for bringing charges is substantially shorter than the period of limitations for bringing any other kind of legal action, including criminal cases, and would operate to place on labor a burden which no other group in the community is called on to bear.

Section 8 (1) of the act makes it an unfair labor practice for an employer "to interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed" them by the act. The majority of the committee proposes an amendment to this section to provide that nothing in the act "shall be construed or interpreted to prohibit any expressions of opinion with respect to any matter which may be of interest to employees or the general public, providing that such expressions of opinion are not accompanied by acts of coercion, intimidation, discrimination, or threats thereof." This is the so-called free-speech amendment. It will not be denied that we should be zealous to protect the rights of free speech of all classes of our people; we have an adequate guarantee that that right will not be infringed in the first amendment to the Constitution. The National Labor Relations Act as it now stands must be interpreted in such a way that it does not interfere with the constitutional mandate of the Bill of Rights. In the more than 100 cases decided by the courts in reviewing orders of the Labor Board there is not one instance where courts have found that the Board has impinged upon this constitutional right. Whether or not particular language does in any particular instance interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees is a question of fact to be determined in the light of all the circumstances. That determination is always subject to review by our circuit courts of appeals, and if in any instance the Board has interfered with the employers' right in that respect, I know that the courts will be zealous to point out the Board's error. The amendment proposed by the majority would go further than merely protecting the employers' constitutional right of free speech; it would allow "expressions of opinion" which actually did interfere with the employees' exercise of their right to self-organization, without regard to the circumstances under which such "expressions of opinion" were given.

It is worth noting that the justification for many of the amendments proposed by the majority is that they write into the statute the holdings of decisions of our courts. Thus, it is argued that the proposed amendment diluting the strength of the obligation to bargain collectively is justified by the language of Chief Justice Hughes in the Jones & Laughlin case;[7] that the limitation upon the reinstatement of employees guilty of any degree of willful violence is required by the Supreme Court's decision in the Fansteel case;[8] and that the amendment with respect to the employer's right to express his opinions is made necessary by the first amendment to the Constitution. It is hardly necessary to point out that decisions under a statute interpreting the language of the act become themselves standards for future guidance in determining the effect and operation of the statute. No necessity appears for writing into any statute the controlling decisions of the courts intepreting it; indeed, there is always a serious question whether such amendments are merely declaratory of, or are designed to effect changes in, existing law. The instances I have already cited will suffice to show that these ostensibly declaratory amendments proposed by the majority in fact go further in limiting the effective operation of the statute than the courts have gone. By this time, most of the disputed questions under the act have received a settled judicial interpretation; the effect of the proposed amendments would be to introduce confusion and uncertainty in the law for some time to come.

In addition to the substantive amendments which I have outlined, the majority of the committee proposes certain procedural changes. The most important of these would provide for the appointment of an administrator charged with the duty of investigating charges of unfair labor practices, with the issuance of complaints if he has reasonable grounds for believing the charges to be true, with the prosecution of complaints before the Board, with the enforcement of orders of the Board in the courts, and with certain other duties. The Board would be limited to the holding of hearings, making of findings, the issuance of orders, and the supervision of elections. The result would be a division of functions between an administrator, whose tenure would be subject to political considerations, and a Board impotent either to initiate cases or to enforce its orders. Essentially this proposed amendment, which is justified on the ground that it secures a separation of administrative and judicial functions, is an attack upon the entire administrative process. Courts are invested with powers of enforcement; our administrative agencies, including the National Labor Relations Board, are not, but in enforcing their mandates must first seek an enforcing order of a court. The record before our committee shows that the Board already maintains a separation of functions within its organization which adequately safeguards against the possibility of unfairness and yet permits the advantages of a coordinated policy. The procedure of the Board was patterned after that of the Federal Trade Commission and is similar to that of other administrative agencies. At the present time an able commission, headed by Dean Acheson, known as the Attorney General's Committee on Administrative Procedure, is making a thorough and elaborate investigation of the entire administrative process. Its studies will relate the work of the National Labor Relations Board to the work of other governmental agencies, and it may be anticipated that this able commission will produce some thoroughly considered and well-documented proposals with respect to our entire administrative procedure. The problem of the separation of administrative and judicial functions is one broader than the National Labor Relations Act and should be considered in the light of our entire administrative experience. There seems to be no good reason for singling out labor problems for hasty and unconsidered experimentation.

There is no showing that the administrative process, as it has functioned through the National Labor Relations Board, has resulted in any unfairness or lack of due process to parties appearing before the Board. In the Jones and Laughlin case,[9] the Supreme Court said of the procedure under the National Labor Relations Act:

"The order of the Board is subject to review by the designated court, and only when sustained by the court may the order be enforced. Upon that review all questions of the jurisdiction of the Board and the regularity of its proceedings, all questions of constitutional right or statutory authority are open to examination by the court. We construe the procedural provisions as affording adequate opportunity to secure judicial protection against arbitrary action in accordance with the well-settled rules applicable to administrative agencies set up by Congress to aid in the enforcement of valid legislation."

In a more recent case[10] the Supreme Court, in a unanimous opinion, said:

"We have carefully scrutinized this entire record. Within the range of our examination has appeared not merely the testimony but also the procedure followed from the filing of the charge before the Board to the final decree of the court of appeals. The Board and its representatives solicitously guarded respondent's and intervenor's right to a full and fair hearing; manifested liberality in ruling upon evidence prepared by both sides; and conducted the proceedings in a manner calculated to bring about a just result."

The majority of the committee has recommended the abolition of the present Board and the setting up of a new board. Representative HEALEY and I, after considering the record of the Board's administration of the act feel that there is no showing of any facts sufficient to warrant the removal of the present Board members. We have felt that there is widespread controversy and disagreement concerning the propriety of certain policies of the Board, and that a better harmony between the administration of the act and those sections of the public with which the Board deals can be promoted by adding to the present Board two new members with a fresh point of view without losing the continuity of administration of the statute which would result from the removal of the present Board members.

The present act provides that the rules of evidence shall not be controlling in hearings conducted by the Board. This provision is to be found in nearly every statute creating an administrative body, and is designed to prevent the setting aside or retrial of matters merely because some technicality of the rules governing the admission of evidence in jury trials has not been followed. For this provision the majority would substitute a requirement that the rules of evidence shall be observed "so far as practicable." Again, this problem is of general application to all administrative agencies and is not confined to the National Labor Relations Board. Recognized experts on the law of evidence: Dean Wigmore, of Northwestern University, and Professor Morgan, of Harvard, favor the relaxation rather than the extension of the rules of evidence. At the present time, orders of the Board, in order to be enforced by the courts, must be supported by substantial evidence and this broad test of review of the facts is sound. It is the same test recently approved by the Senate Judiciary Committee in its report on the Walter-Logan bill. No facts were shown the committee indicating that there had been an abuse of this provision by the Board, nor does any reason appear why the delicate field of labor relations should be singled out for such an experiment. Practically, under the amendment proposed by the majority, there would be no uniform law of evidence applicable to all Board hearings, but various rules depending upon the State in which the hearing happened to take place, imposing an intolerable burden upon the Board's staff in attempting to familiarize itself with the applicable rules of evidence in all the State and Federal courts.

An allied but somewhat different proposal is also made by the majority. At the present time the Board's orders must be supported by substantial evidence. The majority would require that the Board's findings shall be based upon a preponderance of the testimony, which is merely a restatement of the rule under which the Board operates. Again the majority seeks to write into the statute a requirement imposed by the courts in proposing that the Board's findings of fact shall be deemed "conclusive only if supported by substantial evidence;" they would also empower the courts to invalidate Board findings if "clearly erroneous." It is our opinion that the result of these proposed amendments might well be to permit the courts to weigh the evidence in the case de novo and, to this extent, reverse the traditional function of appellate courts in reviewing the determinations of fact-finding tribunals.

The majority proposes certain changes in the act with respect to the power of the Board to investigate and determine the representatives of employees for the purposes of collective bargaining. They propose that the statute be amended to make clear the employer's right to petition for elections. This right is now granted by the rules and regulations of the Board, and the minority of the committee is in accord with the proposal that it be made part of the statute.

A more serious proposal of the majority would remove the Board's power to determine the appropriate unit for the purpose of collective bargaining where two or more bona fide labor organizations are in substantial disagreement or conflict as to the unit. The result of this proposal of the majority would mean that there would be no tribunal to determine the appropriate bargaining unit when two or more unions disagreed as to what that unit should be. The effect of such a proposal would be that unions, instead of seeking a determination by the Board of the appropriate unit, would be forced to resort to economic action, and to this extent the employer, in the absence of a tribunal to determine the question, might be harassed by strikes between contending unions in a situation in which the employer himself is blameless. The determination of the appropriate unit for collective-bargaining purposes is a highly technical and involved problem. While certain decisions of the Board with respect to the unit have offended one or another branch of organized labor, it is our feeling that its decisions on the whole have been wise and consistent. The record before the committee conclusively establishes that the Board has not favored either the C. I. O. or the A. F. of L. in determining the appropriate unit, and the protection of employers from unwarranted jurisdictional disputes between unions requires that the Board's powers in this respect not be limited.

After the Board has determined the representatives for collective bargaining among a group of employees, the Board is authorized by the statute to certify to the employer the representative of his employees. At the present time such certification is not subject to judicial review. The reason the Congress did not provide for judicial review lies in the experience of the old National Labor Relations Board, which was created by Public Resolution No. 44 in 1934. Under that resolution, Board election orders were subject to review by the circuit courts of appeals; the provision for judicial review so served to delay Board action that during the year of its existence the Board was unable to conduct a single election which was contested in court proceedings. Since elections frequently involve strike situations or circumstances under which strikes are threatened, it is most undesirable to subject them to the delays of lengthy court proceedings, because these election cases do not result in orders against anyone. They do not require anyone to do or not to do anything.

I have here no adequate opportunity to summarize the work of the Board. Up to April 1, 1940, the Board handled 26,941 cases, involving 5,948,103 workers; 2,678 of these were strike cases, involving 433,693 workers, of which the Board settled almost 75 percent. In addition, the Board has averted many hundreds of strikes and has conducted 2,850 elections, in which more than a million votes were cast. It has rendered hundreds of formal decisions. The bulk of its cases, however, have been settled amicably by agreement of all the parties. That it has been fair to employers is attested by the fact that, up to June 30, 1939, 24.3 percent of the charges filed with it have been withdrawn, usually after investigation had shown that the charges had no merit, and that an additional 13.5 percent of the cases have been dismissed by the Board before hearing. Under the protection of the act, organization of workers and the substitution of the orderly process of collective bargaining for industrial strife have made tremendous strides forward. Strikes, and the length and intensity of strikes, have notably decreased since the constitutionality of the act was determined.

The review by the courts of the work of the Board constitutes a very notable record of proof of the general high quality and accuracy of the decisions of the Board.

In the Supreme Court, the Board has been before that Court 26 times in 3 years. The Board's position has been sustained completely 20 times, its orders have been modified four times, and set aside twice, and the principles of the act have been clarified and applied so often by the Board and the courts that there appears no adequate reason for disrupting the increasing pace of acceptance of collective bargaining with its concurrent stabilization of labor relations.

There is this additional observation to be made with respect to the proposals of the majority of our committee. Now, more than at any time in recent years, our national welfare demands national unity. In view of the strong opposition of the organized labor movement to the amendments proposed by the majority of the committee, any adoption of those amendments at this time would be confusing and disquieting.

American workingmen, speaking through the American Federation of Labor and the Congress of Industrial Organizations, have indicated their willingness and readiness to back a program of national defense wholeheartedly. Their patriotism is an unquestioned as is that of the American employers; their love for their country no less. It would be an injustice of the cruelest kind to imply that they are incapable of exercising the freedom granted under the National Labor Relations Act wisely and in the national interest. It would be a delusion to claim that that freedom must be relaxed to speed the defense program. Every consideration of the national welfare, every principle of justice, and every democratic tradition, calls on all fair-minded people to oppose the repeal or unwise amendment of the National Labor Relations Act, or any weakening of its honest administration. The National Labor Relations Act affords a ready and peaceful forum for the adjustment of labor controversies. It is a substitute for strife. It should be upheld and supported—never more than now.

Important Proposals in Congress

SULPHUR RIVER IMPROVEMENT

Mr. PATMAN. Mr. Speaker, I have been working on a proposal to improve Sulphur River, Tex., for a number of years. There were three ways that this improvement could be brought about—

First. The commissioners' court in each county affected by this improvement to get together and agree to put up a sufficient amount for the purpose of getting the work done through the W. P. A.

Second. To get the legislature to create a reclamation district for that area and have the State of Texas put up sufficient money to get the W. P. A. to do the work.

Third. To get the War Department to make a survey and get it done through an appropriation in the National Congress.

The first two plans suggested were not effective because the counties did not supply the sponsor's funds and neither did the State provide for the money, although it did create a reclamation district for the area.

Therefore, I have been trying to get the work done through the Congress, and since it is combined with the Red River project, the outlook is much brighter.

On June 22, 1936, I received congressional approval of a bill providing for a survey of this project. It was again approved June 28, 1938. Also, on June 20, 1938, the Rivers and Harbors Act carried a provision for a survey of Sulphur River, Tex., with a view to improvement for navigation, flood control, and water power. This survey has been made and is now in Washington. The Board of Army Engineers, the Chief of Engineers, and the National Resources Committee are now examining it and will make a report soon.

The Chief of Engineers, War Department, Washington, D. C., in a letter dated June 11, 1940, advised me as follows regarding this project:

The Department is in receipt of your letter of June 6, 1940, in which you inquire as to the status of the proposed improvement of the Sulphur River, Tex.

As you are doubtless aware, the Department is now making a detailed survey of the Sulphur River for flood control pursuant to several congressional authorizations, including those contained in the Flood Control Acts approved June 22, 1936, August 28, 1937, and June 28, 1938, and the River and Harbor Act approved June 20, 1938. The field investigations in connection with this survey have been completed, and the report itself will be included in the comprehensive report on the Red River Basin, which is now being prepared by a special board of officers of the Department, in accordance with the authority contained in a resolution adopted February 25, 1938, by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives.

This comprehensive report on the Red River is scheduled to be received in this office on or about August 1, 1940. It will then be reviewed by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, as required by law, prior to submission to Congress with the recommendations of the Department relative to improvements for the streams in the Red River Basin.

I am greatly interested in this project, and my efforts will continue until we are successful in getting this wonderful area properly improved.

COTTON-CERTIFICATE BILL

In the early part of 1937 I introduced a bill providing for the payment of the 1935 cotton certificates in full.

January 3, 1939, I reintroduced the bill in the House of Representatives providing for redemption of certain cotton certificates issued under the Bankhead Cotton Act. The bill number is H. R. 193, and provides for the full payment of the 1935 cotton certificates, which were issued under the Cotton Control Act, approved April 21, 1934, upon application being made to the Secretary of Agriculture by any producer of cotton to whom the tax-exemption certificates were issued.

The cotton-certificate bill has been endorsed by the Texas Cotton Growers Association and by many local farm associations, but has not been urged by the other larger associations in the National Congress because they claim it would probably lessen their chances to get large appropriations for other purposes. This fear is being overcome and more support is being cultivated for the cause among these groups. We have a further handicap in that the eastern part of the cotton-growing country is not interested in view of the fact that the Eastern States produced a surplus in 1935, and therefore are not interested in paying the cotton certificates where a shortage occurred.

FIGHT WILL CONTINUE UNTIL DEBT PAID

It sometimes requires years of time to sell a good cause to the American people and to the United States Congress. I experienced the same difficulty with the bill providing for the payment of the veterans' adjusted-service certificates, the so-called bonus bill. It required 7 years to convince the people and Congress that this bill should be paid, but finally we succeeded in doing so. I will continue to fight for the payment of these cotton certificates until this just and honest debt is paid by the United States Government 100 cents on the dollar.

Although this the First District of Texas is one of the smallest in the State, it is as large as both Connecticut and Delaware; it is seven-eighths as large as Massachusetts, seven-eighths as large as New Jersey, seven-ninths as large as Vermont, and six times as large as the State of Rhode Island.

It has 100,000 more people than either of the States of Wyoming and Delaware and 200,000 more people than the State of Nevada.

The total inhabitants per square mile, on an average, of the counties are 40.5, which is more than the average for 19 different States.

UN-AMERICAN ACTIVITIES

I was one of the supporters of the resolution providing for the investigation of un-American activities. When the resolution passed the House a committee was appointed, of which the Honorable MARTIN DIES is chairman. This committee has made some startling and astounding disclosures, and by reason of the investigation made by the committee, many foreigners have been deported. Many "fifth columnists" have been sent to the penitentiaries, and many laws have been passed for the purpose of curbing, restricting, and preventing "fifth column" and Trojan horse tactics in our country.

The following editorial from the Beacon, Wichita, Kans., of June 20, 1940, is self-explanatory:

HITLER BOASTED OF "FIFTH COLUMNS"

Speaking recently before the members of the lower branch of Congress, Representative WRIGHT PATMAN used Adolf Hitler's own words to describe the "fifth column" tactics that have proved so successful in most of the countries he has invaded and have even helped to hamper the war activities of England and France. Here is what Hitler said many years ago:

"When I wage war, troops will suddenly appear. * * * They will march through the streets in broad daylight. * * * No one will stop them. Everything has been thought out to the last detail. They will march to the headquarters of the general staff. * * * The confusion will be beyond belief. But I shall have had relations with the men who will form a new government—a government to suit me. We will find such men; we shall find them in every country; we shall not need to bribe them. They will come of their own accord. Ambition and delusion, party squabbles, and self-seeking arrogances will drive them. * * * Our strategy is to destroy the enemy from within, to conquer him through himself."

The words of Hitler apply just as much to the United States as to the other countries who have already felt the disastrous tactics of those enemies within the walls. Hitler can find in the United States, also, men driven by ambition and delusion and self-seeking arrogances. There are hundreds of them, many born Americans or naturalized citizens, who admire the Nazi methods and would gladly duplicate them in this country, provided they could be the ones to put such methods into effect.

Representative PATMAN, in his address before Congress, named a man, supposedly a loyal American, who has been in the employ of the Hitler government since 1933, with the avowed purpose of spreading throughout the Nation the accomplishments of the Nazi regime, and who is at the same time an American Reserve officer in the Intelligence Department.

An America strong within can never be defeated by any foe from without. But if the defenses of this Nation are weakened or destroyed, if disloyal men are allowed to sap the strength and destroy the vitality of the United States by lessening her ability to supply the sinews of defense and by spreading confusion among those still loyal to the American ideals, it will be in accord with the tactics Hitler has employed in other countries.

The United States has been amply warned. Holland waited until the enemy was at its gates before it started a purge of "fifth columnists." Then it was too late. This Nation cannot wait, either. The first duty of national defense is to insure the loyalty of every person in this country and then go speedily to the task of providing defense forces sufficient to defeat any foe.

ARTICLE BY MARK SULLIVAN

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, the following comment by Mark Sullivan in the Washington Post under date of June 29, 1940, tells why Wendell Willkie was nominated at the Philadelphia convention. Mr. Sullivan says:

[From the Washington Post of June 29, 1940]

PEOPLE'S MAN WINS

(By Mark Sullivan)

PHILADELPHIA, June 28.—It was a triumph of reality over phoniness. The reality was that the people wanted Mr. Willkie. The phoniness was the presumed handicaps that stood in his way. Mr. Willkie must not be nominated because he had been a Democrat—that was phony boloney. Mr. Willkie must not be nominated because he was a public-utility man. That was phony two ways: First, Mr. Willkie was not a public-utility man—he was a young lawyer from Akron, Ohio, who was hired by some New Yorkers to run a public-utility company that was having various difficulties; second, it was phony to assume that voters will take the public-utility question into account in a Presidential election next November in which the public-utility issue will not figure in the faintest degree.

* * * * * * *

By yielding to the public demand, the convention saved the Republican Party. More than that, it saved the two-party system. And that is important in a time when the forms and institutions of democratic government are everywhere tumbling or threatened.

That America's two-party system is saved is an invaluable thing. Quite probably the two parties are changed in nature. The Democratic Party, taken over by the new dealers as respects leadership, has gone far in the direction of collectivism, it has become cousin to socialism. At the same time the Republican Party now moves in the direction of what was traditional Jeffersonian democracy. There is in Mr. Willkie much of the Jeffersonian Democrat, including especially his emphasis on individualism. In Mr. Willkie's past political associations and activities, in his writings and speeches and in the big robustness of his personality—in all that lies one conspicuous creed. The individual citizen must not be oppressed or frustrated by big business—but, also, neither must the individual be oppressed or limited by big government.

Wendell L. Willkie

OF

HON. RAYMOND S. SPRINGER

OF INDIANA

Tuesday, July 2, 1940

Mr. SPRINGER. Mr. Speaker, quite often men who hold high office in this Nation permit partisan politics to sway their better judgment respecting their comment regarding their fellow men. Recently the Senator from the State of Florida made quite a speech on the floor of the United States Senate in which he sought to injure Wendell L. Willkie. I doubt if the Senator knows Mr. Willkie, and I am certain he did not know anything concerning his background at the time he made that speech. Other speeches have been made on that same subject by various Members of the House of Representatives. It is a sad commentary we face when men, for the sake of partisan politics, are ready to condemn their fellow man without any investigation of the character of that individual and without any knowledge of or reference to the accomplishments attained in life by the person attacked. Wendell L. Willkie and his attainments stand as a memorial to his eternal struggle in life, and if those who attack him would compare his successive steps from the bottom of the ladder to the top with their own, I am convinced their flimsy speech would be overcome with shame.

Why do these men, all of whom are saturated with the ointment of the New Deal, attack Wendell L. Willkie? They are merely running true to the form of the past; they want to belittle anyone who would seek to restore the American way in our Nation; they believe in the policy of "smear your opponent" regardless of who he is or what he may be.

Who is Wendell L. Willkie? Why do the members of the New Deal make such a vicious attack upon him?

I have known Wendell L. Willkie throughout the major portion of his life, and I know whereof I speak. He was a poor boy; his father and mother were lawyers, practicing in a small rural community. He attended the common and high school, working much of the time at odd jobs to earn his way as far as possible. After he completed his high-school work he entered Indiana University, from which institution he was later graduated. During the period of his work in college, Wendell worked his way; he waited table; he washed dishes; he worked on farms; he worked in factories; he did any kind of work at which he could earn a little money. He learned the value of a dollar in his early life, and he learned the art of balancing a budget. The days were not too long and the pay was never too small for him; he had the initiative to make his way—and he did it. He was not born with any silver spoon; he was unable to live in luxury; but he learned the lessons of life throughout his struggle to secure an education as he worked and toiled—a poor boy trying to do something in life for his country. His effort was crowned with victory, and he completed his work in college. The lessons he learned during that struggle for an education have remained with him. He learned the full meaning of thrift and economy; he learned the struggle of the people; he learned the value of the dollar; and he learned the full meaning of saving in life.

The World War came on. Wendell Willkie was no laggard when his country called; he responded. He knows all of the hardships, the sacrifices, the anguish, and the heartaches of war. He commanded his battery, and he learned of the tragedy of that great conflict, because he heard the whistle of the shells and the clatter of musketry; the barking of machine guns was a familiar sound to him; he was but an American, serving in the American way, doing his bit for his country. Some of those who now attack him—I wonder where they were in 1917–18? Let them examine the record of Wendell L. Willkie in the World War, and let them compare it with their own record. His record is open; the War Department has that record, and the public is entitled to see it and to know it. Let those who condemn Wendell L. Willkie examine that record that they may know the stability of the subject of their scurrilous attack. He is a true American, one who was unafraid to serve his country in time of need.

What has this man Willkie done since the World War which would arouse the bitter condemnation from those who now attack him?

Wendell L. Willkie started as a struggling lawyer, and from the lessons he had learned throughout his struggle for an education, he applied thrift and economy to his daily habits; he succeeded throughout the years. At last he was hired by a large business concern to help bring it out of disaster and despair. Let us remember that Wendell L. Willkie did not secure his place with the Commonwealth & Southern by reason of his large stock holdings, nor by reason of family succession, nor by and through any favor bestowed, but he earned it by reason of his ability to do the job assigned to him. His rapid rise in the field of the law, and his success in his chosen profession, brought him to the attention of those who sought to hire a man who could and would make that company the success it should have been. Wendell L. Willkie was hired, or employed, for that specific purpose. He accomplished the task assigned to him. May I ask those who have made an atttack upon this lawyer, soldier, businessman, and American what there is in this ultra successful life that warrants such an attack as has been made upon him? Is it wrong for men to succeed in life? Is it ground for an attack upon him if he performs his task well? Is it offensive to those who have attacked Mr. Willkie that he has been a true American? I am confident the sole and only answer for those attacks made is that Mr. Willkie is opposed to the New Deal, and he now seeks to save the United States of America for the people.

Mr. Speaker, Wendell L. Willkie, the man of the hour, will be elected President of the United States in the coming election. He will serve with high honor and with great distinction in that capacity; he knows the life of the common people of our country; he knows the struggles of the poor, because he has passed through that same struggle; he is a true patriot—an American; he is a businessman, and he knows and understands the problems of the men and women who work and toil, because he was one of them; he is cognizant of the problems of our farmers, because he has worked upon the farm, and he now owns a farm; he is a lawyer of great ability, and he is familiar with the rules of equity and the policy of the law. He is equipped with those elements which will make him a great president.

May I say, when this great man—Wendell L. Willkie—said: "I pledge a battle for unity, cooperation, and better national defense," he meant just that. He meant that our national defense program should be entirely honest; that it should be sound; and that those who are responsible for the spending of the people's money should make a true and accurate accounting thereof, and that our Government should receive $1 in value for every dollar spent for national defense. Wendell L. Willkie is grounded in honesty; he believes in the United States of America, and when he speaks, in the future, the people will find every utterance to be truthful. He is but a humble, honest, fearless American who believes in the American way. So we have the man—Wendell L. Willkie—who will go forward to victory in November.

Adjournment Unwise

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OVERTON BROOKS
OF LOUISIANA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 4, 1940

ARTICLE BY MARK SULLIVAN

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following short article by Mark Sullivan in the Washington Post of July 2, 1940:

[From the Washington Post of July 2, 1940]

CONGRESS AND THE CRISIS

(By Mark Sullivan)

It is proposed that Congress adjourn until January.

At a time when all over the world the very existence of parliamentary government—government by a representative elected body—is in question; when it is claimed that parliamentary government must die because it is too cumbersome, too dilatory, too lacking in quick responsiveness; when in country after country parliamentary government is extinguished to make way for totalitarian government—at such a time it is proposed that the American Congress efface itself for 6 months.

If Congress effaces itself for 6 months, especially the 6 months just ahead, Congress should not be surprised to find some of its temporary self-effacement last longer than Congress intended. That is a strong thing to suggest. In face of the present condition of the world, such an apprehension is not too greatly exaggerated. For Congress to go home now would be regular; it is usual for a Congress to adjourn from midsummer to the following January. But for this Congress to adjourn at this time, considering the condition of the world, would have the nature of abdication, or at least of Congress taking its function lightly. The present state of the world is no time for parliamentary bodies to suspend functioning, even temporarily. It is a time for parliamentary bodies to function with especial watchfulness and thoroughness, to prove that they deserve to survive.

During the spring, preceding the dramatic turn which the war abroad took on May 11, it was assumed that Congress would adjourn before the Republican National Convention and remain adjourned until January. With the spirit of crisis which came with the German invasion of Holland, Belgium, and France; with our embarking upon a program of preparedness, question was raised whether Congress should adjourn. President Roosevelt at a press conference expressed the belief there was no imperative necessity for Congress to stay in Washington; he said, rather lightly, that there was little they could do other than speech making, and that if necessity arose, he would call them back in special session.

But in Congress and throughout the country, the conviction grew that Congress should remain in session. When the Republican Convention neared, Congress recessed for the week of the convention, returning Monday of this week. Again it is proposed that as the Democratic Convention approaches, 2 weeks hence, Congress should again either recess or adjourn. If recess, Congress would return after the Democratic Convention; if adjournment, it would be until January.

To many members, adjournment appeals. The whole House and one-third of the Senate are up for reelection (except such as have failed of renomination or are retiring voluntarily). All are conscious of the desirability of making personal campaigns in their States and districts. If constituents understand the desirability of Congress remaining in session, they will not be likely to penalize Members unable to make personal campaigns.

The desirability of Congress remaining in session is suggested by an episode during last week's recess. Our Navy, acting with the best intention, with a disposition shared by much of the country, took a step of a kind likely to be helpful to Britain. Certain vessels under construction for our Navy were turned back to the manufacturer, making it possible for the manufacturer to sell these vessels to Britain. Our Navy, of course, supposed it had the right to do this. But when the action was discovered by a committtee of Congress, the Senate Naval Committee, question was raised about the legality of the transaction. Upon inquiry, the Attorney General reported that the action was not legal. Thereupon President Roosevelt canceled it.

Such incidents, arising in the shadowy area where Executive power and congressional power overlap, are likely to be numerous during a period of hurried preparedness against war. If Congress is here and regards a proposed action as wise, Congress can legalize the action. If Congress is not here, necessity for haste by the Executive department may result in distortion of the relations between Executive and Congress.

Mr. Speaker, I am definitely against adjournment as long as the present crisis continues. Only yesterday the President has asked Congress for appropriations about $5,000,000,000 additional money for the Army expansion. Next week the Military Affairs Committee of the House will begin the consideration of a universal military training bill. Other matters of equal importance press upon Congress for immediate attention.

In the face of the necessary action which Congress should take on important legislation, and in the face of this appalling crisis in the world, I believe we should continue in session. I make this statement in spite of the fact that our primary election in Louisiana is set by law for September 10, and I am a candidate for reelection. Should Congress continue in session it will not be possible for me to go home and contact the people of my district in Louisiana. As between politics and a most tragic crisis I make the decision in favor of staying on the job and doing my part in giving this Nation the legislation which is needed so urgently at this critical time. As to my campaign for reelection, the people of Louisiana who know and understand the international situation must and will carry on for me during my absence.

Comprehensive Defense in Alaska

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ANTHONY J. DIMOND

DELEGATE FROM ALASKA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 4, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE FAIRBANKS DAILY NEWS-MINER

Mr. DIMOND. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following short editorial from the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner, Thursday, June 6, 1940:

[From the Fairbanks Daily News-Miner of June 6, 1940]

COMPREHENSIVE DEFENSE OF ALASKA

While attention is focused in Kodiak, Dutch Harbor, Sitka, Fairbanks, and Anchorage as key positions in the defensive set-up for Alaska, and millions are being appropriated for the purposes, it is well to keep in mind they are not the only points in this vast Territory to be guarded.

Alaska, with her total area of some 600,000 square miles and 26,000 miles of coast line sprawling crablike from Ketchikan to Point Barrow and from the Rockies to the tip of the far-reaching Aleutians, offers many a vulnerable point that may be regarded as a possible gateway or a strategic location spot for enemy invaders.

Warships may cruise the coastal lines and be prepared to dash from point to point, bombing and pursuit planes may keep poised at the main land bases, and antiaircraft guns be held in readiness, together with troops and heavy guns, but there are numerous other centers to keep in mind—Bethel, Nome, Point Barrow, and others.

Once air fleets are in the air, they may not find it convenient to return to home bases when bad weather or other adverse conditions prevail.

As originally announced the Alaska "air base" contemplated a network or composite set-up of main and auxiliary bases all over the Territory. In carrying out a comprehensive program the auxiliary stations cannot be excluded. Congress has made a good start in the face of menacing conditions, but that is not all-essential in the premises. To complete the task and make Alaska 100 percent safe, many a new unit must be provided in the less conspicuous localities.

And, to coordinate the whole, provide for all units of defense to function in unison, maintain life lines of supply, and means of land, air, and sea transport many other essentials must be kept in mind. Inland highways cannot be ignored as among the essentials. The whole scheme of adequate defense calls for the best that Uncle Sam can provide—and Europe affords the lesson of what it might mean if the matter is neglected.

Communists

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

Thursday, July 4, 1940

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, when the W. P. A. theater project was killed last year, largely because of serious penetration by Communists, Congress assumed that the members of the profession would undertake a house cleaning. Instead, as recently as last May 24, an avowed Communist, Sam Jaffee, was elected to the governing council of Actors' Equity Association. Representatives of this association appeared before House and Senate Appropriation Committees urging the reinstatement of the theater project in the relief program. Jaffee was elected May 24, 1940, in preference to an outstanding American actress, Tallulah Bankhead, at the annual meeting in New York City of Actors' Equity, where according to the official report as published in the June issue of Equity, "a disappointingly small turn-out of scarcely 350 members attended." While only a small minority, the voting power is thus in the hands of Communists and fellow travelers in the New York City area, and there has been a growing rather than a diminishing trend of communistic influence in the theater. Seven Communists are now on the governing council of Equity, Sam Jaffee, Philip Loeb, Emily Marsh, Hiram S. Sherman, Leroy MacLean, Edith L. Van Cleve, and Alan Hewitt.

Other key positions in the profession have been taken over by Communists. George Heller is now executive secretary and treasurer of the Radio Actors Guild. The new executive secretary of the American Guild of Variety Artists is Hoyt Haddock, a former C. I. O. organizer of distinct Communist sympathies, whose appointment was protested by the A. F. of L.

House Joint Resolution 544 strikes Communists and Nazis from the relief rolls, but here is a situation where Communists are occupying high places in a profession which Congress would undoubtedly be glad to help if we had the means of weeding them out. Innocent and deserving actors and actresses all over the country are thus being penalized, and there will be no W. P. A. theater project as long as this condition is permitted to exist. As a member of the subcommittee on this measure, I can see no Federal assistance forthcoming under these conditions.

ARTICLE FROM THE UNITED STATES NEWS

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I include the following brief sketch on the life of my beloved fellow Oregonian appearing in the United States News in the issue of July 5, 1940:

[From the United States News of July 5, 1940]

LIBERAL RUNNING MATE FOR MR. WILLKIE—CHARLES L. M'NARY, VICE PRESIDENTIAL CANDIDATE MORE A PATRIOT THAN A PARTISAN TO POLITICAL OPPONENT

In the Capitol Barber Shop late last week, smiling, scholarly CHARLES LINZA MCNARY was getting a shave and having his red hair trimmed. Reporters rushed in and asked the Senate minority leader whether he would accept the nomination for Vice President on the Republican ticket. Then, in his slow, easygoing, deliberate way, Oregon's favorite son grinned and answered, "If it is in the nature of a draft, I will be a good soldier and do my part." Three hours later he was nominated.

The Republican vice presidential candidate has spent a score of his 66 years on Capitol Hill. He has, incidentally, never seen nor met Wendell Willkie (People of the Week, United States News, June 28). Today, Senator MCNARY is recognized as one of the ablest and most popular Members of Congress, especially with the newspapermen, for whom he is always a reliable source of news.

He is a silent, undemonstrative tradition-breaker who believes in a liberalized and socialized Republican Party. Senator MCNARY has voted for scores of New Deal laws, but has always turned thumbs down on all tinkering with the monetary and tariff systems. He dislikes, in particular, the reciprocal trade agreements program. Former President Hoover, who was a college chum of "CHARLEY" MCNARY at Stanford University, once dubbed him "a shade too radical"; and Postmaster General James A. Farley, in 1936, characterized the Senator as "more a patriot than a partisan."

As the Senate minority leader, "Mac" has played long-range politics, has turned both cheeks to his enemies. His colleagues have noted and praised his objective, tolerant, even charitable attitude. And they have liked his informality, his lack of pontifical solemnity. Within the Republican Party he has remained a regular—but always in the liberal zone.

A keen observer of human nature, Senator MCNARY has been particularly adept at conciliation and unification. Many times he has been a sharp critic of the New Deal, but he has always made his criticism specific, citing chapter and verse. One of the least bellicose of the minority—he seldom makes a speech—he has been one of the most effective.

The new nominee has summed up his political philosophy as follows: "Regardless of changes of name and shifts within the organization, the party that stands for well-managed public finance, a reasonable and helpful attitude toward business, and a pursuit of social progress through true federalism—not authoritarianism, but cooperation on practical lines—that party has had a fairly continuous history, and that history will continue, I am sure, for a long time to come."

Mr. MCNARY is one of the most urbane figures in the Senate. He is tall, handsome, and assured. Impeccably groomed, he is usually voted the best-dressed Member of the upper House. At the same time, the Senator is a dirt farmer, one of the few who make farming pay. His interest in agriculture is personal, not academic. Between sessions, on his 600-acre fruit ranch near Salem, Oreg., he carries on extensive plant-breeding experiments. To his credit is the development of the "imperial prune"—as well as the introduction of the filbert industry to his State.

Mr. MCNARY was born on a farm outside Salem in 1874, and was educated at the local public schools before entering Stanford, where he remained for 2 years. Then he began a law career, having been admitted to the Oregon bar in 1898. Aside from practicing with his brother, he began to teach, serving as dean of Willamette College of Law from 1908 to 1913. From Willamette University, the University of Oregon, and Linfield College, he received the degree of doctor of laws.

The Senator's entry into politics was as an assistant district attorney. Then for 2 years he served as an associate justice of the Oregon Supreme Court. Before his appointment to the United States Senate in 1917 to fill an unexpired term, Mr. MCNARY acted as chairman of his Republican State central committee.

Once the campaign gets under way, the Republican candidate will have to toss aside his favorite pastimes; romping on the floor with his 5-year-old daughter, cultivating his fruits and flowers; shooting a round of golf; reading on the veranda or before his fireplace with its kettle and 4-foot logs; wandering beneath the huge Douglas firs of his Oregon ranch.

ARTICLE FROM THE CHICAGO TRIBUNE

Mr. CLEVENGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Sunday Chicago Tribune of June 30, 1940:

[From the Chicago Sunday Tribune of June 30, 1940]

THE CROWNING DISSERVICE TO AMERICA

Mr. Roosevelt's crowning disservice to his country may be completed here in Chicago in a little over 2 weeks. He has permitted the time for the Democratic Convention to approach without disavowing an intention to seek a third term. Whatever may be in his mind, he has encouraged the assumption that he will be the first President in an eighth year of office to ask for 4 years more.

This behavior comes at a time when it adds grave domestic uncertainties to the grave problems presented the country from abroad. It offers a political issue which, if pressed to a conclusion by the nomination, will divide the Nation violently.

There is no doubt of the ability of the American democracy to take the accustomed political campaign in the usual stride, regardless of events abroad. The American people are not so unstable as yet that they cannot exercise their political rights and make their decisions even in such calamitous times as the present. They ought not, however, to be presented at this time, for the first time in their experience, with a constitutional issue touching the integrity, as the most thoughtful citizens see it, of their form of government.

We say it is a constitutional question, although the Constitution says nothing about it. In this one respect our Constitution resembles the British. It has had this unwritten stipulation. It has been respected by Mr. Roosevelt's predecessors, none of whom as he finished his second term has ever asked his party for a third, and no party has seriously considered a 12-year stretch for any occupant of the White House for whom it was responsible.

The ambitions of Grant and the ambitions of Theodore Roosevelt did not take this form, and the Republican Party has not created any precedents to which Mr. Roosevelt might appeal. He is the first man who could be accused of the desire to perpetuate himself in office beyond the period to which our understanding of American government confines the aspirations of a man who has been twice elected Chief Executive.

It may be Mr. Roosevelt's intention not to permit the Democratic Convention in Chicago to nominate him. The disservice he has done his country already is to permit the conviction to grow that he will be nominated, that he desires to be, and that he will try by the methods and resources peculiar to his own administration to keep himself in power. It is assumed that he has already so entrenched himself in the extraordinary authority attained during his administration that he can get whatever he commands the convention to give him.

The very misfortunes which the country has suffered under his maladministration of its finances have been converted into political domination. The debt, the deficits, and the increased taxation have built up a political machine by grants and subsidies which is powerful enough to control a delegate convention if the dispenser of the public funds intends to continue in office. It is to be feared that good judgment and the public spirit of Democrats, who oppose the perpetuation of Executive authority at this time as much as any Republican, cannot be made effective in a convention ruled by the beneficiaries of Mr. Roosevelt's ruinous policies.

Mr. Roosevelt could have cleared the atmosphere months ago by the simple statement that he recognized the force of the unwritten constitution and that he respected the sound reasons represented by that tradition and usage. He has been more emphatic than anyone else in the country in speaking of the dangers supposed to be flowing in our direction from the uncontrollable passions and destructive forces which are destroying a large part of the world.

If he were considerate of his country he would recognize that if half he says of this should be true, he could not in good conscience lead the people into a graver doubt as to the permanence of the Government they suppose still exists in the United States. He would not raise the question of a dictatorship at a time when dictators, as he says, menace the liberties of all people.

It is impossible for America to feel secure in its foreign policies and its foreign relations until it can feel more secure in the durability of its form of government here. No patriotic man would add to the confusion in the public mind by allowing his ambitions to give a political campaign an issue of liberty at home when liberties are so threatened abroad.

The third term is promoted by men whose real motive is to change the political and social order here. They seek the reelection of Mr. Roosevelt not only to save their own places of profit and authority but to complete the revolution which they have under way.

The theory of indispensability never arose in circumstances which made it more incongruous or ridiculous. The fact is that even this resourceful Nation, in the most peaceable times, might find it impossible to endure 4 more years which ran the identical course of the other 8. The two terms will prove the indispensability of putting another man in charge of this Nation's affairs. The country must have a change in the White House unless it is to suffer a complete change in its political, social, and economic order.

We doubt very much that the American Republic could pull through another 4 years under Mr. Roosevelt, and we doubt that it is the intention of the third termers that it should. If the convention in Chicago should renominate Mr. Roosevelt, the delegates to that convention will have announced to the country that it is their intention to invite the occurrence in the United States of what happened in Germany and in Italy.

Mr. Speaker, as we flounder hither and thither in our belated preparations for national defense and preparedness, the same old ineptness of the New Deal becomes increasingly apparent.

As we attempted to meet depression by grandiose planning and wishful thinking, and after 7 tragic years of deficit spending find ourselves only deeper in the depression mire, while staggering debts weaken our resources and millions of our people are left with a dependency complex, so we seem to approach this great crisis.

With grandiose talk of "5,000,000 men under arms in 18 months," "50,000 fighting planes" right off the bat, conscription of our women, with training under an acknowledged former "red."

Why can we not have sensible planning to arm our enlarged Regular Army and National Guard with the best mechanical aids in all the world? The expansion of the training of pilots under Army and Navy direction and the expansion of our trained mechanics right in our shops, to properly, sensibly, and economically expand our industrial machine to meet any emergency?

May we not have an administration that believes in American industrial organizations? That will harness the might of America for preparedness for peace?

May we not have an end to this starry-eyed planning that never comes to any fruition except failure and disillusionment? O Mr. Speaker, let us really mobilize the might of this Nation in defense of our homes and our representative government now so seriously threatened.

EDITORIAL FROM THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, under date of July 3, 1940, the Christian Science Monitor comments editorially on the nomination of Wendell Willkie at Philadelphia, and points out that the people demanded his selection. The editorial is as follows:

[From the Christian Science Monitor of July 3, 1940]

POPULAR POLITICS

One of the weaknesses of the Republican Party in the past has been the dominance of the old guard in party management and finance. In 1936 the Cleveland convention nominated a genuine liberal and there was hope that Governor Landon would win the independents, the young people and sound liberals. That hope was stifled when reactionary control of the party organization ruined the Landon campaign. This year an even greater hope has been aroused by the Willkie nomination, and the news indicates that old guard control, broken at Philadelphia, will not be reestablished in the campaign.

First is the candidate's insistence that contributions should be limited to $5,000. Second is his tentative plan for a triumvirate, composed of the party's national chairman, a campaign manager, and a personal representative of the candidate, to direct the campaign. Two of these would be selected by Mr. Willkie, who is reported to be looking for a campaign manager who will represent the newer element in politics.

It was this element of enthusiastic young Republicans and people who had never taken much part in politics that won the nomination for Mr. Willkie. They aroused and organized a popular demand that smashed old political machines right and left. It is this element which can win the election. We believe the Republican candidate is wise enough and strong enough to keep it manifestly in control of his campaign.

In his present moves he is in two senses making politics popular.

An Old Book and a Prayer

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 3, 1940

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, a few hundred feet from the place where I am standing, in a specially designed ornamental case, rests a book which is one of the most outstanding relics of all of the ages. For this book the Government of the United States in 1930 paid $1,000,000. As the years come and go countless thousands of our people, intermingling with pilgrims from all over the world, pause reverently and admiringly to feast their eyes on this ancient tome.

The book to which I refer is entitled to the high estimation and the special consideration accorded to it in the opinion of mankind for several reasons:

First. It is the Word of God, in which nearly 700,000,000 people on the surface of the earth rest their hope of resurrection and life everlasting.

Second. It is distinctive because it is the first book ever printed. When we contemplate the vast libraries and the countless volumes of printed works now individually owned throughout the world this, the first book ever printed, rivets and holds the imagination. In the Library of Congress alone it is today surrounded by 5,000,000 other books.

Third. It is distinctive because of the place where it was printed.

And where was it printed?

In Germany.

The Germany of the ancient devotion and reverence for the Word of God.

The Germany of Martin Luther.

Walter B. Conkey, of Indiana, one of the greatest of American publishers, once said:

If there is an inanimate object that possesses a living soul, it is a book.

If this may be said of secular books how much more certainly must it hold true with reference to the Word of God?

Is it possible, I wonder, looking through the eyes of faith, to conceive that the Gutenberg Bible may have a soul so powerful that it may inspire emotions and reactions that will rescue the world from the crucible of war and death and destruction into which it has fallen? I would like to imagine that there is such a potentiality about that book. I wish that some afternoon soon Members of Congress, when the news from the shambles of Europe is especially depressing and the weight of the world is heavy upon their hearts, would adjourn their deliberations, walk across the Capitol lawn to the Library of Congress, place their hands on the old Bible, and pray. Perhaps the magic touch of that Bible would convince them that there is a better way to settle the world's troubles than mass murder. I can suggest a prayer which I think would be appropriate:

"Our Father in Heaven, who created the universe and who taught us the fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man, who said to us in the book on which our hands rest, 'Thou shall not kill; thou shall love thy neighbor as thyself,' and 'peace be with you,' please, we humbly beseech Thee, curb the reign of tyrants, end the Age of Butchery, and bring the minds and hearts and understandings of men into harmony with Thy divine purpose, to the end that the world, which is leaping toward destruction, may be rescued and saved by Thy divine grace. For Thine is the kingdom and the power and the glory forever. Amen."

America Needs Preparedness, Not Politics

OF

HON. PAT HARRISON

OF MISSISSIPPI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, July 5, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES F. BYRNES, OF SOUTH CAROLINA

Mr. HARRISON. Mr. President, on the evening of July 3 the able Senator from South Carolina [Mr. BYRNES] discussed over the Blue Network of the National Broadcasting Co. the program of national defense in the light of the declaration of the recent Republican convention and the statements of distinguished members of the Republican Party on that subject. The address is especially pertinent at this time as showing the necessity for divorcing preparedness from politics, and I ask unanimous consent that it may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

To every one of you—to every American—national defense is not a partisan issue: It is a national necessity.

We all share its costs. We will all share catastrophe if it fails. And so that it may not fail we must all understand, as a part of defense, the truth about defense.

What I shall say from now on I shall say not in the spirit of partisanship but in the spirit of regret. I shall say it not in the spirit of planting poison in the minds of the people from the Democratic point of view, but of neutralizing with the truth poison that unfortunately has been planted with the public for Republican partisan advantage.

The Republican Convention in Philadelphia last week, in the platform approved by its candidates, solemnly declared:

"The Republican Party stands for Americanism, preparedness, and peace. We accordingly fasten upon the New Deal full responsibility for our unpreparedness and for the consequent danger of involvement in war."

That charge in another nation would be considered "fifth column" activity. It gives the impression to foreigners and to our own people that America is unprepared to the degree of inviting attack. It thus plays into the hands of those who would follow a policy of defeatist appeasement toward Germany by trying to buy Hitler off rather than manfully holding Hitler off. And it is a serious indictment to bring against the Democratic Party, since it tells the American people that we are in danger of being involved in war because of the policies of the Democratic Party.

Since such an assertion can be sustained only by evidence, it must be refuted by evidence. Let us take up what the Republicans said and then examine the evidence.

Former President Hoover addressed the convention. He asserted that in the 6 years preceding the Roosevelt administration we had spent about $680,000,000 a year on preparedness, and said, "And in 1934 he (Roosevelt) drastically reduced our defense to $550,000,000, lopping off $20,000,000 from the Air Corps alone."

Mr. Hoover, the country in its respect for you as the only living ex-President, has a right to expect more of you. The fact is that it was you and not Mr. Roosevelt who was responsible for this perilous economy of 1934.

You know perfectly well that the fiscal year 1934 began July 1, 1933, and ended June 30, 1934. The Treasury could issue checks during that year only for funds that had been appropriated by the Congress in the appropriation bills. The appropriation bills providing funds for the Army and the Navy for the fiscal year 1934 establishing the reductions you charge to President Roosevelt were signed by you, Mr. Hoover, during your last week in office.

Have you forgotten your own Budget message to the Congress for that fiscal year 1934? Then let me refresh your recollection. This is what you said: "Excluding all items of a nonmilitary nature, the estimate of appropriations contained in this Budget for national defense under the War and Navy Departments amounts to $586,447,000 as compared with appropriations of $632,466,000 for 1933, which indicates a decrease of $46,019,000." And you then proceeded to boast of these reductions for the Navy and the Army, calling attention to the fact that one reduction was made possible by your reducing the number of armory drills for the National Guard from 48 to 24, and another by reducing the amount for the citizens' military training camps.

Mr. Hoover charged that in 1934 President Roosevelt reduced the number of naval commissioned graduates by one-half.

Mr. Hoover, that is a misstatement also.

On May 6, 1932, you, Mr. Hoover, as President, approved a special act specifically authorizing the President to commission all graduates of the 1932 class, but providing for the commissioning of only 50 percent of the graduates in subsequent years. Therefore, President Roosevelt could legally commission only 50 percent of the Annapolis graduates of 1933.

But within the calendar year of 1933 President Roosevelt requested and Congress gave him the power to commission that other 50 percent of the 1933 Annapolis graduates, whom he could not commission by reason of the law which you, Mr. Hoover, approved and created. A man who has been President of the United States may be mistaken about his own mistakes, particularly one who has made many mistakes. But he should not be so mistaken that he attributes them to others.

Mr. Hoover's third charge to the Republican convention:

"Other military leaders say to the Congress we are not organized for modern war. We do not have more than 75,000 fully equipped men."

That was an unfortunate misstatement, Mr. Hoover.

The facts are, according to General Marshall, the Chief of Staff—and not a politician—that we have in the Regular Army, not 75,000, but 236,150 fully equipped men. This does not include the 250,000 men in the National Guard. Recently we provided the funds to increase the Regular Army to 375,000, and each week thousands of young men are being recruited to provide this force.

Mr. Hoover's fourth charge as a spokesman for the Republican Party:

"Despite the growing menace in the air and the expenditure of $350,000,000 on the air force in the last 6 years, General Arnold says not half a dozen of our Army planes are modern."

This is a regrettable twisting of overscrupulous language of the splendid Army officer in charge of our air service.

General Arnold advises me that today we have on hand 2,943 airplanes. Most of these were procured prior to the present world conflict and therefore do not embody all of the very latest improvements proved desirable day by day in the fighting across the sea. By that test there are very few completely up-to-date planes in the world. Our combat planes are being modernized in the light of events abroad. Those being delivered weekly under the expansion program of 1939 are of a type recently used successfully in Europe and are even now being procured by foreign governments from manufacturing establishments in this country, clearly indicating they are of modern combat type.

But this is not all.

The keynoter of the Republican convention, Governor Stassen, charged that the President of the United States, in a speech delivered by him over the radio on May 27, 1940, had attempted to deceive the people by quoting figures as to planes and other matériel "on hand and on order." The following night Mr. Hoover indulged in ridicule of the President for using this phrase and by implication approved of what Governor Stassen said.

Petty, Mr. Hoover; petty.

Governor Stassen did not know better. Never having been President, there was no reason why he should know how records of matériel are kept in the accounting records of the Army and Navy.

But, Mr. Hoover, you knew perfectly well that the accounting records of the Navy classify ships as "built and building." And you knew perfectly well that the accounting records of the Army classify Army supplies, matériel, as "on hand and on order."

So you knew perfectly well that President Roosevelt in referring to planes as "on hand and on order" was reporting to the people in the exact language in which the Army and Navy report to the President and to the Congress.

You knew it because in your Budget message to Congress of your last year in office you asked the Congress for 375 new planes, which you said "will give the Air Corps a total of 1,537 airplanes on hand and on order on June 30, 1934." And as far back as 1931, in your message to the Congress, you said: "This program calls for 1,515 planes to be on hand and on order on June 30, 1931."

When you used the phrase, Mr. Hoover, I am glad that no Democrat charged you with endeavoring to deceive the American people.

When the Republican platform says it "fastens upon the Democratic Party responsibility for our unpreparedness," let us see what are the facts as to party responsibility in this matter of defense.

In the 7 calendar years succeeding 1933 your Government under President Roosevelt has invested $1,292,000,000 more than was spent on the Army the previous 7 years.

In the same 7 years your Government has invested $1,478,000,000 more than was spent on the Navy during the preceding 7 years.

These increases were desperately necessary because during the preceding years under the Republicans our national defense had been neglected.

Bear with me a moment while I go through some figures.

Our naval expenditures in the fiscal year 1921, the last fiscal year for which appropriations were made while Franklin D. Roosevelt was Assistant Secretary of the Navy, amounted to $963,000,000.

In the first year of the succeeding Republican administration it cut them in half—down to $485,000,000. And down they continued to go until in the fiscal year 1934 they reached the low of all time, $266,000,000; approximately one-quarter of what they had been under the Democrats. The appropriations for that fiscal year 1934 were made under the Budget submitted by Herbert Hoover.

What do all those appropriation figures mean in terms of ships?

As a result of limitation of the armament conference in 1922, we destroyed some of our battleships, and we did not lay down a single battleship for construction during the three administrations of Harding, Coolidge, and Hoover.

During these 12 years, we completed only 20 combatant naval vessels, cruisers, submarines, and gunboats.

What is the record of this Democartic administration? During the last 4 fiscal years alone, we have completed 115 combatant naval vessels. We now have built the most powerful single navy in the world.

In addition we have at this very moment actually building 10 battleships, 5 aircraft carriers, 4 heavy cruisers, 17 light cruisers, 61 destroyers, and 41 submarines—a total of 138 additional vessels.

What do those appropriation figures mean in terms of men?

On March 4, 1929, when the last Republican administration came into power, the Navy had 84,986 enlisted men. When Mr. Hoover left the White House, the Navy was down 4,000 men from that. Today we have in the Navy 143,628 enlisted men.

In the Marine Corps, on March 4, 1929, when the last Republican administration took charge, we had 19,790 fighting marines. When Mr. Hoover went out of office March 4, 1933, the marines were down 4,000 men from that. By June 25 of this year we had increased the force to 27,500 men—almost double the 1933 figure.

What about the Army? On February 28, 1929, a few days before Mr. Hoover became President, we had 128,621 enlisted men. During his 4-year administration he reduced this number by approximately 4,000 men. On June 5, 1940, we had increased the Army to 236,150 men, almost twice as many as Mr. Hoover bequeathed us, and we were daily recruiting to reach 375,000.

"Oh, well," the Republicans may say, "what has happened in the past doesn't matter. What has happened since Munich is what counts. And since Munich the Republican Party by its action has justified the claim that it is the party of preparedness."

Well, let us see what is the recent record of the parties. Let me remind you that it is actual votes in Congress, not spread-eagle statements in the press, which pass national-defense bills.

On May 3, 1938, 6 months before Munich, there was a vote in the United States Senate to provide funds to maintain the Navy during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1939. Without this bill, not one dollar would have been provided for the Navy. Every naval vessel would have had to leave the sea, every shore establishment would have been closed, and every officer and sailor would have been forced to discard the uniform.

The bill passed by a vote of 56 to 28.

But of the Republicans who voted in the Senate, only 7 voted for the bill and 9 voted against it.

Among those who voted against appropriating funds for the Navy were, believe it or not, two distinguished gentlemen who were placed in nomination at the Republican convention—the Republican candidate for Vice President, Senator McNARY, and the maker of Wendell Willkie, Senator VANDENBERG. Had the issue been left for decision by the Republicans of the Senate, by a vote of 9 to 7, not one dollar would have been provided for the Navy.

On March 6, 1939, 6 months after Munich, there was a vote in the Senate on increasing the number of Army airplanes from 5,500 to 6,000. Fifteen Republicans voted. Nine were against the increase, only 6 for it. Among the Senators voting against the increase in the number of airplanes were again the Republican candidate for Vice President, Senator McNARY, and Senator VANDENBERG.

On March 7, 1939, on the final passage in the Senate of the bill providing for the national defense, of 8 votes cast against the bill, 4 were Republican and one was Farmer-Labor.

On May 18, 1939, after Austria had been absorbed and Czechoslovakia invaded, the Navy appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, without which there would be no funds for the Navy, passed the Senate by a vote of 61 to 14. Of the 14 opposed to providing any funds for the Navy, 7 were Republicans, 1 Progressive, and 1 Farmer-Labor. Of the total number of Republicans voting, 10 voted for the passage of the bill and 7 voted against it.

Lest you think that the Republican Senators misrepresented the views of the Republican Party as a whole, let me call attention to some votes in the House.

On May 8, 1939, the Navy appropriations bill, which provided approximately $1,000,000,000 for the Navy, passed the House by a vote of 297 to 58. Of the 58 votes cast against your Navy, 54 were Republicans, 2 Progressives, and 2 Democrats.

When the House was considering the Army appropriation bill for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1940, four amendments were offered by a Republican Congressman from New Jersey which would have slashed millions of dollars from the appropriations designed to increase the safety of this Nation. One would have cut $6,074,564, almost one-third of the appropriation for the signal service of the Army. Another amendment would have decreased the appropriation for the Air Corps by more than $20,000,000. Another would have cut $13,000,000 from the authority of the Army to contract for new airplanes. The fourth would have reduced a million dollars from the appropriation for supplies for the ordnance department.

The vote was 150 for the reductions and 217 against.

Of the 150 Congressmen who voted to reduce the preparedness appropriations, 145 were Republicans, 2 were Progressives, and 3 Democrats. Only 8 Republican Congressmen voted against the reductions.

This is the record of the Republican Party in Congress before and after Munich, when the armies of Europe were mobilizing for war.

Was there any change in the Republican attitude toward preparedness after the European war actually came? Not in Congress certainly.

On January 1, 1940, President Roosevelt submitted to the Congress his Budget requests, asking that the expenditures for the nonmilitary activities of Government be reduced by approximately half a billion dollars, and that this amount be added to appropriations for national defense. His request was given a cool reception by Republicans in and out of Congress.

The distinguished Senator from Ohio [Mr. TAFT], who came very near being selected as the Republican nominee for President, urged that there be a 25-percent cut in the estimates for the Army and the Navy. Other Republicans and some Democrats urged that these expenditures be reduced and the appropriations for nonmilitary functions correspondingly increased. The war abroad was called a phony war, and President Roosevelt was charged with being hysterical in his demands for preparedness.

Every fair observer will admit that during the consideration of the defense bills prior to the invasion of Belgium, no Republican in public life urged an appropriation for national defense in excess of that urged by the President of the United States, and few urged that his request be granted.

Did Mr. Willkie, either in 1939 or in 1940, while the Republicans in Congress were opposing increased appropriations for national defense, utter one word urging appropriations in excess of those asked by President Roosevelt? No.

Did he even urge support for the requests of the President? No.

About that time he was talking about balancing the Budget and about the evils of the Tennessee Valley Authority—itself a basic project in our national-defense plan; a project begun by President Wilson to provide power and munitions for war, and brought to completion by President Roosevelt after 12 years of Republican neglect.

I have discussed the record of the Republican Party on the issue of preparedness. I discuss it at this time because I want to take this issue out of partisanship once and for all—because I want Candidate Willkie and the leaders of the Republican Party to realize how futile it will be for them to spend the next 4 months endeavoring to sustain their indictment against the Democratic administration on this issue. They can no more prove their party the party of preparedness than they can prove that black is white, or that day is night.

But they can do untold harm to the American people by trying to make preparedness a partisan political issue.

When we consider the exaggerated and inaccurate statements made by so distinguished a citizen as ex-President Hoover, we can foresee the character of the statements that will during the next 4 months be made by campaign orators having less reason for restraint.

As the election approaches, the heat of the contest will inspire greater exaggeration. Defects will be charged to exist in every ship, in every plane, and in every gun. Political orators will question the efficiency and the integrity of officers of the Army and the Navy, to whom the people of America must look for their safety.

The effort to prove the platform declaration that the Democratic Party is responsible for our unpreparedness and for the consequent danger of involvement in war will result in such speeches that many people of the Nation may lose confidence in their Government and the people abroad must lose respect for this Government.

Since the invasion of Belgium billions of dollars for national defense have been requested by the President. These recent proposals have been supported solidly by the Republicans and the Democrats of the Congress.

The President, seemingly in appreciation of the unity of the two political parties in the Congress, has appointed to direct the expenditure of vast sums of money distinguished industrialists like Mr. Knudsen and Mr. Stettinius, who are in no way affiliated with the Democratic Party. He has appointed as Secretaries of War and Navy two Republicans, who, by reason of their positions, will likewise direct the expenditure of the moneys appropriated by the Congress.

There is no excuse even for a partisan Republican to believe that the money so willingly appropriated by the Congress will be spent for political purposes or for any purpose other than the preparedness of the Nation.

Under these circumstances, I plead with the patriotic Republicans of the Nation that the question of preparedness be not made the football of politics.

Let us not tell Hitler and Mussolini that they have no American Army and Navy to fear.

Let us not tell South America that we have no Army and Navy upon which they may rely.

Let us not divert the attention of the Army and the Navy from the important duty of proceeding with all speed to arm for our defense.

Let us stop discussing who was responsible for not appropriating more money at an earlier date for the Army and Navy. Let us admit that we are a peace-loving people, and that it was incredible to all of us that Hitler, Mussolini, and Stalin would make war upon helpless little nations, destroy the democracies of the Old World, and threaten the safety of the New World.

Instead of discussing the past, let us unite for the future.

For if, instead of uniting for the defense of the Nation, we devote our thought and energies to fighting with each other for control of the Government we may awaken some day to find in control someone who is neither Republican nor Democrat, nor even an American.

Tomorrow we celebrate the birth of this Republic. If to establish this Government and preserve it other men could sacrifice their lives, surely we can sacrifice our ambitions for political power.

On this Fourth of July, America needs preparedness, not politics.

OF

HON. SCOTT W. LUCAS

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

ADDRESS BY SECRETARY ICKES

Mr. LUCAS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered last night by the Secretary of the Interior at Washington's Fourth of July celebration. The subject of the address was The Future Is Our Own.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Americans used to think that they knew all there was to know about orations. They used to think that they had heard all the orations there were to hear—the nominating orations, the dedicatory orations, the memorial orations, the commencement orations, the Fourth of July orations. For years, for generations, ever since the foundation of the Republic and even way back before that, they had been listening to the orators and to the orations, and they thought that they had heard them all.

They were wrong.

There is a new kind of oration in the world, an oration which has been given again and again and louder and louder and more and more frequently during these last few years.

You have heard it. You have all heard it. You have heard it on the radio, blaring out from eastward over the water. You have read it in the papers. It is always the same oration.

It begins familiarly for you, for all Americans. It begins like the old-fashioned Fourth of July orations, with fine-sounding words about the people, the new people, the superior, forceful, vigorous people who will rule the world, the people of the future.

When you hear these words you sit back in your seats. You relax. You listen.

But as you listen the familiarity of the words disappears. They change. There's a difference. And gradually, listening, you realize what the difference is. It is this: In the past, in the orations that you remember, the superior, forceful, vigorous people the orators were always talking about—the people who would conquer the world—were always you—you, the American people. But now, in this new oration, the fine, new, vigorous people are not you. They are not you at all. They are somebody else.

It is somebody else, somebody different, who is new now; somebody else who is young, and strong, and vigorous.

And what about you? Where do you come in?

You find out soon enough. You find out as you listen. You are told that you are old. You are tired. You are all through. You are a decadent, worn-out nation, full of decadent, outmoded ideas. You are finished. There is no place for you or for your ideas in the world any more. That is what you are told as you listen to this new oration.

And as you listen you become uneasy. You had always thought that democracy and liberty were the new things in the world and that you were the new people in the world, the people of the west. And here is this orator telling you that democracy is all through and that liberty is decadent and that the new people are not the people of the New World in America, but the people of the Old World overseas.

It is a startling idea to you, fellow Americans. And you sit and you listen and you wonder. And you hear the orator talking about the great deeds and the triumphs of this other new and vigorous people, this different people, and you see that there are indeed triumphs. And you say to yourselves, "Maybe he's got something there. Maybe it's true. Let's have a look. Let's have a look at this new, triumphant people boasting of their strength. Let's have a look at the fresh and vigorous people who shout that they are fresher and more vigorous than the American pioneers or their freeborn children."

And you have a look. And you see. And what you see is this:

You see that this new and vigorous people are a people so vigorous, so virile, so energetic, so young, so strong that they have surrendered their wills, their bodies, and their minds to the absolute will of a boss who tells them what to do.

You see that they are people so fresh and so forceful and so determined that they do whatever they are told to do—speak when they are told to speak, listen when they are told to listen—say what they are told to say, shut up when they are told to shut up, eat when they are told to eat, go hungry when they are told to go hungry, die when they are told to die.

You see that they are people whose vigor and force are so great and so overwhelming that they put up with snoopers, accept paid informers, permit themselves to be whipped and mutilated, read what they are permitted to read, salute when they are told to salute, marry when they are told to marry, beget children when they are instructed to beget children.

You see that these so superior and forceful people break their plighted word, rape peaceful lands at the word of their master, destroy the lives of little children, requite gentleness with brutality, reap where they have not sown, victimize helpless minorities.

You see that these superior people of the future who would rule the world abase themselves before new gods set up for them by a dictator.

You see all this. And you listen to the orator. You hear him tell you that freedom is now a mark of inferiority and of incompetence, and that slavery is the badge of pride and of patriotism. You hear him tell you that obedience is the mark of a man, and that independence is characteristic of a weakling.

You listen.

You have been listening now for a long time.

When are you going to laugh, Americans?

When is the big laugh, the coarse, loud laugh, the harsh laugh of Americans going to blurt out and fill the world? When are you going to imagine to yourselves the words that Lincoln would have used if he had listened to this orator?

When are you going to throw at this orator the words of Lincoln that "no man is good enough to govern any other man without that other man's consent"?

When are you going to imagine the words that your fathers would have used and their fathers?

When is the great, hard, angry, shouting, razzberry laugh of the American people going to yell down the west wind of this continent and out to sea and on out past the horizon?

When are you going to say, all as one man, and all together:

"We haven't even yet begun to live."

"We haven't even yet begun to create on this continent the new and untried and never yet realized world of freedom and security and self-respect."

When are you going to shout again to the world the words that our forefathers shouted, that all men are created equal, and that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights—rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness?

Tonight, in the Capital of our free and young and great Republic, we are assembled to reaffirm to ourselves and to the world that we in America still hold these truths to be self-evident.

We swear that we will hold fast to the principles upon which this Nation was founded, and that we will never tolerate any seeds of hatred that would raise one American against another.

We reaffirm our belief in freedom—freedom of speech, of worship, of assembly, of press, and of the individual.

We pledge continued allegiance to the eternal principles of truth and of justice.

We united and free Americans declare that we are prepared to defend our principles, our ideals, and our institutions, so that the future may be ours.

Report on Municipal Light Plant Election at Oelwein, Iowa

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE W. NORRIS

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, July 5, 1940

STATEMENT OF JUDSON KING, DIRECTOR OF THE NATIONAL POPULAR GOVERNMENT LEAGUE

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, on April 25 this year there was held a municipal election at Oelwein, Iowa, the question being the establishment of a municipal electric-light plant.

The proposition was defeated. Some of the citizens of that Iowa city organized a municipal league, which on July 3, 1940, made a report on that election, calling attention to various irregularities that took place—in fact, picturing an election similar to most elections of that kind which have been held during the last 20 years. I ask unanimous consent that the report may be printed in the RECORD, and also that there may be printed in the RECORD a short statement by Judson King, director of the National Popular Government League, on the general proposition of the control of municipalities by private electric-light plants.

There being no objection, the report and statement were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATEMENT OF JUDSON KING, DIRECTOR OF THE NATIONAL POPULAR GOVERNMENT LEAGUE

(1) We are being warned against propaganda and political practices destructive of the American way of life, yet the very interests most vociferous are themselves indulging in practices Nation-wide which strike at the very heart of democracy, namely, corruption of elections and false publicity. In this the power trust has been the most notorious offender for the past 20 years—ever since the first World War.

(2) General knowledge that the electrical industry through its trade organization the National Electric Light Association, and through individual companies was spending millions of dollars annually to deceive the public and corrupt elections and legislative bodies, as well as to violate our antitrust laws, led to the Senate resolution of 1928 ordering the Federal Trade Commission to make an investigation.

(3) That investigation shocked the Nation. It was shown that the power trust was corrupting the press, big and little, through advertising and other ways; that it was hiring college professors, lawyers, engineers, and other professions, even ministers, to do its propaganda and political work; that it was invading women's clubs, social organizations, labor unions, and political parties; they even did not hesitate to introduce their false propaganda in the universities and public schools, even the grade schools.

REPORT ON MUNICIPAL LIGHT-PLANT ELECTION, OELWEIN, IOWA

On April 25, 1940, the city of Oelwein, Iowa, voted on the question of establishing a municipal light plant. The proposition was defeated by a vote of 1,642 to 1,187, as a result of a most vicious and intense campaign conducted in behalf of the Interstate Power Co. The tactics and methods used to defeat this election were similar to the worst type of machine politics and included every device from deliberate misrepresentation, intimidation of voters, and vast expenditures of money, to the hiring of large numbers of workers to an extent that involved practically purchasing the votes. In addition, deals with the largest industry in town and the only newspaper bought their opposition to the project in open disregard of the benefits that might accrue to Oelwein.

The power company's tactics were so brazen and open that there was a spontaneous uprising among the citizens which has resulted in the formation of an Oelwein Municipal League. They have petitioned the city council and have been granted a new election, to be held on July 18, 1940. The objective of the league has been stated in their literature as follows:

1. Presentation of the whole truth on public issues.
2. Assurance of honest elections expressive of the real sentiment of the citizens of Oelwein.
3. Exposing of false propaganda and unsavory tactics of special interests in Oelwein.
4. Reduction of taxes and cost of electric light and power in Oelwein through the sponsorship of a municipal light plant.

The league has dedicated itself to the task of fighting the pernicious tactics of the power company, and feels that the widest publicity must be given to these methods in the hope that something can be done to enable small communities to deal on even terms with the Power Trust.

THE NEGOTIATION LEADING UP TO THE ELECTION

The electric light committee of the City Council of Oelwein submitted a report, on March 18, 1940, to the council which explained why it was necessary to call an election for a municipal light plant in order to get relief from excessive electricity rates in Oelwein. The following quotations from this report describe the negotiations between the city and the power company which led up to the calling of the election:

"On September 10, 1939, the franchise of the Interstate Power Co. expired. The council was faced with the problem of securing lower electricity rates for the citizens of Oelwein and the decision whether or not to grant a new franchise to the Interstate Power Co. * * *

"During the month of September 1939 the city council had meetings with representatives of the Interstate Power Co. and discussed with them the possibility of securing lower electricity rates for the citizens of Oelwein. The situation created by the expiration of the franchise was also discussed. Throughout these discussions the Interstate Power Co. submitted no proposals for reducing electricity rates or to improve the service to the city of Oelwein. Instead of this, its representatives maintained the following:

"1. The power company was in such bad shape financially that, at this time, it could not afford to do much for our community.

"2. The power company could not reduce electricity rates generally in Oelwein, but might possibly be able to make small rate reductions in one or two categories of consumers, specifically those related to direct billing for services rendered the city itself.

"Since these discussions indicated that the power company was unwilling or unable to reduce the burden of high rates to residential, domestic, and business consumers, the council felt that the above was not a satisfactory solution for the citizens of Oelwein. Accordingly, the council decided to make a more complete inquiry into this subject and to get all the information and advice they could obtain from various available sources."

The report discusses the committee's studies and interviewing of a number of engineering firms and the selection of the Hubbard Engineering Co. to make a rate study and also a report on a municipal light plant. The engineers' rate study was submitted first and showed the following for the year 1938 (quoting again from the report):

"(a) The company's income was	$153,300
"(b) The income that the company should have received in order to pay all costs and earn a 6-percent return on the value of its property useful to Oelwein was	109,282
"(c) The income received in excess of what the power company was entitled to was	44,018

(Quoting from the report:)

"When the engineers' report was ready the council notified the power company and also asked them to submit a similar analysis showing the value of their property useful to Oelwein and the net profit. The council desired this information so that they could study the power company's side of the question, together with the report of their engineers, and reach an intelligent conclusion."

Then the report describes a series of meetings at which the company submitted its own reports. The first report of the company stated that the Oelwein distribution system had a present value of $314,000 and that their income was $21,000 less than the amount required to earn a fair return.

After objections raised by the city's engineers and considerable discussion and delay, a new report was submitted by the power company reporting the value as $178,000. The power company also admitted to income of $1,643, as compared with the engineer's figure of $44,000 excess income.

The city then requested the power company to submit a revised rate schedule and provide for increased street lighting, etc. (quoting again from the report):

"The total reductions in residential and commercial lighting which would be effected by the new schedule, based on the company's own estimates, are $8,707. * * * The total reduction, including all classes of consumers, would be 4¾ percent of the total 1939 billing.

"Even this small reduction would not go into effect, however, unless the citizens of Oelwein granted the power company a new franchise. * * *

"While these last discussions were in progress the committee on electric lighting, together with other members of the council, had been studying a second report of our engineers covering other methods of solving the electric-light problems of the city of Oelwein. This report discusses the purchasing or building of a distribution system, the purchasing of electrical energy at wholesale rates, and the feasibility of constructing an electric-light plant. The report studies all these questions in great detail and brings out the following interesting facts:

"1. If the city built its own electric light plant and distribution system, it can earn a gross profit of about $106,000 during any typical year.

"2. Financing charges of approximately $48,700 per year will pay the interest and pay off the entire investment in a period of 15 years. This would leave a balance to surplus of over $57,000 during each year of operation.

"3. These results are based on a program of reducing the average rate each year so that by 1945 the average rate would be 3.05 cents per kilowatt-hour, or 75 percent of the present rate.

"4. In a 20-year period the light plant would earn the citizens of Oelwein a net profit exceeding $1,300,000, in addition to paying off the cost of the original plant."

Following this is a discussion on procedure and the election, and finally the report concludes as follows:

"In conclusion, the city council has been frequently urged by many of our citizens to bring the question of a municipal light plant before the people of our community. Consequently, in view of all the facts presented in this report, the committee on electric lighting are unanimous in the recommendation that the proposition of a city-owned-and-operated electric light and power plant, as described in our engineers' report, be submitted to the voters in the city of Oelwein, and that action on this matter be taken immediately."

An election was therefore called for April 25, 1940, at which the following question was submitted:

"Shall the following public measure be adopted?

"Shall the city of Oelwein, Iowa, be empowered and authorized to establish, erect, maintain, and operate a municipal electric-light and power plant with all the necessary poles, wires, machinery, apparatus, buildings, site, and other requisites for such plant, at a maximum expenditure for the establishment thereof not exceeding the sum of $650,000, said plant to be paid for solely and only out of the earnings of said plant without the incurring of any indebtedness therefor by the said city of Oelwein, Iowa?"

POWER-COMPANY CAMPAIGN

This information was gathered from a number of sources and in many cases direct from Oelwein citizens who worked for the power company during the campaign. Some of these workers admit frankly that they were interested only in the remuneration they received and personally realized that a municipal light plant would be better for Oelwein. Other workers offered their services to the side which would pay them the most, and, of course, there was only one side that could make an appeal to citizens of this type. Again, others admitted they were misled. Since the election they have been helpful in supplying information regarding the power company's tactics.

The names of the majority of the power-company workers are well known to the citizens, and over 200 and probably 300 voters in Oelwein were paid in varying amounts to influence their vote and use their influence against the municipal light plant. These workers were, in general, carefully selected upon the basis of their influence either on groups or families. Wherever possible the greatest secrecy was maintained to make it impossible to expose them until it was too late.

The campaign tactics can be best discussed under the following headings:

NEWSPAPER CAMPAIGN

The Oelwein Daily Register is the only newspaper in the city. About 10 years ago it ran a series of articles favoring a municipal light plant. After the manager of the power company conferred with the paper and arranged to give the paper a substantial contract for newspaper advertising, it switched its policy. Now it is an ardent supporter of the power company.

In the early days of the campaign the newspaper, while professing a neutral attitude, so distorted the story of the rate negotiations that even the power company was obliged to deny responsibility for the so-called facts it published. For example, note the following quotations from the issue of March 21, the day after the election was called.

"The Interstate offered to reduce the rates to a point which would mean a saving of $11,000 per year over present rates."

The power company in its own written report claimed only a saving of $8,700.

"In addition they offered to place almost double the lighting power on the white way and also install 10 more street-crossing lights, all making a total of about $3,000 less than at present."

The power company's report shows that the net cost to the city for this additional lighting would be $1,000 more instead of $3,000 less.

"The Interstate representatives asked the council if they had a report showing the probable cost of a municipal plant for Oelwein and they replied they did not have."

The city had a thorough 200-page report covering this subject. The above was a deliberate attempt to create the impression that the city was going into this matter without considered thought.

At a later date the paper reported briefly on a mass meeting held by the citizens at which over 700 people were in attendance. An example of the twisting of the truth is given in the following quotation:

"Mr. Olson, of the C. & G. W., asked why they had not taken into consideration the supplying of power and light for the C. & G. W. Railroad. He was told that to do this would require about $75,000 additional funds."

This was another deliberate misrepresentation. Mr. Olson was told definitely that $75,000 had been allowed in the bond issue to take care of the railroad load and that every effort would be made to give the railroad whatever service they desired.

"Mr. Smith, of Chicago, with the Hubbard Engineering Co., with which Mr. Spitzglass is connected and has a contract here, said that the company was a new one, only having been organized last year, and this accounted for the fact that they had not built a plant yet."

The above was a part of the campaign to smear the engineers and is a deliberate misrepresentation. Mr. Schmidt described many municipal plants and other projects constructed by the engineers. He described the experience of certain members of the organization dating back 15 to 20 years, and, in his own case, thirty-odd years in the field of municipal plant design.

Toward the end of the campaign the newspaper finally threw off its cloak of neutrality and openly devoted its editorial pages to attacking the municipal light plant project. For example—

"EDITORIAL COMMENT—A DISSENTING OPINION

"Despite the fact that three Oelwein attorneys out of eight here give it as their emphatic opinion that the 'citizens of Oelwein will not be taxed to pay for the municipal plant,' we are still of the opinion that they will be taxed either directly or indirectly to pay for it. They also give their opinion that the rates can never be raised. Analyze this just a little.

"It is our opinion that the court would either order the rates increased or that a tax levy be made on the citizens to meet the obligations. In that case it would be a tax on the citizens of Oelwein, either direct or indirect.

"Hence if the municipal company sells you your requirements at 10 cents a month cheaper than is now being done, the 1,000 kilowatt-hour plant would have to produce it more cheaply than the million-watt plant can do it."

The editor of this paper knew very well that the Iowa Supreme Court has declared many times that under no circumstances could this be done. In the case of Wyatt v. The Town of Manning, for example, the Iowa Supreme Court stated:

"This is true because the indebtedness contemplated by sections 6134–d1 and 6134–d2 is expressly declared not to constitute a general obligation or be payable in any manner from taxation, or in any other method, except that provided in said sections. Also, section 6134–d2 expressly provides that under no circumstances shall the city in any manner be liable by reason of failure of the net earnings being sufficient for the payment provided in the contract. No taxpayer, therefore, could ever be called upon to pay taxes to discharge the obligation."

The Iowa law has been adjudicated so often that even the power company representatives admit in private that statements like that carried by the paper are ridiculous and false, yet the editor stooped so low as to abuse his privilege of freedom of the press in order to mislead the public.

Altogether about $5,000 was spent by the power company in advertising, general printing, and reprinting of advertisements appearing in the Oelwein Daily Register. Some of this publication activity was in the name of the power company and some in the name of the Oelwein citizens committee, a dummy organization set up for the power company by P. E. Magley, an ex-utility employee now living in Oelwein.

From April 8 to April 25 the Oelwein Daily Register was delivered free to Oelwein residents. The newspapers had a sticker attached carrying the following legend printed in red ink:

"COMPLIMENTARY

"For the next few weeks I will deliver the Oelwein Daily Register to you free."

This free delivery of the newspaper was, of course, to insure subjecting every Oelwein resident to the power company's propaganda.

FALSE ADVERTISEMENTS

(1) Publication of an opinion by Judge Fuller in the district court stating that "There might arise a situation where the city would be bound and obligated to pay by general taxes," a 5-year-old lower court opinion that has been revised by the Supreme Court on many occasions. This misrepresentation was repeated in every form possible.

(2) Advertisement from Chariton Herald stating there is "not an electric plant in Iowa today that has been built and paid for out of earnings." On investigation, the publication was found to have been made 7 years ago, just after the Iowa reserve-bond law was passed.

(3) False statements regarding the success of Iowa municipal plants in Muscatine, Mount Pleasant, Estherville, Waverly, Lennox, Cedar Falls, and many others. In each case the letters and operating statements received from these towns showed those ads to be false and that every one of these plants is a financial success today.

CAMPAIGN TO SMEAR THE ENGINEERS AND COUNCIL

Much of the advertising was directed at the engineers. One particular falsehood was hammered continuously in the advertising and in a well-directed whispering campaign. A typical advertisement of this character is presented below:

"We are asked to accept the figure of a profit of $57,000 plus on a municipal light plant being promoted by a promoting engineer, with a contract to pay him at least $23,050 plus. Let's stop, look, and listen before we turn on the green light.

"OELWEIN CITIZENS' COMMITTEE."

Both the power company and the newspaper were informed that the above was untrue. The engineers were to receive a fee which was as low or lower than any of the several bids received by the council from other engineering firms. The fee would only be $1,000 if the company gave the requested rate reduction and sold its distribution system to the city. The $23,000 figure was the maximum which the engineers were to receive regardless of the amount of work they did for the city. In spite of this the newspaper actually repeated the following in the personal column in a number of issues:

"Do you know that the city engineers will make $23,000 plus if they can promote a municipal light plant in Oelwein?"

Many citizens stated they voted "no" because they were told the whole thing was merely an attempt to get a $23,000 promotional fee.

A well-organized under-cover campaign was directed at the council. A former city official working for the power company insisted that he knew that an engine company was spending $10,000 to promote the light plant. The whispering campaign to smear the city council convinced certain voters that the councilmen were being bribed and that the council and not Oelwein would benefit from the plant.

The fact that the ballot contained a clause stating that the light-plant management be placed in the hands of a board of trustees to make sure that politics did not enter into the picture was submerged by the vast amount of misleading propaganda.

Such stories were spread as the one that "The State auditor was going to examine the city books and show corruption," a malicious fabrication with no foundation. It helped spread the germ of doubt.

It is noteworthy to record that the council contributed financially with the other prominent businessmen to finance the few leaflets and minor expenses of the campaign for the municipal plant. This fund, made up of voluntary contributions ranging from $1 to $25, amounted to less than $500, or about 1 percent of the money spent to defeat the municipal plant.

THE DEAL WITH THE RAILROAD

The Chicago & Great Western Railroad uses about one-third of the energy consumed in Oelwein. At the time of the election campaign its contract with the Interstate Power Co. still had 2 years to run. The railroad company had been trying for some time to have its wholesale electricity rates reduced from the average of 1.4 cents per kilowatt-hour it was paying.

Up to the last few days of the election campaign the railroad officials indicated that they favored the municipal project. Undoubtedly this was because the engineers' report showed that the railroad could obtain energy cheaper from a municipal plant. One of the local officials of the railroad came out openly for the project.

On April 19, at an open mass meeting attended by more than 700 people, the local officials of the railroad company reversed their stand. They openly opposed the municipal plant. Investigation of this reversal in attitude brought to light the fact that the Interstate Power Co. reduced its rates to the railroad company even though the latter's power contract had 2 more years to run, and in return the railroad officials came out in opposition to the municipal project.

THE LABOR-UNION ATTACK

The employees of the Interstate Power Co. happen to be the only members of the International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers in Oelwein. They took advantage of this to advertise under the name of their local, No. B949, in opposition to the plant. They also persuaded their international representative to sign a letter (which was printed and written in Oelwein but addressed in Austin, Minn.), from which the following quotations are taken:

"Local Union, No. B949, of I. B. E. W. has a union-shop agreement with the Interstate Power Co., and their wages and working conditions are exceptionally good. In fact, we have agreements with practically every large utility company in the country with equally good wages and conditions. We are very sorry to say that we have found it very hard to organize a politically controlled municipal plant, and nearly impossible to get an agreement of any kind. * * *

"We are asking your support in opposing the coming bond issue, because by so doing you are helping our members employed by the Interstate Power Co. keep their jobs and union conditions. With kindest personal regards, I am,

"Fraternally yours,

"J. HARRIS IGOU,
"International Representative, I. B. E. W."

The fact is that the council has definitely agreed to recognize union labor, pay its employees union-scale wages, and employ them under union conditions. This fact was advertised and proclaimed at open meetings, but the newspaper maliciously claimed it could not be accomplished.

As pointed out by Judson King in his paper on T. V. A. labor policies, the electric utilities are endeavoring to use labor as a tool to further their selfish interests. The above is an illustration of how widespread is this policy. In Oelwein the utility boasts of having hired union men to fight for them. These union men apparently do not realize that union labor has consistently endorsed municipal ownership of utilities. Here are a few of the many labor organizations that have affiliated themselves with the Public Ownership League of America: International Brotherhoods of Electrical Workers, Brotherhood of Railway Clerks, Order of Railway Conductors, International Order of Operating Engineers.

Furthermore the Iowa Federation of Labor endorses municipal ownership in its constitution and bylaws.

Despite this evidence, the local electrical union was coerced by the utility into asking all union workers of Oelwein to sacrifice their common good just to conserve the profits of a bankrupt company.

CAMPAIGN WORKERS

Between 200 and 300 people were hired to campaign against the municipal plant. These workers received various amounts, depending upon their local influence, ranging from $25 per week to $20 per day. Several prominent citizens were hired merely to allow their names and influence to be used against the municipal project. Some of these received from $200 to as much as $1,000 to submerge the city's interest to their personal gain. An important former city official, an influential employee of the railroad company, a well-known gas-station owner and ex-utility employee, a prominent attorney, and others worked actively for the power company.

The case of the railroad employee is of particular interest. He holds an important position in the local office and has a great deal to do with the hiring of railroad workers. He makes use of his "hiring and firing" prerogative to influence the votes of those under his control, and for his personal gain. No practice is more un-American than his use of the fear of job security and his taking advantage of those under his control.

It was generally known that anyone who wanted a job doing this kind of work for the power company got it. There appeared to be no limit to what was to be spent. A conservative estimate indicates that more than $35,000 was spent to defeat the city's best interests. Since a part of this money came from sources outside of Oelwein, the amount spent by Interstate Power Co. itself is indeterminable.

UNDERCOVER ORGANIZATION

In addition to the workers campaigning openly against the municipal plant, an undercover organization was erected during the last week, when the power company's straw vote indicated that sentiment was in favor of the plant. The undercover organization was headed by a prominent State politician, Mr. Martin Cooney, a resident of West Union, Iowa. He was hired for the specific purpose of "delivering the votes," and given a free hand to erect his own organization operating from its own headquarters.

Mr. Cooney's organization consisted of several main lieutenants who received $200 each and had unlimited expense accounts. On election day each hired as many assistants as his or her discretion indicated to be necessary. These assistants received $10 a day. It was learned from one of the lieutenants that the expenses of his group alone amounted to $1,200. What Mr. Cooney received for his services is not known.

Members of this group used every means of personal and private pressure on voters. Voters were even told that their ballots would be examined to check upon their vote. Un-American tactics from every point of view were used in this personal campaign, and appeals to every form of prejudice and coercion were used to cloud the main issue.

WHERE DID THE SLUSH FUND COME FROM?

The Federal Trade Commission investigation (S. Doc. No. 92) brought to light utility practices which shocked the Nation and all thinking people. That these practices have not stopped is evident from what has just taken place in Oelwein.

The power company's private boast is that it can raise even a bigger slush fund next time. From Waterloo, West Union, Des Moines, the money pours in. When will Congress recognize the existence of this evil and erect the machinery to correct these abuses, which undermine the very foundations of our democracy?

Respectfully,

OELWEIN MUNICIPAL LEAGUE,
D. DWYER, President.

Land of Hope and Promise

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. D. WORTH CLARK

OF IDAHO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Friday, July 5, 1940

ADDRESS BY RICHARD L. NEUBERGER

Mr. CLARK of Idaho. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Mr. Richard L. Neuberger, of Portland, Oreg., entitled "Land of Hope and Promise."

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

My grandparents came westward in search of security and happiness. I am sure that many of yours did, too. Hope of a better life brought our predecessors across the plains. They were looking for freedom and stability. In large measure, they had the vision of President Jefferson, who said, as he sent Lewis and Clark on their historic exploration: "I view a great, free, and independent empire on the Columbia River."

The achievements of those people constitute our heritage. In this mighty region they began the civilization of which Jefferson dreamed. It is our obligation to carry on what they started. The buckskin-clad frontiersmen led by Meriwether Lewis and William Clark, the trappers and fur traders who came later on, the farm families in their covered wagons, the troopers of the old United States Cavalry, the laborers whose back-breaking toil laid the railroads across the mountains, the loggers and ranchers and miners of a few decades ago—all these people helped carve our present empire out of the wilderness. To us they have handed a matchless legacy. That legacy is the Pacific Northwest.

CAREFUL PLANNING NEEDED

Through this region the Columbia River twists and foams on its swift course to the sea. It has vast potential hydroelectric power. Its reaches could float countless ships and irrigate millions of acres of land. The slopes of the Cascade and Olympic ranges are mantled with thick stands of timber. The flats of the inland empire and the basins of eastern Oregon can feed herds of cattle and nourish fields of wheat. Idaho's valleys give life to rows of potatoes and lanes of fruit trees. Chinook salmon and other fish fill the rivers. The mountains are dotted with rich mineral deposits. Magnificent scenery extends from the Pacific Ocean to the crest of the Rockies.

These resources are ours. With them we can build and maintain a free, democratic society in which the aspirations of all our citizens are fulfilled. We can give reality to Thomas Jefferson's plans. We can insure the maximum of comfort and security for every man, woman, and child. Prof. Charles McKinley, of Reed College, in Portland, has urged that calmly, objectively, and wisely we appraise the possibilities of the Pacific Northwest and proceed to develop them. In that way, and not by any harum-scarum methods, can we realize the full worth and value of the four great States which comprise this region—Oregon, Idaho, Washington, and Montana.

AN IMPREGNABLE AMERICA

We live now in a world in crisis. No discussion of the Columbia River Basin is complete without some analysis of the world around us. Here in America we must arm for defense. President Roosevelt has presented a defense program to the Nation. It should be supported. We must be ready to resist successfully any possible attack against our native land. Hanson W. Baldwin, military editor of the New York Times, has said this country can be made impregnable. That is what we must do. The borders of the United States should be barred to any hostile force. The people want this accomplished. They have patriotically and unselfishly urged that higher taxes be levied to help pay for the new weapons of defense. They are willing to make sacrifices to defend the Nation.

The President has asked for 50,000 airplanes. If that many airplanes are required to protect America, they should be constructed. The assembly line should be geared up. We must be ready to repulse any invasion, whether that invasion threatens the stern uplands of the Pacific Northwest or the gentle meadows of the Tennessee Valley. We should prepare for every emergency. And, as Collier's magazine has suggested, we ought to have arms rather than alarms. A great country preparing to defend its shores is no place for fright or fanaticism. Our independence was won in 1776 by men who were level-headed, not hot-headed.

AMERICA FIRST

"Why not face the basic military and economic fact," asked the United States Senate Committee on Naval Affairs several weeks ago, "that it is not within our power or means to create military or naval establishments of sufficient strength to police the world, but that it is within our power and means to prevent others from transporting their wars to this hemisphere? Why not face the fact that American armed forces cannot force permanent peace on a warring world, but that we can maintain peace in our part of the world? If we realize that the important causes of war are in human minds and emotions; that force cannot change materially human nature; give up the illusion that American armed force can bring permanent peace to a warring world and confine our military objectives to the defense of this country, we shall find that our problem of national defense becomes relatively simple."

The Naval Affairs Committee which made that statement consists of prominent Democrats such as DAVID I. WALSH, of Massachusetts, and HOMER T. BONE, of Washington, and prominent Republicans such as JAMES J. DAVIS, of Pennsylvania, and HIRAM JOHNSON, of California. They had the benefit of the expert testimony of admirals, fleet commanders, naval technicians, warship designers, and military observes. The statement they made deserves consideration on our part. We also should consider the advice of Jefferson, who said that the countries of Europe "are nations of eternal war." Our first thought should be for the United States of America. This is a time of crisis. Other countries think first of themselves. We should place American interests uppermost.

"FIFTH COLUMNS" MUST BE PUT DOWN

Just as we must defend our Republic against enemies from without so must we safeguard it against enemies from within. In Europe we have seen nations betrayed by spies, traitors, and saboteurs. The "fifth column" has no place in America. Our Government must crack down on groups which owe allegiance to governments other than the Government of the United States. America should not tolerate persons or organizations who want to open us to the inroads of dictatorship and totalitarianism. Our liberties should not be granted men and women who give their loyalty to the swastika of Nazi Germany or the hammer and sickle of Soviet Russia. Fascists and Communists are traitors to the United States.

But let us be sure that no innocent people are persecuted in this drive against traitors. Self-appointed vigilantes do not constitute the American way of doing things. D. E. Nickerson, secretary of the Oregon State Federation of Labor, has pointed out, "Complete suppression of free speech and wholesale witch hunting would make for a condition in which the "fifth column" would thrive. Also it would provide the opportunity for total liquidation of the labor movement." Mr. Nickerson's words find echo in a recent declaration by Senator LEWIS B. SCHWELLENBACH, whom President Roosevelt has just appointed to the Federal judiciary for this district: "Freedom of thought and freedom of speech, with the resulting duties of making up our minds honestly and courageously, are at the very heart of the faith in democracy."

NO WARTIME PERSECUTION

Like Mr. Nickerson and Senator SCHWELLENBACH and every other patriotic American, I want the "fifth column" and other subversive forces rounded up and punished. But I want this done by our law-enforcement agencies—the United States attorney's office, the G-men, the local police force, the sheriff, the Secret Service, the Army and Navy intelligence corps—and not by any mobs. The World War furnished us some sad experiences with fanaticism and high emotions. Senator Harry Lane, of Oregon was one of the few people who said the World War would not make the world safe for democracy. He maintained that American participation in the war was a grave and tragic mistake.

Senator Lane had been a distinguished mayor of the great city of Portland. He was a leader of the Democratic Party in the Northwest. His grandfather, Gen. Joseph Lane, had been the first Territorial Governor of the Oregon country, which then included all of this vast region. Senator Lane was as patriotic and devoted to American institutions as any man who ever breathed. Richard Montague, an illustrious Portland lawyer, described Senator Lane as a man with "an ingrained love of humanity." Yet because he opposed America's entrance into the World War, Senator Lane was denounced as a traitor to his country. He was called a Benedict Arnold. He was burned in effigy. No epithet was too foul to be hurled at him. His great heart broke under this storm of abuse.

My city is not proud of that episode. Each year many citizens of Portland gather at Senator Lane's grave and pay tribute to his memory. This year Paul R. Kelty, former editor of the Oregonian, said that the memory of Senator Lane had become a symbol of greatness. In Montana, at the time Senator Lane was being condemned in Oregon, BURTON K. WHEELER was under suspicion because he would not allow the United States attorney's office in that State to be used for persecuting people. We now can understand how shameful such suspicion was. Senator WHEELER is one of the most notable Members of the United States Senate, and has demonstrated his patriotism and Americanism on many occasions.

STAND FIRM FOR FREEDOM

We in the Pacific Northwest have the heritage of great resources and an expansive, inspiring homeland. But the most precious heritage of every American citizen is liberty. That liberty is guaranteed by the Bill of Rights of our Constitution. A little girl in Ohio has just won an essay contest on the Bill of Rights sponsored by the American Legion in her State. Let me read you something she wrote in that prize-winning essay:

"I am especially thankful for the first amendment. As long as that amendment plays the part it now plays in the Government of the United States, I need fear no man. For that first amendment guarantees freedom of religion, freedom of speech, freedom of press, 'the right of people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for the redress of grievances.' "

Palmer Hoyt, publisher of the Oregonian, has said that if the people of the dictator-dominated countries of Europe could learn what was actually happening in the world the dictators who dominate those countries would fall. Freedom and liberty are the keys to democracy. We must recognize that, because men long ago at Bunker Hill and Yorktown won freedom and liberty, our responsibility has not entirely ceased. We must defend the liberty which those men won. We must recognize that whenever any individual in our country, no matter how humble he may be, loses his liberty, that the liberty of all of us is in danger. The Bill of Rights must be defended and made a living force. The collapse of freedom in the rest of the world should make us all the more sensitive to threats to freedom here.

DEMOCRACY IN ACTION

In accepting an award from the Nation magazine for her "distinguished service in the cause of American social progress," Mrs. Roosevelt recently said, "We must keep democracy and must make it mean a reality to more people." The President echoed his wife's words in the fireside talk in which he declared that the crisis across the Atlantic must not drag us entirely away from our problems at home. We must not become so preoccupied with events on other continents that we forget or neglect vital considerations right here. And that is where I come back to the problems facing the Pacific Northwest.

In my community of Portland there are certain local problems. I think they should be solved. I hope I can help solve them. The firemen, the men who protect homes and businesses, need an adequate pension system. Their employment is perilous and risky. Several weeks ago two men perished in the line of duty. The firemen and their families are entitled to decent financial protection. Until that protection is provided, the Portland fire department has a wide gap in its equipment. Pensions for the men are as important as hook-and-ladder trucks.

EDUCATION: CORNERSTONE OF PROGRESS

The late Arnold Bennett Hall, president of the University of Oregon, used to say, "Our children come this way but once." He meant that understaffed schools and colleges were direct blows at the welfare and destiny of our young people. My State has educational problems which have to be met. The teachers want their tenure law maintained. They do not want it whittled away by crafty administration. They demand and need security in their profession. Does any American wants his or her children taught by teachers whose jobs are insecure? Teachers also want academic freedom. They want the liberty that is the right of every citizen. They do not want local busybodies infringing their prerogatives.

I also believe that tuition fees in the State institutions of higher education are too high in Oregon. There is no reason why the poor man's son or daughter should have to stop his or her education when high school is completed. The children of the poor and rich alike should be able to attend college. I think the son of a truck driver has as much right to become a physician or a lawyer or a journalist as the son of a bank president. I hope the time will come when college educations will be available to as many young people as grade- and high-school educations are now. That would be a worth-while extension of democracy.

JOBS ARE AS IMPORTANT AS WARSHIPS

Dreadnoughts, howitzers, airplanes, torpedoes, rifles, bayonets—these are not the only defenses of democracy. There are others. Schools, playgrounds, old-age pensions, dams, rich farms, ample pay checks, good working conditions, prosperous businesses, thriving factories—these, too, are bulwarks of freedom. Artillery does comparatively little good if behind it the people are discontented and demoralized. But a free people, living in security and comfort, enjoying democracy and a homogeneous culture, is a line of defense which stands against invasion and aggression like a band of iron and steel.

Barbarous war lords are abroad in the world today. We must rim our coasts with fortresses and dot our oceans with mighty naval squadrons. But we must also find work for people at home. We must see to it that our aged citizens get larger old-age pensions than the pittance they are receiving now. We must see to it that the dinner tables of the Nation's families groan under platters of green vegetables, rich dairy products, and fresh fruits. We have plenty in America for everyone, if only we organize our production and distribution properly. In a region like the Pacific Northwest, for example, there are countless acres which can be put to work growing food for the people of the United States.

POVERTY IS THE ALLY OF DICTATORSHIP

Never for one second should we forget that the dreadful and unspeakable Hitler, whose cruelties have shocked mankind, came to power amidst the poverty and collapse of post-war Germany. Hunger and misery were his confederates. The German people were desperate. Malnutrition plagued child and man alike. This was fertile soil for the Nazis' seed of hate. Fascism flourished like a weed. Communism and the brutal Stalin seized dominance in Russia because the people had been oppressed by the ruthless regime of the Czars. We can keep these evil systems out of America by providing justice, security, and liberty for everyone. Happy citizens do not give hostage to tyranny.

"If we have a contented agriculture," Senator GEORGE W. NORRIS once said, "if those who labor are happy and prosperous, if those who toil get a fair recompense for their labor, if the farms of our country are given the modern advantages of modern times, including the blessings of electricity, then the dangers of communism and dictatorship disappear and fade away as the dews of heaven vanish before the morning sun." You need not accept every word of Senator NORRIS' statement to agree that good wages, adequate education, and ample old-age pensions are part of our defense program against the menace of dictatorship.

FORTRESSES OF PROGRESS

You here in the city of Spokane are interested in Grand Coulee Dam, just as we in Portland and in the State of Oregon are interested in Bonneville. To me these projects symbolize forts in the service of democracy. Bonneville is improving navigation on the great river which is so vital to our region. It also is generating millions of kilowatt-hours of low-cost electricity. Grand Coulee will reclaim and irrigate 1,200,000 acres of dry land. It also will be the biggest single source of hydroelectric power on earth. These things mean comfort and security. President Roosevelt told the White House Conference on Children in a Democracy that he hoped the Grand Coulee project would provide new farm homes for 500,000 Americans from the Dust Bowl, people now destitute and forsaken who could become useful, industrious citizens again if given the opportunity.

I have recently read a speech delivered in the House of Representatives by one of my fellow Democrats, the distinguished Member of Congress from Spokane, CHARLES H. LEAVY. He pointed out that Franklin D. Roosevelt has done more reclamation and land development than any other President. For many years leading men in the Far West have emphasized the importance of diverting water to thirsty acres which need only moisture to bloom. William E. Borah backed irrigation projects for three decades, and now D. WORTH CLARK, his successor as senior Senator from Idaho, carries on where Borah left off.

It is not a partisan proposition in any sense. President Roosevelt, a Democrat, put over the Bonneville Dam undertaking, and Senator CHARLES L. MCNARY, of Oregon, the extremely popular leader of the Republicans in the Senate, was the main congressional sponsor of the enterprise. In fact, as the President signed the Bonneville authorization he remarked, "I've got to give 'CHARLIE MAC' his dam." This spirit should prevail among us all. Men of good will should support worth-while objectives, regardless of what political party inaugurated them. I remember meeting a newspaper editor in the East who had read an article I wrote in Harper's magazine about Bonneville and Grand Coulee. He said he thought those projects were utterly worthless because they were stuck out in a lot of wilderness. Of course, he was wrong, but how much better it would be if we in the West and our fellow Americans across the country tried to understand the problems and situations and hopes of each other.

TOLERANCE AND BROTHERHOOD

In these days of crisis we must be as cooperative and helpful as possible. This is an hour for brotherhood and understanding. One of the great stories in the history of the Pacific Northwest concerns the plight of the Lewis and Clark expedition toward the end of the summer of 1805. The frontiersmen were in the mountains. Their food supplies were running low. Ahead of them lofty ridges loomed like a huge, crenelated battlement. They had gone too far to turn back safely. Their solitary hope lay ahead. And their only hope of food lay in establishing friendly relations with the Shoshone Indians.

With the last rations rattling in the bottom of their knapsacks, they had to get help. Captain Lewis and two of the strongest men, one of them a blacksmith from Kentucky, trudged on in advance of the main party. Several times they saw smoke signals hanging ominously on the horizon, but they never met the Indians. Lewis now realized that it was find the Shoshones or die. At each campfire the weary explorers left beads and other trinkets as tokens of their friendship. And finally when the last of their food was gone on the crest of Lemhi Pass, near the headwaters of the Snake River, they encountered the Indians.

A FRIEND IN THE WILDERNESS

Over the crest of the pass rode 60 mounted Shoshones led by young Chief Cameahwait. The chief saw a strange sight. Toward him tottered a lean man with white skin, a man in ragged clothes. In his hand the white man carried a strange banner, a flag of red, white, and blue with stars and stripes. The chief had never seen a white man before, neither had he seen the flag of the new republic along the Atlantic coast. Captain Lewis staggered up to him. The other 2 frontiersmen stood in the rear.

The captain held out his hand in friendship. "Tabba bone! Tabba bone!" (white man, white man) he said.

The chief of the Shoshones clutched his spear. Now, if ever, the fate of American expansion westward hung in the balance. At a signal from the young chief, the Indians could have wiped out the explorers. The course of history might have been changed. But the Indian leader smiled. He slipped from his pony and embraced the ragged, hungry Lewis.

"Ah hi e! Ah hi e!" (I am much pleased, I am much pleased) the warrior said. And he and his tribesmen gave the white men food and horses, which enabled them to cross the mountains to the sea.

Whenever we of today are inclined to be hostile and inhospitable to the drought refugees, I think of that feathered savage of long ago whose hospitality made it possible for our flag to be carried through to the shores of the Pacific. We detest and despise Hitler and Mussolini and Stalin because brotherhood is foreign to their nature. They are men of hate and cruelty. Let us here in America cling to the moral and spiritual values which separate us from the welter of strife that is engulfing Europe and Asia. People must have faith. Our faith should be expressed not in bitterness and jealousy, but in understanding and tolerance and democracy. Long ago brave men and women crossed the Atlantic in tiny ships and landed on a hostile shore. They did so to escape the eternal hatreds shaking Europe. To safeguard their hard-won gains, we must keep that hatred out of the New World.

LAND OF HOPE AND PROMISE

Here in the Pacific Northwest we have an opportunity which confronts no other part of America. Garet Garrett recently described in the Saturday Evening Post the vast and progressive changes which had taken place in the automobile industry in a period of 20 years. I think that changes like that will characterize the forthcoming 20 years in the Pacific Northwest. We are on the threshold of great changes. President Roosevelt wired the 1939 session of the Pacific Northwest Regional Planning Commission: "In your area, through planning, we can avoid some of the mistakes and wasteful exploitation of resources that have caused such serious problems in other parts of the country." The future of the region is bright, indeed. We are not confronted with the broken-down economy which blights many parts of the East and the South. We have a new land, a promised land, a land ready to be developed and improved.

I think all of us here share that hope. We want the Northwest to be a citadel of democracy and security. We are willing to help defend our region and our country. We share a common distaste for the shameless dictatorships overseas, and we share a common determination to keep those dictatorships out of America, whether their encroachments are by stealth or open aggression. And we want to keep our own institutions democratic. We want to respect law and order, and we are against mobs. William D. Browne, the chairman of the American Legion's radical activities committee in Oregon, has said his group will try to get information on any subversive groups in the State, but that it will leave law enforcement to law-enforcing agencies. This shows that people are going to be on guard against emotions and excitement which would destroy the Constitution even while pretending to defend it. We must not burn down the house to roast the pig, as did the gentleman in Mr. Lamb's famous tale.

In the United States we can extend economic security to all citizens, and we can keep the democratic way of life. This opportunity confronts the whole Nation, but most particularly it confronts the final frontier, the Pacific Northwest. The future is one of promise for us, if only we remain level headed and brave. Then we can maintain and protect here a civilization which would make those frontiersmen and migrants of long ago proud of the way we have preserved our heritage.

"I view," said Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence, "a great, free and independent empire on the Columbia River."

War Propaganda 1917 and 1940

OF

HON. RUSH D. HOLT

OF WEST VIRGINIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, June 10 (legislative day of Tuesday, May 28), 1940

Mr. HOLT. Mr. President, under permission granted me, I present for publication in the RECORD one of the articles referred to by me at that time as being part of a series entitled "Twenty-five Years Ago."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

GETTING THE PROFESSORS

"Enlisted for the duration of the war."

That was the view of the English propaganda directors during the last World War of certain American college and university professors and presidents. They admitted that they had to get them in the "proper frame of mind." This was done by personal contact with English scholars, lecturers, and others, as well as by "the printed word." Books, pamphlets, and all types of literature were sent to these individuals to show them the English side. Once these persons were won over, they became the most active and most zealous propagandists "for the cause."

The Allies were so successful in this drive that they crowed about their victory in the schools.

Again, in 1939 and 1940, the college and university professors and presidents are being won over for English propaganda for the duration of this war. They have become so active that their intervention viewpoint met student reaction. But the work of these individuals was not alone worth while to the viewpoint of students, but particularly for their quoting purpose in newspapers and their ability of writing books and pamphlets.

For instance, when the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies wanted a book, they easily got volunteers in the collegiate circle to aid in the writing of that book. In this way both the inspired propaganda group and the professors were supposed to gain. Many presidents of scholastic institutions have been used as "window dressing" for this committee, a known intervention outfit. Such names as Butler, of Columbia; Seymour, of Yale; Conant, of Harvard; Kingdon, of New York University, are found.

The reasons for activity on the part of professors and presidents are numerous. Some have actually owed allegiance to the Empire of Great Britain. Some have desired to get in with the financial circles, whom they felt would be interested in intervention and some of whom they knew to be active on their college boards and active in their contributions to the school.

LORD LOTHIAN AND COLLEGES

Lord Lothian, the British Ambassador, had made many contacts with these professors and presidents. He was Secretary of the Rhodes Trust and had made approximately 15 trips to the United States as a part of his work with the Rhodes money. He knew President Frank Aydelotte, of Swarthmore, for instance. Aydelotte is on the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies. He was a Rhodes scholar, being in Oxford many years ago. In 1918, he was named American secretary of the Rhodes trustees. Four years later, he was named a trustee of the Carnegie Foundation. This is just one of the many contacts Lord Lothian had in this country with the important "intelligentsia." Editors of important papers were Rhodes scholars. For instance when one of them had written a strong editorial for more active interest in the war, the Round Table, founded by Lothian in London, spoke of his being a Rhodes scholar.

However, this point shall be discussed at length in a later article.

Records show in the last war that many college professors were calling for war long before our entrance. Again, the same drive is being made. Thirty individuals, including many professors, have already called for our declaration of war against Germany.

They want to "educate the educators" for our involvement.

But, let us look at the activities in 1914–17:

"BEGIN WITH PROFESSORS"

Sir Gilbert Parker, who did the propaganda work for the English Government preceding the entrance of the United States in the last World War, said:

"We had reports from important Americans constantly and established association by personal correspondence with influential and eminent people of every profession in the United States, beginning with university and college presidents, professors, and scientific men, and running through all the ranges of the population."

John Masefield said at that time:

"A big application of the idea of the Rhodes scholarships along with public mark of thanks to Yale or Harvard for their sons who have served the Allies might be of great value" (the effort to establish a belief in the identity of interests of Great Britain and the United States).

James Duane Squires, in his informative book, British Propaganda at Home and in the United States, says:

"According to David Lloyd George, almost the first thing that Parker did after assuming his new duties was to make a careful analysis of American press opinion on the war, following that with an equally thorough investigation into American opinion in the colleges and universities. From other sources we know that on the basis of these investigations and on a careful reading of the American Who's Who a mailing list was prepared. It was this mailing list containing thousands of names which was the basis for the distribution of Wellington House propaganda in the United States. The list was complete about the middle of December 1914, and mailing operations began immediately.

"To the persons on this mailing list, and to others whose names were subsequently added, there was sent the propaganda literature which the men in Wellington House believed would be most useful. Sometimes the books and pamphlets had enclosed with them suave and skillfully phrased letters. The enclosure cards which came with the books carried only Sir Gilbert's name and address, never any mention of Wellington House. The whole appearance was that of a kindly, friendly Englishman, who more or less was doing only his simple duty by his many American friends in sending them this literature and inviting their observations on it or on the war in general. Sometimes, to vary the thing, the enclosure cards apparently came from the authors of the books and pamphlets, especially when the authors were well-known men like J. W. Headlam, Viscount Bryce, or John Buchan. But this was generally a ruse de guerre. They usually came from the same place—Wellington House."

PROPAGANDA IN THE SCHOOLS

Prof. H. C. Peterson, who did a real job of research in his excellent book, Propaganda for War, writes:

"Starting as early as August 1914 prominent men of America hastened to join a cause that was intellectually fashionable. Industrialists and financiers, one by one, took up the cudgels for the belligerents with whom they were doing so much profitable business. Preceding them came the imposing array of American society women. They swung into action with great gusto—at long last finding a cause worthy of their talents. Politicians, with the instinct of the chameleon, caught and reflected the popular shades of opinion. College professors and school teachers repeated with a great show of wisdom the arguments which had originated in Wellington House or in la maison de la presse. Close behind the educators came the ministers, and before long the American clergy was preaching a holy war, enlisting God and the Bible in the cause which newspapers told them was righteous. Just as strange as the enlistment of the clergy was the enlistment of liberals throughout the country. Usually such individuals spend most of their time talking about the value of peace. When it came down to hard realities, a large number of these people was found on the popular side assisting in establishing a climate of opinion favorable to war.

"By February 1916 Sir Gilbert Parker was able to report that the articulate people throughout the United States had joined the Allies. The success of the British propagandists corroborates the statement that there are no limits to the field of propaganda. The only restrictions are on the manner of approach. The wealthy can be persuaded to support a cause by getting them to invest their money in it; educators can be controlled simply through controlling their reading matter; liberals and preachers are the easiest of all to enlist by the mere introduction of an idealistic flavor to the propaganda."

"GOT IN TOUCH WITH THE UNIVERSITIES"

Sir Edward Grey wrote in September 1914 that he was sending over J. M. Barrie and A. E. W. Mason "to meet people, particularly those connected with the universities, and explain the British case as regards this war and our view of the issues involved."

It will be recalled that Masaryk came to this country in 1916, and the British report as to his work states that he "got in touch with the universities, particularly with historians and economists."

The central committee of National Patriotic Organizations kept up the drive for the professors, reporting that "practically every professor of every faculty has received * * * private packets of literature in his own language."

It had its effect. Yet Senators who voted for war have tried to say that propaganda had nothing to do with our entrance in that conflict.

Many of us get letters about giving aid. Here is a letter that may be of interest:

"We owe to the Allies whatever moral support and financial assistance it is in the power of this Nation to give. * * * Let us enthusiastically approve supplying the enemies of Germany with financial aid and munitions of war and resist with all our moral strength those who would place an embargo on munitions."

But that is not a letter received in 1939 or 1940. That is a letter written by Josiah Royce, a professor of Harvard University, on January 30, 1916.

The same call is heard today, except in different voices.

The 1940 edition of Josiah Royce may be found in a number of instances. In picking up a New York paper, one could find this heading:

"Historians ask United States to extend Allies all aid."

The article continues that we should give the Allies all aid as advocated in 1916.

Or in the Philadelphia paper one reads this:

"Professors urge help for Allies."

It notes that certain professors in certain Pennsylvania institutions want economic aid given as was advocated 24 years ago. The same type of aid is desired and the same moral front is named as the cause in 1940 as was the case in 1916.

PORTER SARGENT TELLS HOW

Porter Sargent, in his interesting book What Makes Lives, has this to say about universities in the war-propaganda drive:

"HOW COME?

"What does it matter if the universities are hotbeds of war? Only a small percentage of our population goes to the universities. But our lower schools follow their lead, our teachers are trained by their cloistered professors. So it does matter.

"The universities are good propagandists in their own right. They promote themselves as searchers of the truth and preservers of the truth—handing down the wisdom of the ages, they tell us. Actually they are preservers of privilege and the past—time-binders, not time-annihilators.

"How does this come about? Our college presidents, carefully selected after observation, as safe men, are then further conditioned.

For funds they look to the financiers who guard the great reservoirs of accumulated capital. University presidents and other college officials sit on the boards of these foundations with the big men of finance, with agents of the British Empire. They become infected, conditioned, immunized, and intimidated. They have to protect and keep open the sources of income, lest deficits declare them failures. This year their subservience is the same as 22 years ago; they are ready to sacrifice and waste the human resources of the country to preserve the present status in world dominion. This attitude is absorbed by the faculty who look forward to receiving pensions and who must find favor with the administration.

" 'Is this situation due to the moronic ignorance or the satanic machinations of our trustees, presidents, and deans?' asks William Morton Wheeler, who had the most comprehensive mind that has dwelt in Harvard academic shades. 'Is it the fault of the students? Obviously not, for no country produces a greater and more sweetly docile mass of pedagogical cannon fodder'."

STUDENTS DON'T WANT WAR

This is not an indictment against the entire profession but it is a sincere indictment against some within the profession.

One student has written me, "Professors may want war but students don't." I do not say that professors want war—that is, the majority of them—but their statements and speeches are given much space in the intervention newspapers and magazines.

The intervention professor finds an easy access to the intervention newspaper.

Shall the boys of 1960 read of the professors wanting war in 1940 as some of us read of the professors in 1916?

STUDENTS VERSUS PRESIDENT CONANT

A very interesting comparison of the ideas of the students as compared to a president was shown in the story from the Boston Transcript. It quotes from the editorial of Crimson, the Harvard undergraduate paper, as it discusses the prointervention views of President Conant. The Transcript says:

"CRIMSON BITTER AT CONANT FOR ALLIED CAUSE ESPOUSAL—EDITORS PUT HIM AND OTHER COLLEGE HEADS IN 'ROAD GANG' TRYING TO BUILD HIGHWAY TO WAR

"The undergraduate editors of the Harvard Crimson today unleashed a bitter attack on President James B. Conant and other American university and church leaders who have publicly espoused the English and French cause in the European war.

"Asserting that such statements are tending to drive the country into conflict despite its resolve to stay out, the Crimson editors state that 'it is especially disquieting that leaders of youth, the college presidents, should have spoken so scon and so openly the words that may send to destruction the lives in their charge. They are earning an unenviable place in the road gang that is trying to build for the United States a superhighway straight to Armageddon.'

"While singling out for special comment Bishop William T. Manning, of New York; President Charles Seymour, of Yale; and President Conant, the Crimson editorial said: 'These examples are only the most prominent among many that could be pointed out.'

"Presidents Conant and Seymour have separately issued public statements affirming their belief that defeat of the English and French would be disastrous to the world.

"Such statements the Crimson editors described as a 'copious stream of propaganda coming in by the back door.'

"Use lever of prestige

"The editors said:

" 'Within the past few weeks the leaders of religion and education in this country have spoken with an amazing unanimity in strong support of the Allies. If vehemence is any test of sincerity, these men mean what they say. * * *

" 'Still they are not justified in using the lever of their prestige to force the unwilling door of public opinion. The great majority of Americans are determined to stay out of war, and the statements of leading ministers and educators can only tend to drive them into it. * * *

" 'This propaganda is far more dangerous than any emanating from overseas for the very reason that it is accepted as the gospel truth by many more people. The lofty positions of these men give their words weight beyond their worth, so that they should give long and serious thought to the subject before making any statements.' "

The students die in war

This brought from the Boston Herald a very interesting editorial:

"Those who may die

"Undergraduates frequently chide their elders. More often than not their chidings are ignored or their presumptions are smugly set aside as adolescent insolence. We are not certain, however, that either device will serve in the case of the Harvard Crimson's challenge to its own president and other intellectual leaders, as well as religious spokesmen.

"The Crimson editors have charged that many prominent educators and religious leaders are using the great weight of their position to jeopardize American neutrality by publicly and boldly espousing the Allied cause.

"Not only does the Crimson's challenge possess cogency as to its logic, but, in this case, the undergraduates have a special right to be heard, since they are among those who would be called upon first to give their lives if American neutrality should be broken down.

"The Crimson singled out President Conant, of Harvard, President Charles Seymour, of Yale, and Bishop William T. Manning, of New York as typical of prominent men who are using the 'lever of their prestige to force the unwilling door of public opinion.'

"There is a strong element of the ironic in the Crimson's remonstrance. Youth is generally under criticism for its impetuosity. But upon this occasion we find the tables reversed and the undergraduates in the role of the moderate ones. While their academic elders rushed forward and demanded the immediate repeal of the arms embargo, junior has said, 'Not so fast.' While the scholarly men of years and experience have grown somewhat panicky about distant and speculative dangers, junior has cautioned: 'What dangers, and, anyway, what about the dangers here at home if America goes to war or becomes war-minded?'

"We aren't so sure but what the undergraduates win the first decision for sobriety and realism. A nation should be able to look to its intellectual and spiritual leaders for moderating counsel to support, not destroy the neutral temper of a great nation bent on staying at peace. We are inclined to agree with the Crimson that there have been notable failures in this respect.

"To us Walter F. Downey, State commissioner of education, has mapped out a saner and more sober policy for the schools. Recognizing that America is a melting pot in which pressures for partisanship will be strong, he has urged that parents and teachers help in spreading neutrality in the thoughts and hearts of the children.

"Of course, many educators and religious leaders may believe that neutrality is a bad thing for America, but we are happy to match their opinion by that of the group, which, in the final analysis, will have to bear the cruelest blows of war and national bankruptcy, should unneutrality go to its logic extreme of war. We believe that the direct interest of the undergraduates makes them equal in importance as a pressure group to their teachers, for all their prestige."

Future articles will trace the foreign network in the schools, in the newspapers, in the societies, and in our everyday life. Some of our most active propagandists are American volunteers, "enlisted for the duration of the war."

Work To Do To Find a Way for the World To Trade Again

REMARKS

HON. FRANCIS H. CASE

Thursday, July 4, 1940

Mr. CASE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, after the high levels to which we have been elevated by the inspirational addresses we have heard today, it may seem rather workaday to come back and suggest that this Congress has some jobs to do.

Since it is apparent that the Congress is responding to the demand of the people that we shall not dissolve but shall stay here in the job, I would call attention to the fact that one of the major jobs that should be undertaken by this Congress is the settlement of the problem of international exchange. Anyone who thinks about the fundamental causes of the present conflict and of the way out must realize that if the world is to achieve real peace again there must be a sound basis for international exchange.

I think the President is thinking seriously about this matter, but, with many others, I have some doubts that a cartel or some such plan to handle the surpluses of two hemispheres is the answer. When we have been unable to solve the problem of surpluses in this country alone, after spending five and one-half billion dollars, it is clear that it will be a difficult task to handle the export crops of two continents. If we cannot buy and dispose of our own surpluses in cotton and wheat, how can we finance the disposition of the products of two continents? The answer is that we must find a way to restore world trade.

We now have something over 70 percent of the world's gold, something over $19,000,000,000 worth of gold in this country. This Congress should seriously address itself to the task of restoring a medium of international exchange. To me that calls for legalizing methods for the possession and use of gold in this country and taking steps to achieve a means of international exchange that will make it possible for the world to function again in a normal way.

Challenge to the Faithful

OF

HON. LISTER HILL

OF ALABAMA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 8, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. CLAUDE E. PEPPER, OF FLORIDA

Mr. HILL. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by the junior Senator from Florida [Mr. PEPPER] before the Interfaith Conference in the Temple of Religion, New York World's Fair, on Sunday, June 30, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Against the wreckful seige of battering days stand the bruised spiritual ramparts of the earth. Hard-pressed and blood-stained are the thinned and thinning ranks of the defenders of the souls of men. Earth is in revolt against heaven. Body demands the mastery of spirit. Matter would enslave mind. Death presses her relentless struggle for victory over life.

Who can explain the paradox of this age? Hunger, when food has been most plentiful; despair, when man has achieved his greatest hopes; God denounced when His blessings have been most immeasurable.

The heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament showeth his handiwork. He has wrought His miracles into man and through man into the magic earth. His grace has sweetened the waters of life. His love has bound the cruel wounds of hate and strife. Through faith in Him, man has found his way through darkness to an abiding day; His lights are on the towers of time. Yet in this, of all days, pagan gods come back to the seats of power and men fall down before graven images.

Justice is ravaged; mercy scorned; pledges are but the crushed remnants of broken faith. Might walks upon the prostrate body of right. The blood of innocent men flow like flooded rivers. The wail of the widowed, the cry of the orphaned, the anguish of the cringing refugee, falls swordlike upon the ear of the earth.

Man, dethroned from his dignity and debased, his spirit choked, his hopes crushed, his dreams shattered, staggers to his dungeon or his grave. Beauty scarred and scorned, signs out of her last dungeon. Honor is stabbed and slain. Verily it would seem "the earth is given into the hand of the wicked."

But God is still in His Heaven and He has a throne in the hearts of men who yet live. The spirit is not dead. However cruel the blow to the body, it cannot destroy the soul of man. "Truth crushed to earth will rise again." However often she is driven out, justice ever returns upon the wings of God's law to her righteous abode.

It is this faith in the rightness of things which brings us here today. In this edifice is the evidence of man's reverence, the symbolism of the sentiment which has bound together all faiths, all races, all eras, in a fraternity of the spirit. From such an impulse has come the ever upward look of men's eyes. By such invisible forces have men, through the ages, been sustained, brought forward over the hills and the hazards of time. To religion has the needle of the compass of men's hearts ever turned for guidance and assurance. No one has ever followed this guide without gratitude to the great Mariner.

Our world is beset by total war. It is a war fiercely fought upon every front. Assault is made not only upon forts and fortresses, upon frontiers and borders, not only upon imbedded guns and pillboxes, not only upon soldiers in the field; but none the less bitterly does the attack rage against soldiers' homes, loved ones. Sharpest salient of all is against men's wills, men's minds, even men's souls. The "blitzkrieg" is no less fierce against the citadels of the spirit than of the earth.

The fallen angel has challenged the authority of God in His heaven. The demons from below, unabashed, dispute their doctrines with the angels from above. Good and evil contend for mastery of the hearts of men. No premise upon which goodness rests escapes assault. No vice but dares to claim the name of virtue. The very foundations upon which the spiritual edifice of civilization has been built cracks under the pull of these gigantic forces of modern total war.

Things men thought settled by the struggle of immeasurable centuries are found no more secure against these weapons evil men now fight with than were the classically impregnable forts of the Maginot line to the dive bombers and the parachute troops.

This war between good and evil has an unexpected flank movement which respects neither tradition nor logic. This is a war of movement, ruthless, relentless, unimaginably sinister upon every front. The enemy, fantastically armed, is devlish, his energies coordinated with demoniacal thoroughness. Thrusting aside all restraints of tradition, principle, and sentiment, trampling upon all concepts which have marked the boundaries of men's thinking, daring what even the devils have never dared before, he hurls his unfeeling monsters against the hosts of Jehovah.

Surprise has been in the highway upon which a deep salient has been thrust into the ranks of right. Treason has done its part. The spirit, bulwark of our defense, long ago weakened by indulgence or doubt, untoughened by denial, has too often yielded at the first skirmish. Will, paralyzed by inertia, strangled by outworn traditions of strategy, bloodstained from the severed arteries of inspiration, has been a feeble commander.

Hence, the battle goes sorely against the hosts of the Lord.

All time for vacillation is over. The moment has come when men of good will everywhere must take their stand. Lip service to religion, morality, ethics, justice, is no longer more than sounding brass and tinkling cymbal.

Those who are not with the spiritual forces of the world are against them. The trenches of Jehovah cannot be held by absent well wishers and sympathetic neutralists. When the monster of force, breathing destructive fire, raises his head to devour the fragile things of life—beauty, charity, mercy, love, virtue—these holy sentiments cannot be defended by spiritual midgets or moral isolationists. The battle of the Lord was never in history won save by the stalwart, the steadfast, the brave. No virtue was ever vindicated, no vice ever throttled but by bold challenge.

A generation of men has grown callous to the impact of spiritual stimuli. They have grown sordid in indulgence. Their moral armor is rusted. The treasurers of the upper world committed to their care, they have neglected. Much has already fallen into the hands of the enemy. This generation of trustees has not been faithful to its great trusts. It has not only defaulted in its obligations, it has cast aside the most challenging opportunity of all time. It is almost now too late to salvage from the wreckage enough to save intact the old structures we loved.

It is now time for all men to ask themselves what store they place in religion; what value they ascribe to a spiritual life; what are they willing to pay to maintain the freedom of the souls of men. It is now high time for men to answer to their own conscience the question whether they really do love God and place Him first in the heavens; whether they really do regard the dignity of human life as worth fighting for; whether they really mean the utterances of their lips that they will die before conscience may be made a slave and justice a mockery in the world.

Every man in private life, in the quiet moments when he communes with his own conscience, has to ask himself what he stands for; what his life is worth in the gold of eternal values. The way he answers that question even to his own conscience fixes the orbit of his whole life; the nature of the impress he makes upon the monuments of time. There are men who are satisfied with indifferent lives; who are not discontented with purposeless lives; who are not miserable with remorse from wasted talents; but such men are not in the halls of spiritual fame.

Nations alike have to ask themselves what they stand for; whether they have a soul; whether they think only of the fleshpots and not the flame upon the altars of God's church.

The immutable law of the spiritual world applies no less to the United States of America than to other nations or peoples. Citizenship in the kingdom of the spirit is conditioned upon unswerving loyalty to that kingdom and its interests. No nation, however great, whatever may have been the previous eminence of its service, can continue upon that roster, can stand among the soldiery of that realm, and shirk a soldier's call. America cannot claim the right to retain the right spiritual inheritance bequeathed by the sturdy soldiery of the past without being willing to defend it.

Every sentiment of religion, every precept of morality, every code of ethics, every plaintive appeal which comes through the strange medium of conscience to the ears of men cries out to the people of America to rededicate themselves to the eternal moral and spiritual values of the world to a brave, unashamed espousal of God's laws. The downtrodden, the oppressed, the crushed turn their faces toward us and be for the succor which good men should give. Whatever may be the national interest of the United States of America, whatever may be the practical limitations upon what she may do abroad, there is one immutable prophecy which I may lay down—that if we lose the militancy and the moral fervor of a crusading nation, if we lose our national soul, all else is but a fragile shell soon to be crushed in time's inexorable sweep.

Here in this temple of religion I pray that you have kindled anew the religious fires of a nation. I pray that you have quickened the consciences of a mighty people. I pray that you have touched the hearts of a just people. I pray that you have lifted the eyes of noble men and women, boys and girls, from the sordid things to the virtuous values of the world. I pray that you have opened the ears of the hosts of the Lord to the plaintive call of the suffering, the mute eloquence of the dead. I pray that from this majestic edifice there may go out a mystic current which shall vitalize those who are apathetic everywhere to a purposeful consecration.

I know that the light I have seen glow in the bruised faces of the beaten was real, and the fire I have seen burn in dying eyes was genuine, and the strong purpose I have seen surge into the face of God's warriors was inspired, so I know that those who defend the citadels of God shall not fight alone.

Keep Out of War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER T. BONE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 8, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. BURTON K. WHEELER, OF MONTANA

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] before the American Anti-War Crusade of the Keep Out of War Congress at the Auditorium Theater, Chicago, Ill., on June 30, 1940. This address was carried over a national hook-up of the Columbia Broadcasting Co.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"I have seen war—I hate war," President Roosevelt said in his Chautauqua address in August 1936. I hated war then—and I haven't changed—I hate it now. That is why I am talking to this great audience tonight. That is why I am going to oppose the appointments of Colonel Knox to be Secretary of the Navy and Henry L. Stimson to be Secretary of War. That is why I have said publicly that I shall not hesitate to oppose any attempt to make my party the war party. That is why I have said that I will disavow any candidate who I believe may lead this country down the road to war. That is why I shall go on speaking and fighting to the end of my days against those policies and those actions and those men whom I believe wittingly or unwittingly would plunge this country into war.

In 1776, a little band of liberty-loving Americans declared their independence of European monarchy—their independence of Old World social and economic tyrannies. Under a written Constitution that guaranteed civil rights and justice, these Thirteen Colonies became the 48 United States of today. And in all that period of economic and geographic growth, we were tolerant, fair, just, and dedicated to the ideal of human liberty, and we progressed.

The United States is the last great democracy, and the stronghold of liberty, Christianity, and civilization. We may always be thus—if we remain free, tolerant, democratic, and at peace. War—the deadly enemy of liberty and democracy—rages in Europe and in Asia. We know something of its cost. We are resolved to avoid it—we are resolved to remain at peace and to escape bloody conflict.

Make no mistake about it, I am for preparedness, for building up our defenses, but I am opposed to participation in foreign wars. We want no pork barrel, or politically controlled expenditures of the money spent for defense.

Because you are for keeping out of foreign wars does not mean you have your heads in the sand. It means what President Roosevelt said in 1936—I quote:

"We are not isolationists except insofar as we seek to isolate ourselves completely from war."

That was my position then—that is my position now.

But a truly adequate national defense is dependent on more than armed might. Selfish economic and political forces can menace democracy and its institutions with as devastating a power as any "blitzkrieg" by Hitler. During this administration, the borders of social and economic justice have been extended. Still we have jobless workers—10,000,000 of them—and distressed farmers—it is their economic plight that constitutes more of a danger to the security of this Nation than any fancied or real "fifth column."

To men and women lacking food, clothing, or shelter, the grandeur and beauty of democracy is not clear. They will follow the demagogue who promises most—they are easy prey for the philosophies of communism, nazi-ism, or fascism. They are not "fifth columnists"—they are not pro-Stalin or pro-Hitler—as some people who have never suffered the pangs of hunger would have you believe; they are pro-American, but their economic plight is a more real danger to the American way of life than any foreign agent.

Employed workers; a prosperous agriculture; sound business and industry—those will stop the internal growth of any "ism."

In a world gone mad—in a world where the nation with the most guns and bombs and tanks imposes its will on its less powerful neighbor—in such a world it would be obviously the height of folly to sit idly by, unprepared and defenseless. But let us examine this national-defense problem of ours realistically and with common sense.

Consider this: There is not a first-rate military or naval expert here or abroad who will say that this country can be successfully invaded from a military standpoint by any power or combination of powers who have to bring their troops across 3,000 miles of the Atlantic or 5,000 miles of the Pacific. The tragic experience of the Allies in attempting to land troops at Gallipoli is well remembered. More recent is Britain's vain effort to land troops in Norway.

Nazi bombers aren't flying over the Capitol and Nazi submarines aren't plowing through Lake Michigan—and they won't.

Many people believe that the defeat of the Allies would have a depressing effect on our economy. Undoubtedly, the United States would be forced to readjust its foreign trade. Any policy of national defense must encompass defense against economic penetration.

We cannot permit Nazi militarism to follow Nazi economic domination of this or any other nation in the Western Hemisphere. Barter trading employed by Germany is a serious challenge to our pan-American trade. It may become the economic foot in the South American political door. We, as a nation, pride ourselves on our efficiency and ingenuity. Recognizing the problem, we can and will find the solution. We are the richest nation in the world—we can tighten up our belts; we can work a little harder. Some of those who want to get us into war might eat a little less and still preserve democracy—and the lives of our boys.

The important thing about national defense is not to weaken our democratic structure from within in the name of saving America. This country will not be captured from without; it can be delivered to our enemies bloodlessly and almost without our knowing it if we shelve democracy on the sham pretext that in order to combat the totalitarian states we must ourselves become totalitarian.

Do not be misled by these interventionists. Intervention means war for us just as surely as the sun will rise tomorrow morning. And the cost of another war for us can no longer be measured in dollars or cents or even human misery or death and destruction.

Who can measure the economic and social losses incurred by war? Forget, if you can, the $45,000,000,000 cost of the war that was going to make the world safe for democracy; forget, if you can, the 126,000 American boys who were killed; forget, if you can, the 250,000 American boys, many of whom still lie in narrow cots in hospitals that dot our country, men who lie row on row, floor on floor, alive in body but dead in mind; forget, if you can, the hate and brutality and the retrogression of civilization that war brings to the human race; forget, if you can, that the flower of our country, those upon whom we builded our hopes, are gone. How many Edisons, Jeffersons, and Lincolns never lived to serve humanity and their country?

And yet today we are marching down the same road that we traveled in 1916 and 1917—only faster and to more certain destruction. The signs are the same—some of the posts have been repainted in new colors and with more modern catch phrases—but they differ in no respect from what we heard 24 years ago.

Today again, we hear that grimly familiar chant—"The Allies are fighting our battle—the Allies are paying with blood—we would pay only with dollars." Again we are told that this is a war to save democracy and Christianity and civilization. How tragically ironic that phrase is to those of us who remember the purposes and the results of the last war.

But who is it that chants these slogans and catch phrases? Is it any representative leader of American labor? Is it any national figure who speaks for the American farmer? Is it any leading industrialist? Why, no—Alfred Sloan of General Motors says, "Instruments of war create poverty—industrial production will go up, but the Nation becomes poorer." Or is it someone whose services and patriotism during a war will be limited to clipping coupons?

Who are these interventionists who would have us shed American blood and treasure on foreign soil? Just as the Republican Convention was convening in Philadelphia the President sent to the Senate the nominations of two Republicans—Henry L. Stimson to be Secretary of War, and Col. Frank Knox, of Chicago and New Hampshire, to be Secretary of the Navy.

Henry L. Stimson is proposed to head the War Department in these crucial times when the slightest rash act—whether deliberate or not—could easily make it mandatory for the Congress to declare war. I am not opposed to Mr. Stimson because he is a Republican—or because he is a Wall Street lawyer—or because he is almost 73 years of age. I wasn't opposed to members of the Supreme Court because they were over 70 and their work less arduous than the Secretary of War's. But Mr. Stimson is the man who a week ago not only proposed universal compulsory military training for all our people—now, at once—to show the dictators, he said—I quote—"we are in earnest." But he is the man who a few days ago at Yale University also proposed that—and here I quote:

"We should throw open all of our ports to the British and French naval and merchant marine for all repairs and refueling and other naval services—we should accelerate by every means in our power the sending of planes and other munitions to Britain and France on a scale which would be effective; sending them if necessary in our own ships and under convoy."

This, Mr. Stimson knows, is not an act short of war—it is war. No sooner had Mr. Stimson made this statement than he was adopted into the Cabinet. Are his ideas to be adopted by the administration, or would Mr. Stimson have accepted if he knew his ideas were in conflict with the administration?

Even the authoritative Wall Street Journal, commenting editorially on this proposal, upbraided Mr. Stimson, declaring that his recommendation was, in effect, a declaration of war.

And who is Colonel Knox of Chicago, who is proposed to supervise the affairs of our Navy Department in this emergency? Mr. Knox has—in recent years—expressed himself personally and vigorously through the signed editorials in his newspaper. If Mr. Knox goes into the Cabinet—he will have to serve with a group of people whom he has, in times past, put to critical analysis—to say the least.

But let us hear what he thinks of our President—the man who has named Colonel Knox to run the Navy Department.

On September 24, 1936, 1 month after President Roosevelt made an eloquent plea for American neutrality and peace, Colonel Knox wrote—I quote:

"New dealers are trying to work up a war scare. They think it will help them in the campaign. The President is still our shepherd, but from still waters and green pastures he turns now to grim thoughts of foreign dangers. He does not like to leave Washington, he says, for more than 4 days at a time, because of conditions abroad. He is afraid there may be another big war almost any day. And his partisans profess to believe that we may be drawn into it—unless Roosevelt is reelected."

And then Colonel Knox continues—I quote:

"In his negotiations with foreign powers, Mr. Roosevelt has not been fortunate. He muffed his chance with France and Britain in the spring of 1933. He has done nothing about the war debts. Under him our foreign trade, and indeed, our foreign relations, in general, have fallen to a new low. His Russian policy is a fizzle. His far-eastern policy is a naught."

That is Colonel Knox again speaking of our President. But to continue—again this is Colonel Knox—I quote:

"It is bad enough to have for President in time of peace a man who is overconfident, incautious, self-willed, uncertain, and unreliable. In time of war it would be disastrous."

I am not quoting these biting criticisms of the President because they are my views, they are not.

But I ask you, was Mr. Knox appointed to bring about national unity, or because of the views he recently expressed at a bankers convention in Grand Rapids, Mich.?

In that speech he used this language, I quote:

"It is for us to put at the disposal of the British all of the munitions and supplies needed to keep the battle going."

He wants to keep the battle going! Do the American people want to keep the battle going? Do you want to encourage Hitler, Mussolini, and Churchill to keep on bombing cities, killing innocent women and children, filling the hospitals with men made insane by war?

No, you don't want it; and I don't want it. America ought to devote its energies to peace, not to keeping the battle going.

I welcome the idea of a coalition Cabinet in time of emergency. It is not a question of Republicans and Democrats. But if we are to have a coalition, let it be a coalition of peacemakers, not war makers.

Of course, Mr. Stimson and Colonel Knox have a right to their opinions. As Republicans who have vigorously and persistently fought every social and economic advance that this administration has undertaken, you would expect them to criticize. But the important thing to remember is that both these gentlemen are publicly avowed proponents of American intervention.

They ought not to be members of the Cabinet of an administration which has fought the designs of international bankers or an administration that is for peace.

They ought to be members of Mr. Willkie's cabinet.

The past week one of our two major national political parties held its quadrennial convention.

On this vital question of war or peace, what does the Republican platform say? And who have the Republicans nominated? Their platform proclaims a firm opposition to "involving this Nation in war," but in the next breath it proposes to defend "the United States, its possessions, and essential outposts" from foreign attack. Note those words, "essential outposts." What exactly do they mean? I for one would not object to defending the Western Hemisphere from foreign attack. But why did the Republicans not say "Western Hemisphere"? Why the use of such vague and indefinite words as "essential outposts"? What the international bankers who controlled that convention consider essential is something entirely different from what the farmer or white-collar worker or laboring man think essential.

Now that we know what the Republicans put into their platform—let us see what they left out of it.

Last Wednesday the New York Sun, one of the country's leading Republican newspapers, printed on the front page a story with the following headline: "Fight over platform holds up convention.—Antiwar plank again softened at angry demand of interventionists."

The newspaper story then gave some inside information on what was happening. It said, and I quote:

"The platform, most worrisome to the committee since World War days, has aroused bitter travail, controversy, and compromise. Revolt among thoroughly angered interventionist members of the drafting committee—delayed the committee session for more than 3 hours."

What was the revolt about? Simply this. Certain Republicans who want to keep this country out of war had insisted that the platform include the following words—I quote again:

"No drop of blood of an American youth shall be spilled on a foreign shore for the purpose of interfering in any European or Asiatic conflict."

Are not those sensible words? Do not those words express the desire of the overwhelming majority of the rank and file of the Republicans of this country as well as all our citizens? Yet it may astound you to know that these words were stricken out of the Republican platform. The New York Sun tells us that on four separate occasions these words had been written into the platform and four times they were knocked out of it.

Not only did the Republicans dodge this issue, but whom did they nominate, an acknowledged Wall Street lawyer and one who openly espoused the policy of American intervention in Europe's blood baths—until a few weeks, if not days—ago.

A Republican Senator recently stated, after reading some of Mr. Willkie's speeches, that if the Republican Party nominated him, the slogan of his party ought to be "Willkie and War."

Here, then, is unchallenged proof of the position of the Republican Party on the greatest issue facing our country today. Despite all its lip service to the idea of keeping the United States out of war—the Republican Party calmly and carefully refused to pledge itself that no drop of blood of an American youth shall be spilled on a foreign shore for the purpose of interfering in any European or Asiatic conflict.

I do not want you to think that my criticism is made in a partisan spirit. As a matter of fact, nearly every western Republican was for this keep-out-of-foreign-war plank. This issue transcends party lines.

The pledge rejected by the Republicans must be solemnly taken by the Democratic Party. Unless the Democratic Party so pledges itself, there will be no distinction between it and the Republican Party. The war makers have captured one party. They are feverishly working on the other. But they have not completely won their fight as yet. We who want to keep the United States out of war must see to it that the substance of the language rejected by the Republicans is unmistakably accepted by the Democratic Party and incorporated into its platform. If neither party is willing to give this pledge to the American people, then a new and great antiwar party will arise to challenge both the old parties.

Today people are not interested in whether you are a Republican or a Democrat—witness Wendell Willkie—a Democrat, capturing the Republican nomination. The popular followings of both parties are overwhelmingly against our entering the European war. But men working behind the scenes to capture control of the party machinery do not give expression to that sentiment—they are war makers—either openly or secretly. Our problem is to smoke them out for all the country to see.

The issue of 1940 is clearly defined so that all may know. It is not a struggle between two schools of political thought, but a battle whose prize is America's manhood. In this battle you are not a Democrat or a Republican—you are for peace or for war.

The Republican Party has declared itself. Our hope must be pinned on the Democratic convention now only 2 weeks away. At that convention the party control must not fall into the hands of the war leaders. If we fail there will be no peace party in the United States. Both parties will vie with each other in glib assurances of peace while leaving themselves free to act for war. Such a condition will be intolerable.

The American people have given no mandate for war. They must have the chance to give or withhold that mandate. Between a Republican tweedledee and a Democratic tweedledum the issue of war or peace will be deliberately hidden in a smoke screen of oratory—buried under an avalanche of extraneous issues. Let the lines be drawn. If the American people want war after an open and honest debate of the issue, it is their privilege to so declare at the polls. If they want peace, they must not be frustrated. The Democratic Party must be the peace party.

National Unity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 8, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an address which I delivered on July 1, 1940, on the subject National Unity, which was broadcast over the Nation-wide network of the Mutual broadcasting chain.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Good evening, ladies and gentlemen. It is my privilege now to discuss with you national unity. On the floor of the Senate of the United States, on public forums, and in our journals for many years I have advocated with all the power at my command a five-point all-American program to develop national unity and if at the present time you have handy a pencil I wish you would jot down these points.

1. Keep America out of war.
2. Register and fingerprint all aliens.
3. Stop all immigration for the next 10 years.
4. Deport all alien criminals and undesirables.
5. Abolish all foreign "isms."

In particular reference to point No. 1, keep America out of war, surely these days none of us need to be reminded of the dreadful horrors developed in modern warfare. Our last venture in Europe cost more than 100,000 lives, and today, 22 years later, our hospitals are insufficient to provide adequate facilities for its victims in our own country. We entered the last war for the purpose of saving Christianity, sparing democracy, and preventing further wars, but we were sadly disillusioned. Therefore, I am profoundly opposed to sending the sons of American mothers to foreign fields to participate in any foreign war.

I am convinced that the best way to turn our minds from war is to look sharply to our own interests by providing work and assuring contentment for American citizens. Of course, I favor a strong national defense, so strong that no nation on the face of the earth, regardless of its location or supposed strength, would be even tempted to penetrate our outposts or to invade or attack our Nation. Such expenditures for defense, however heavy, are abundantly justified since they are the surest means to prevent the ugly head of war being raised in our midst. And I favor in this regard fortifying and strengthening our outposts and continuing to improve our Nation's defensive strength.

Specifically, for several years past I have advocated that we acquire certain islands in the Atlantic; namely, the possessions of Great Britain and France, extending from the island of Trinidad, off the coast of Venezuela, northward through the Leeward and Windward Islands of the Caribbean Sea, Jamaica, Nassau, Bimini, which is only 50 miles from our Florida coast, Bermuda, 500 miles directly off the coast of North Carolina, and St. Pierre and Micquelon, only a stone's throw from the coast of Newfoundland. Herein lies no thought of imperialism, the sole purpose being for our own national defense.

So I have introduced formal resolutions in the Senate of the United States, authorizing the President to bring this about through negotiation. I have suggested that in this way the much controverted debt question can be partially solved.

You will pardon me for saying that I am somewhat gratified to note that now most of us realize the importance of these acquisitions. Although there has been unfortunate delay from the time when first suggested, and although the matter, I am forced to say, was not given the serious consideration it deserved, I express the hope that this project be no longer delayed and that it be now carried into execution before further complications and added difficulties arise.

As to point No. 2: For many years I introduced bills in the United States Senate having as their objectives the registration and fingerprinting of all aliens. Unfortunately, many people took this subject lightly, and as a result I was unable to secure timely passage of this legislation. However, you are aware that only a few days ago the Congress of the United States enacted these provisions into law so that now all aliens within the confines of the United States will be registered and fingerprinted.

In so advocating these measures I had no desire to harm anyone. I had recognized, however, that this country was literally filled with alien enemies; that they had become termites boring from within; that these enemies were definitely bent upon the undermining of our democracy and indeed upon the destruction of our beloved country itself; that the American people were alive to the fact that our country was and is honeycombed with alien enemies which are currently designated as "fifth columnists" and "Trojan horses." Recent activities in European countries have demonstrated to us the dangers therefrom. You will, therefore, understand some feeling of satisfaction on my part in realizing that the position which I have maintained over the years has been vindicated. Now we will know the number of aliens in this country, from whence they came, when they arrived, whether they arrived legally, whether they are now legally in our country. Hereafter there will be no excuse for a failure to deport those who have no right to be in our midst. For should we be visited with the horrors of war we shall be able to identify these aliens and determine where, in their lists, we may find the enemies of our Nation.

Stop all immigration for the next 10 years is the third objective. I respectfully insist upon this so that our own may have an opportunity to secure employment. With more than 10,000,000 Americans unemployed and millions working only part time, we should first provide jobs for American citizens. They should be given the preference. No other nation upon the face of the earth permits aliens to usurp jobs belonging to its citizens. In addition to the millions unemployed and the millions working only part time, we have today 2,700,000 on the W. P. A. rolls, 300,000 young men in our C. C. C. camps, and annually we are graduating from our high schools and colleges 750,000 boys and girls. We are informed that only about 1 out of every 3 of these youngsters will be able to secure remunerative employment for the next several years. We should stop all immigration now until every single employable American has been provided with employment.

With a view to guaranteeing American jobs for American citizens, I recently introduced and had passed an amendment to the La Follette civil-liberties bill. This amendment provides that in industry engaged in interstate commerce, 90 percent of the workers must be American citizens. As to the remaining 10 percent, preference must be given to those aliens who have applied for American citizenship.

My amendment, which was accepted, further provides that no Nazi, Communist, or Fascist may be employed in any industry engaged in interstate commerce. Of course, employers will be given fair opportunity to determine the citizenship of its employees and their subversive activities.

It is the duty of our business people to see that American jobs are provided for American citizens. The least we owe to the American people is to prevent Communists, Fascists, and Nazis from getting an ugly grip upon American industry to carry out sabotage and widespread destruction at the behest of a foreign dictator.

Point No. 4 calls for the deportation of alien criminals and undesirables. As you know, our jails and penitentiaries are crowded with alien criminals, all cared for at the expense of you American taxpayers.

Crime in the United States costs more than $17,000,000,000 annually, according to the Department of Justice. With taxes mounting, why should we continue to bear the burden of maintaining criminal foreigners. Let's empty some of these penal institutions by returning these alien criminals to their native lands.

In reference to objective No. 5, abolish all foreign "isms," the eternal proverb says that a house divided against itself cannot stand. It is high time that we do away with foolish sentiments and softness. Wipe out communism, fascism, and nazi-ism at once. Too long have we been indulgent with those devoted to the cause of destroying our free institutions. Let them go back to the countries where their doctrines flourish. They don't want us, and we don't want them.

On June 10, I introduced in the Senate of the United States a bill providing for the national defense by prohibiting labor organizations from employing certain persons as officers or agents. This bill provides that it shall be unlawful for any labor organization to have as an officer or agent any person who is not a citizen of the United States, or who is a Communist, Fascist, or member of any Nazi Bund organization, or who has at any time within the past 2 years been a member of or affiliated with such organizations.

Further, with the purpose of abolishing all foreign "isms," on June 12 I introduced a bill in the United States Senate to outlaw the Communist Party, the German-American Bund, and all organizations, groups, or individuals associated therewith who seek to overthrow the Government of the United States by force or violence through the advocacy of criminal anarchy, criminal communism, criminal nazi-ism, and criminal fascism. The Communist Party, the Nazi Bund organization, any Fascist organization, and similar groups should be outlawed. We want none of them. We should have none of them. We should outlaw them now before it is too late.

If you are interested in this legislation described, then I urge you to immediately write or wire your Congressman and United States Senators, requesting their support of these bills, designated as Senate bill No. 275 and Senate bill No. 4132.

This is the time for united action of all those who revere our American institutions. These times call for national unity. America must determine who are its friends and who are its enemies within the borders of its country and act accordingly.

In the foregoing I have submitted a concrete program to be enacted into law and have stated to you tonight the reasons in support thereof. I earnestly request your cooperation in this legislative program, for only Americans can save America for Americans.

If you are in accord with these sentiments and this program, I should welcome your comments.

War or Peace in America?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. GERALD P. NYE

ADDRESS BY JAMES D. MOONEY, VICE PRESIDENT OF GENERAL MOTORS CORPORATION

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by Mr. James D. Mooney, vice president of the General Motors Corporation, on the subject War or Peace in America?

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

WAR OR PEACE IN AMERICA?

I received your invitation to speak here today on my recent return from Europe after an 8 months' journey in the belligerent countries.

It occured to me that you would like me to speak to you on the subject that is close to everybody's heart, the European war, with its threat of drawing America into its great catastrophic whirlpool.

Further, perhaps I could satisfy your interest most by discussing the European war in relation to the vital question, Shall we have war or peace in America?

I made my first trip abroad in 1918. I had been out of college for 10 years at that time and away from my old Ohio home, but by a spin of the old roulette wheel of life I was assigned to the One Hundred and Fifty-ninth Field Artillery Brigade, of the Eighty-fourth Division just as this division was leaving Camp Sherman, Chillicothe, Ohio, for France.

A year after the war was over, and by another spin of the roulette wheel I went over to Europe on a business trip. And I have been spending half of my life over there ever since.

During this past quarter of a century I have had a front-row seat at the long series of political dramas that have been staged in Europe. Naturally, I know something about European politics, but not enough, I warn you, to have any ready-made, pat answers to the many complicated problems over there.

OBSERVATIONS ON THE EUROPEAN SITUATION

However, my years of experience and observation in Europe and particularly my travels throughout the belligerent countries during the first 8 months of world war No. 2 make it possible for me to present to you the following observations:

1. The war is a colossal tragedy for Europe.

2. Normal economic life in Europe is already badly disintegrated.

3. During the past winter, the very first winter of the war, there were already millions of hungry and freezing people in Europe.

4. Europe is living and doing business on paper money. Public debt is piling up in every country at a staggering rate. This rapid increase in debt is badly weakening the paper moneys. The "black bourses" operating under cover everywhere are already placing heavy discounts on the nominal values of the various paper moneys of Europe. As the war goes on we shall witness successive waves of currency devaluations, and finally a complete collapse of the credit and currency structures of the various European countries.

5. If the war were to come to an end tomorrow, it would take from 5 to 10 years to re-create the ordinary processes of production and the normal channels of distribution.

6. If the war continues for another year or two, Europe is doomed for 20 years to far worse poverty than the present generation has suffered during the past 20 years as a consequence of World War No. 1.

7. The war is making a shambles of Europe. The war is creating the background for increasing the millions of starving men, women, and children in the belligerent and neutral countries. Hungry bellies are powerful generators of social disorder and revolution. If the war goes on very long, we shall have some shocking internal political disturbances in the various European countries.

8. During my recent 8 months' experience in Europe I did not find a single man, from brass hat to taxi driver, who did not consider the present war a colossal mistake in international politics and the consequence of a long series of political and economic blunders.

9. No general emotional background existed in Europe to support the undertaking of the war; memories and griefs from World War No. 1 were still too vivid and poignant. The disillusionment that followed the other war made people everywhere inert and unresponsive to the illusions and slogans projected by the propaganda artists whose job it is to generate hysteria and hatred.

10. If the war continues to gain in military momentum, there will ensue the slaughter of millions of men and the creation of millions of widows and orphans. The frightful tragedy in the situation arises out of the fact that this colossal sacrifice will add nothing valuable to human experience. Nor will the continuation of the destruction of Europe move forward one single step the acceptance of any political principle to enable men and nations to live in a more friendly, neighborly way with one another.

11. Tens of millions of families throughout Europe, men, women, and children, are praying to God every day that He will put some good will into the hearts of their political leaders and inspire them to declare an armistice. Peace would bring a general delirium of joy, a universal escape from fear, terror, horror, despair, and material and spiritual misery and devastation.

THE FUNDAMENTAL WAR AIMS

The time is too short to sketch here the war aims of the belligerents. But, at the risk of seeming to make it all too simple, I shall state the fundamental causes of the war, as follows:

Germany and Italy have felt that the power and control exercised by England and France over the commodities, raw materials, and trade of the world subjected their countries to the unendurable condition that food for their people and materials and markets for their industries had been throttled. Germany and Italy rearmed to eliminate this fear that their food supplies and commerce would be cut off.

England and France have had a growing fear of the military power of Germany and Italy and a growing fear of the challenge of this power to their own security.

England and France are fighting for their lives. Germany and Italy are fighting and striving to keep from being starved to death.

WAR THROWS DEMOCRACY OVERBOARD

These aims of the belligerents, as you see, have nothing to do with making the world safe for democracy. Each country is strengthening its governmental organization and structure in every way that will insure a more efficient conduct of the war. I need hardly remind you that in time of war a nation moves very rapidly in the direction of a highly centralized form of government—a dictatorship if you want to call it that—for the duration of the war. The ordinary peacetime privileges of democracy are very quickly thrown overboard.

WE ARE DRIFTING INTO THE WAR

The isolationists want us to stay out of the war. But during the past 23 years, beginning with our declaration of war on Germany in April 1917, we have very often taken an aggressive position in world politics and particularly in European politics. We have "blown hot," and, later, we have "blown cold" and abandoned our position.

Some of the positions we have taken, particularly in the field of international trade and finance, have had a great deal to do with causing the impoverishment of Europe—and, in turn, the present war.

We have had no compunction at all during the past 20 years about playing with matches in the house of international affairs. Now, that the house is in flames, we can't run out and turn our backs on the whole affair. Americans have too proud a tradition as fighters to endure a national policy that would brand Americans as men who run away from anything.

Isolationism would serve our material interests best, but it is probable that we cannot and will not stay out of the war. Our general drift at the present time is certainly not in the direction of staying out.

We are already conducting an undeclared "economic war" on the countries we have identified as our potential enemies. We have just embarked on a stupendous increase in our armaments. As time goes on, the general hysteria will be increased in our country by the war news and propaganda, a war psychosis will have been generated, and eventually some dramatic incident will be seized upon to precipitate us into the war.

ANOTHER COURSE—COMPEL THE DEFINITION OF THE PEACE

What else could America do about this colossal catastrophe that is degrading and destroying Europe?

I propose to you now another course open to our country.

I propose that before we accept the inevitability of the war in Europe continuing—and the inevitability of our eventually going into the war—we consider another course of action for America. This course contemplates neither the improbable solution of "staying out" nor the emotional and catastrophic course of plunging immediately into the war. I propose to you that we consider the possibility of using America's enormous economic and potential military strength to compel a discussion of peace.

Now that we as a nation have authorized another huge increase in our national defenses, it would be extremely useful to clear the air by establishing exactly what it is that we are preparing to defend.

If we intend to go to war then we ought to publish the conditions that will provoke us into the war.

We ought to quit telling the world that we won't fight under any circumstances. Americans are fighters, too, and in this present situation we ought to begin immediately to discuss what we will fight for and why. If we are to fight because we crave a more peaceful and more orderly world, what are the conditions on which a peace will be negotiated and what terms of peace will insure this more orderly world?

In 1917, when we went over to Europe to fight, we were told that we were taking part in creating the basis for a brave New World. When our sons eventually leave for Europe to fight, can't we be more honest with them? Can't we give our sons a more definite idea of what the brave New World will be like?

Are we sure that our sending men and guns to Europe to help shoot up the place will have anything to do with constructing a more orderly Europe? Is there still an opportunity for us to make it plain that before we join the fight we would like to know what the fight is all about and what the terms of the peace will be when the fighting is finished?

America has a tremendous potential military and economic strength. Before we decide suddenly to add this strength to the forces that are destroying Europe, at least we ought to take one last good look at the possibilities of using this strength in the international situation to compel a discussion of the basis for the peace.

WAR FOR AMERICANS MEANS CATASTROPHE, TOO

I have told you that the war is a colossal catastrophe for Europe. The catastrophe there arises principally out of the economic disorder that existed in Europe at the outbreak of the war and which is being spread and intensified with every day of war.

We have economic disorder in America, too. The South is staggering under the unsolved cotton problem. Because our productive industries in all parts of the country are strangled from one cause or another, we have several million men still out of work. We have slums and frightful housing conditions all over the country. We are continuing our drift into rising prices and inflation because of the rapid rise in our public debt.

Do you think our entry into the war will do anything but make these problems a hundred times worse? Can you escape seeing that when our sons return from the battlefields they will be confronted by a reconstruction problem that will make the social, economic, and political disorder of the past 10 years look like a pink tea?

A NEGOTIATED PEACE WOULD BE DIFFICULT

Negotiating a peace at this time, of course, would be extremely difficult. Peacemakers who interpose themselves between belligerents usually find themselves in the most thankless of jobs. This would be particularly true in the present situation.

It is evident that a formula providing security for the English and French, and removing the threat of starvation for the Germans and Italians, will be very difficult to construct and make acceptable to both sides.

A negotiated peace would require vast patience and persistence to effectuate. Once accomplished it would necessarily contain compromises on both sides that would make it subject to criticism by some of the politicians in the various countries.

But all these difficulties that can be charged against a negotiated peace can be compared with the terrors of a rough, cold sea that a man might be challenged to jump into from a burning ship. The sea is terrible, yes, but staying on the ship means suicide.

AMERICA CANNOT ESCAPE THE IMPACT OF THE WAR

The present war in Europe is suicide for the political, economic, and social order there. The war is dooming the present generation in Europe and their new-born children to long years of unthinkable poverty and social misery.

That America can remain unscathed or unaffected by this appalling misery of her neighbors and her blood kin in England, Germany, France, and Italy is an absurd assumption. The war will make us suffer, too, not only in a material way but in conscience for such of the responsibility as rests on our shoulders for the deep underlying political and economic causes of the war.

The European war fascinates us and worries us. And we shall not sleep well as long as the war burns with a bright flame.

AMERICA'S OPPORTUNITY FOR PEACE

Some opportune moment will come when all of the belligerents will welcome the proposal of an armistice by a neutral country.

Only America with her great economic and potential military strength can act as mediator and facilitate such a discussion of peace.

It will take courage and coolness to seize an opportunity to stay the destruction of Europe. I know you will join me in praying that America will not fail to accept such a challenge in behalf of peace.

EDITORIAL FROM THE MINNEAPOLIS MORNING TRIBUNE

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an editorial appearing under date of Saturday, July 6, in the Minneapolis Morning Tribune, under the heading Needless Notes.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Minneapolis Morning Tribune of July 6, 1940]

NEEDLESS NOTES

Germany's reply to the American note regarding the Monroe Doctrine will, of course, add to our war jitters. It can be construed as a "challenge," or a "defiance," or as serving notice on the United States that Germany intends to take possession of a portion of the Western Hemisphere, according to the state of one's nerves.

But before going into a mental collapse, one may very well ask what was the purpose of the original note to Germany informing that country of our interpretation of the Monroe Doctrine. Germany had given no occasion to suspect that at the moment it had any intention of taking possession of Western Hemisphere territory. That Germany would attempt to do so was a possibility that our Government had every right and duty to consider, and it was this Government's right and duty to take every precaution to meet such a contingency. But a note is a provocation, not a precaution.

The Monroe Doctrine is nothing new. It has been known for 100 years and it is to be assumed that the German Government was not in ignorance of the position of the United States. Germany, therefore, had no need of the warning note sent by our State Department. It was a gratuitous warning on our part, for which there was no justification, beyond the general suspicion that Germany might attempt to gain territory on this hemisphere, and it brought such an answer as might be expected.

It was President Wilson's indulgence in note writing that got us into the last war of inglorious memory and it would be well for President Roosevelt to restrain his pen until there is justfication for its use. Whether it was so intended or not, our note and the German reply can only bring us closer to the brink of war because it has created a wholly suppositious issue in the minds of millions who will read into the incident a declaration of Germany's intention to violate the Monroe Doctrine.

That may well be Hitler's intention and it is certainly the part of wisdom for the United States to gird itself to repel any such attempt. In view of the fact that if Hitler, in his answer, had foresworn any intention of coming to this hemisphere, we would not have believed him and be under the same impelling necessity to reply to him as we now are, what was the use of warning him off the western shores? We do not believe his word is worth the paper on which it is written, so why ask him for his word?

Let us get ready for him and quit writing to him.

Monday, July 8, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE NEW YORK TIMES

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the New York Times by G. H. Archambault, entitled "The Wide Horizon."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the New York Times]

THE WIDE HORIZON—A FRENCH PEASANT'S MESSAGE

(By G. H. Archambault)

BORDEAUX, FRANCE.

To escape the turmoil of overcrowded Bordeaux, this correspondent wandered out into the suburbs until he reached a famous vineyard some miles out of the city. The gates were open. The correspondent wandered in, watching men spraying the vines. The lark sang blithely on high. All was peace in the dawning sun.

The old vigneron appeared and bade the visitor welcome. Rugged, tanned, and bent by years of labor, he represented that France which is eternal. After the customary courtesies he unburdened himself.

"So you write for an American paper. Then tell the Americans this:

"My father fought the Germans in 1870. I fought them 20 years ago. My son is fighting them now; heaven knows where he is. Of these three wars we have won one and lost two. But we are not beaten. There are very hard times before us. May God in His mercy make us fit to bear them.

"It may surprise you, sir, to hear an old Frenchman invoking God since we have been hitherto an avowedly Godless state. That, indeed, is one of the causes of our misfortune. We have lacked an ideal. I confess that in this matter I have been as guilty as most of my countrymen. We came to imagine that the proper duty of man was to arrange an easy way of life, individualistic to the point of selfishness.

"I am old enough—I shall be 73 next month—to speak plainly without being accused of afterthoughts. I tell you that we followed the wrong road. We were all democratic in spirit, but in reality we were too much concerned with ourselves. It was to a great extent the fault of our institutions which tended to breed politicians instead of statesmen, and which set party interests before those of the Nation. This is not the time to apportion the blame; in truth, we are all responsible.

"We saw no farther than the parish pump, and we were well satisfied when our representatives in Parliament brought home some of the gravy. We looked upon the state as a universal purveyor, and we always spoke of our dues, seldom of our duties.

"I am myself of the Left; here most of us vote Radical-Socialist. But labels are of no account now, and to tell the truth all parties are equally responsible. All of us, in every party, looked upon our representatives as natural intermediaries between ourselves and the Government for the distribution of manna from the state coffers. It reached the point where ministers of finance dared not reveal that they had a surplus; otherwise every party claimed its share.

"Periodically money was asked of us for national defense. We gave it unstintedly. Then we learned that it had been spent for other purposes, and we were asked for more. We gave it again. The politicians explained that it had all been expended for 'social reforms.' No doubt it was, but it did not help much when it was divided among millions.

"For many years now it had become evident that our parliamentary form of government had failed. Every successive Cabinet had been compelled to ask for dictatorial powers in order to be able to administer the country. But we persisted in our errors. For one thing we persisted in leveling the nation down and in imagining that the State would prove an everlasting milch cow.

"The awakening is rude. A terrific task faces our young generation—what is left of it. We old men must do all we can to help it morally and materially. We are about to become slaves, but I am convinced that adversity will weld the nation. We shall have to bow our heads, but no force on earth will be able to break our hearts.

"Tell all this to the Americans and warn them at the same time of the perils that may befall democracy everywhere when it forgets that free men have duties as well as rights."

Logan-Walter Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD R. BURKE

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 8, 1940

ADDRESS BY DR. RICHARD A. KAHN

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, the Logan-Walter administrative-law bill, House bill 6324, Seventy-sixth Congress, recently passed the House of Representatives by a vote of 287 in favor of the bill as compared with a vote of 97 against it. The corresponding Senate bill, S. 915, was unanimously recommended by the Senate Judiciary Committee for passage and indeed it did unanimously pass the Senate in July 1939, only to be reconsidered at the request of the junior Senator from Indiana [Mr. MINTON]. The House bill has been considered by the Senate Judiciary Committee which unanimously recommended, one member absent, that such bill be amended in certain minor particulars and instructed the subcommittee in charge thereof to avail itself of every opportunity to get the bill before the Senate for debate and vote.

This bill has been considered by Dr. Richard A. Kahn who has made an address recommending passage of the bill. Dr. Kahn was at one time a professor of law at the famous and ancient University of Heidelberg. Later he was corporation counsel for Berlin and still later he was counsel for the Berlin Electric Power Co. The latter position was held by Dr. Kahn immediately before and during a part of the Hitler regime in Germany. He was proscribed by the Hitler regime and escaped to the United States. Dr. Kahn has experienced totalitarianism at first hand and he knows by experience the evils of such a government system—a rule in the discretion of government officials, as contrasted with a rule of law which the Logan-Walter bill seeks to reestablish and reinforce in America. Dr. Kahn has studied the Logan-Walter administrative-law bill against the background of the German system and he has reduced some of his thoughts on the bill to writing. I ask unanimous consent that his address may be printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

When a foreigner enters the harbor of New York he usually is overwhelmed by two impressions: by the significance of the Statue of Liberty and by the majesty of the city itself. The statue seems to emanate encouragement, hope, and enlightenment, the city reflects strength, will power, and industry. Most Americans seem to have had these or similar impressions as they are reflected in their many activities.

But in one point the American seems to distinguish himself from the newcomer. The latter passes through a sort of rebirth or at least of a renewal, he gratefully admires the liberties and opportunities of this great country. The former takes everything for granted.

Should not every American from time to time virtually leave the country and reenter the harbor of New York asking himself, From where do we come, where do we stand, and where do we go?

From where do we come?

Liberty and equality were not among the inborn rights of men. They were and are the result of conquest. Too easily this historic truth is forgotten. The brutal survivorship of the stronger begins with Cain and it does not end with Hitler. The correctives of brutal force, the rules of morality and equality before the law, ever have been attained by fight or by fright or by both of them. The standard bearers of what we consider progress of law, morality, and civilization always had to conquer a new territory. It was not delivered up gratuitously, not in 1215 and not in 1776.

Where do we stand?

The Constitution of the United States with its special guaranty of fundamental human rights is another result of victorious conquest. But we are on the way to lose what was conquered by our forefathers.

The trouble begins with the modifications of the concept of property. This concept during the last 150 years constantly was narrowed. When the Constitution was adopted, people owned not only physical goods but the whole and immense free spheres of their life. We perhaps augmented the number of goods, but we certainly diminished the content of the property rights themselves. Take the case of transportation. At the time of George Washington, post coaches and post traffic were publicly regulated. About 50 years later the railroads came along and they were regulated. About 80 years later the motor carriers came along and they were regulated. We should not forget that nearly all technical progress was followed by another restriction upon the free sphere of our lives. From communication by mail we progressed to communication by telephone and later to communication by radio, but we did not progress adequately in freedom of using the new inventions. One may say that government has entered the new fields by adapting the old principles of public control for new situations. But this is not the whole story. Government regulations were sought in fields of human activity which are older than peoples themselves. Chiropodists, barbers, or plumbers practiced in ancient times, but public regulation of their practice is comparatively new. In recent years economic legislation has resulted in an enormous enlargement of administrative regulation. We may agree or not agree with respect to the merits of such measures, but it is clear that the principle of equality before the law was in no way guarded. The remainder of our property rights was not assured of higher protection as should have been done after years of constant infringement. At least the protection of the rest should extend in the same proportion as the restriction of the whole.

Alexander Hamilton once wrote: "If there are such things as political axioms, the propriety of the judicial power of a government being coextensive with the legislative may be ranked among the number." Since the time of Hamilton numerous fields of a formerly free activity have been delivered from time to time to administrative regulation. Was the judiciary coextensive? The answer is in the negative; the judiciary did not hold pace with the legislative or with the executive.

In many cases of executive and administrative expansion no judicial control was established at all. In other cases a sort of judicial control was established which is a falsification of what commonly is considered as such. In general Federal administrative cases have been hidden away from any controlling jury trial. Equity courts and appellate courts which do not invoke any jury participation do most of the job. It seems to be a juggler's trick in taking away common-law rights (which were protected by jury trial) and in transforming them into statutory rights, if any (which are not subject to a jury trial). But it has been done.

In some cases of administrative control the reviewing court is bound by administrative statements of fact. Such a prerogative of administration must be objectionable to every experienced judge. Evidence is not so much a matter of a transcript as it is a matter of personal impression. A purely indirect procedure can never satisfy the needs of justice. Concluding this part of our consideration we may state that the invasion of the private sphere of our life by public administration was not accompanied by an adequate extension of judicial protection.

There have been fundamental changes in recent years in the interrelations of the individuals themselves. Public administration caused important modifications in the contractual field. Take for example the F. H. A. insurance contracts. Everybody knows that forms and conditions of F. H. A. contracts influence a tremendous part of all building contracts in this country. The E. H. F. A. contracts influence a large part of all the contracts in electric appliances. Economic pressure of the administrative agencies involved is usually so strong that there is only one alternative for the average businessman, either to accept the administrative command or to stay out of business completely. Consequently portions of the former free interrelations between individuals are occupied by forms and conditions of the executive. And these portions, formerly accessible to judicial control, are frozen in a system of equalizing administrative order. Instead of extending the judicial power in the same proportion as the executive has extended its power, we robbed the individual of many spheres of his freedom without even preserving the remaining spheres.

There is no doubt that the public sphere of our life in the near future will be enlarged at the expenses of the individual sphere.

Necessary defense measures will be adapted; new taxes will follow. Taxation itself is an encroachment on life, liberty, and property. Lower standards of living are inevitable, poverty and the need for social services will increase. All measures to be taken will extend the spheres of the legislative and of the executive. They will enter more fields of human activity and more deeply the fields already entered. Will the judiciary again be neglected?

There is grave danger in the way we go. Lloyd George once said before the House of Commons: "Revolutions never are made by the rich class nor by the poor class. The rich ones are too few and the poor ones never knew of better times. But when the middle class comes to distress, then a revolution is approaching." Lloyd George is right. Hitler's ascent was a revolution of the middle class. The 12,000,000 votes he won in 1932 were votes of the deposed middle class which felt strangulated by an overwhelming socialistic regulative system. Distress must not necessarily mean economic distress, it may be a mental distress. In 1932 such a mental distress of the average businessman was obvious in Germany. Anger and bitter feeling about the socialist confusion was general among businessmen. Which were the wrongs the German democracy had committed? It overdid administrative and executive regulation. The average Mr. Smith could not stand the hundreds of taxes and tax forms; he just could not stand the monopolization by the Government of the main parts of economic life, such as railroads, motor carriers, banks, and insurance corporations; he could not stand the misuses and business practices of a socialized medicine, the arrogance of some labor bosses and the constant decline of an adequate judicial protection. The socialist regime went so far as to exclude lawyers from all German labor courts. Such and similar measures naturally created ill feeling. When Hitler promised betterments I often heard people exclaim: "Give him a chance. If he is not good, we will elect another man." They were shortsighted enough not to see the danger behind Hitler.

If in this country we continue the way we go, I see the same effects and the same development approaching.

I salute the proposed Walter-Logan bill as one of the bulwarks of democracy. It is a moderate approach toward a restoration of the somewhat tattered bill of rights. In some directions it does not go far enough; it does not fully materialize two principles of justice, the directness of procedure and the independence of judges. Still the judicial review as proposed is based upon transcripts instead of a retrial. Still the administrative boards as proposed lack judicial immovability which conditions independence. Still some important administrative actions—as, for example, the denial of a loan or the denial of employment, are exempt from judicial review.

But the Walter-Logan bill as proposed is a tremendous step forward toward the restitution of judicial protection we need for the small sphere of individualism and privacy we still possess. The advantages of the bill are these:

1. The administration will be bound by and to its rules and regulations.

Section 2 (d) of the bill forbids the use and the application of any exemption which was not 30 days in advance published in the Federal Register. The "self-binding duty" of administrative agencies was and still is a precarious chapter in our administrative law. The viewpoint prevailed that "who has the power to rule, has the power to exempt." Such a viewpoint is an open door for mischiefs and favoritism. Closing this door is an eminent and courageous legislative act. It will help to substitute confidence for distrust. It will take away many grounds for suspicion which itself may endanger a highly burdened democratic system.

2. The administration will be greatly simplified and unified. The review of general rules by the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia and the extended prerogative of the Supreme Court of the United States in granting the writ of certiorari in administrative cases will result in a simplification of administration.

We need such a simplification most urgently. Fundamental definitions, words, phrases, and concepts as used in administration are in a lamentable state of confusion. The courts just mentioned will be able to unify the fundamental concepts and to impose their use on all administrative agencies involved. Today we often find what is acknowledged in Pennsylvania Avenue is rejected in Constitution Avenue and vice versa. Social Security Board and National Labor Relations Board differ on the concept of "laborer." Even in the same department two divisions may have two different conceptions of the same word. The Agricultural Adjustment Administration and the Farm Credit Administration likewise differ in these respects.

Who wants to sustain the multifariousness of our administrative phraseology?

There are those who make a business out of it—to administer much but not well. There are those who prefer political superficiality to scientific thoughtfulness. There are those who prefer applause from their ranks rather than intelligent service to the people.

The courts elaborating fundamental concepts and definitions will have the power to deny deviations and to divest deviations, if any, of legal validity. Imposing the same concepts in the same situations upon all administrative agencies, the courts will be able to unify and to simplify our whole administrative system. They will do the preparatory work for the necessary code of public administration and of administrative law. A recent publication praises wide variety of administrative methods and procedures as well as "the vast complex of our administrative institutions." The publication bears the name of the Brookings Institution. Experiences warn me to distrust men who enjoy the pell-mell of public administration; they usually are good fishermen but not more.

Our present system is the result of refined policies in the legislative. A friend of America, Edmund Burke, in his conciliation speech, said: "Refined policies are the parents of confusion." He is right. What we face today is not far from confusion. The average Mr. Smith is unable to distinguish among the hunceds of regulatory administrative orders; to him administration is secret science of the politicians; he demands clearness and cleannes. Not administrative instincts, not administrative interests, but only disinterested courts can and will guarantee both.

3. The judiciary will be restored to its constitutional importance.

As explained above, many spheres of our life in recen years switched from the private side to the public side. By that they have lost most of their judicial protection. The Walter-Logan bill will retake them under the wings of the judiciary.

We cannot turn back the wheels of history. The invasionof the public authority in our life will stay; it probably will be expanded. But the Walter-Logan bill will extend judicial protection to the new interrelations, acknowledging what they are, fixing stablelimits in the interest of the individual, balancing the needs of both; of administration and of the individual, equalizing the applicaton of administrative rules and administrative action, elaborating general definitions and concepts without which dispersion of justice never was or will be possible. One of the most important taks of the newly empowered courts will be to heal the wounds already inflicted by unjust acts of the administration. Unsatisfactory legal situations are equivalent to unsatisfactory physical situations. Considering this, Jeremy Bentham wrote in chapter IV of his Fragment on Government: "God forbids that any disease in the constitution of a state should be without a remedy." We may add that a remedy must exist for any disease of any administrative or Executive decision. The Walter-Logan bill will reopen the way to the remedy, the way of judicial review; and the Walter-Logan bill will give the remedy itself, the judicial judgment. To me the bill is the most encouraging legislative document since the abolition of slavery. It is the abolition of a slavery—a slavery of a free people to a Government bureaucracy.

Time Has Come When the United States Should Sponsor a Peace Movement—Pan American Conference a Good Place To Start

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 8, 1940

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I have today introduced a resolution which is intended to direct the might of the Western Hemisphere in a movement to bring peace to the world. The resolution is as follows:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the Secretary of State is requested to place on the agenda of the Pan American Conference to be held at Habana this month a proposal that the Pan American countries as a unit tender their good offices as a mediator in the disputes which now unhappily threaten to disrupt European civilization.

Mr. Speaker, the Old World, from the Arctic to the Tropics, is aflame with war or blackened with the smoldering ruins of war. Thousands upon thousands of newly made mounds, on which the grass has not yet had time to grow, mark the toll that war already has taken from the flower of Europe's manhood since the terrible conflict began, and while these graves are being watered with the tears of mothers, wives, and sweethearts, the way is being prepared for more graves and more tears. In countless homes there is indescribable agony, the agony that springs from death and suffering on every hand, and that other awful agony which comes from the suspense of not knowing what is in store next. Hell is, indeed, loose in Europe.

What a challenge to the religious and moral forces of the world this situation presents!

George Canning, the British Foreign Minister at the time the Monroe Doctrine was promulgated, said: "We have created a New World to redress the balance of the old."

May we not regard those as words of prophecy now applicable to the world situation? May we not envision the New World rescuing the Old World from the combination of murder, suicide, and total bankruptcy of moral values with which it is now afflicted? In the American republics we have a composite of European racial elements, a representive picture of the cultures and traditions of the Old World but, unlike the Old World, chastened by contact with the new frontier. Is not the opportunity now afforded for the New World to perform a service of inestimable value to the Old World from whose loins it sprang?

I think the time is at hand when the New World, under the leadership of the United States, may very well take the lead in trying to find a common denominator of peace among the warring nations, and I believe the Pan American Conference to be held at Habana beginning July 20, would afford exactly the setting to make such a move impressive.

If the 21 American states comprising the Pan American Conference were to proceed along the line indicated in this resolution they not only would furnish a most enlightening and challenging exhibition of Pan American solidarity, but they would demonstrate peace sympathies in a way that would appeal powerfully to the peoples of all the countries in the world. It would be a most vivid dramatization of the Western Hemisphere exerting its utmost effort to save civilization from destruction. Such an appeal coming from such an imposing and vital source would be hailed with joy by the peoples of all the countries of the world, who are asking nothing more than to be rescued from the thralldom of war, and intransigent rulers, knowing the sentiment of their peoples, would hardly dare to refuse to assemble around a peace table.

What, then, would be the prospect of success of such a move on the part of the United States? First let me say that, whether it succeeds or not, we would be doing our part as a Christian nation and failure would neither compromise us nor leave the world in any worse condition than it is now. But I really do not believe it would fail. The newspaper reports indicate that undercover peace feelers are being put out from various directions. Britain's position is most perilous, faced as she is by the combined forces of Germany and Italy with their superior armies, and the addition of part of the French fleet to their navies. Sympathetic as we are with Britain one finds it impossible to conceive, considering the tremendous odds against her, that her best interest lies in prolongation of the war, which, if carried to the extreme, might mean the imposition of unbearable sanctions and the dismemberment of her empire. Britain obviously cannot sue for peace without more blood letting, but an invitation to a peace conference coming from friends in the New World might not be unwelcome to her. Then, too, the menacing situation that is developing in the Balkans may make Germany very amenable to the suggestion of a peace conference. There is every reason to believe that Hitler has bit off more than he can masticate and that Stalin is getting uncomfortably on his rump. Hitler would hesitate a long time before he would decline a Pan American invitation to a peace conference.

I would hope that such a peace movement, originating in the New World, would be the first step in a spiritual renaissance, the need of which was so well expressed by President Franklin D. Roosevelt when he summarized his views in a statement which in the light of present developments seems born of true inspiration.

No greater thing—

Said he a few years ago—

could come to our land today than a revival of the spirit of religion—a revival that would sweep through the homes of the Nation and stir the hearts of men and women of all faiths to a realization of their belief in God and their dedication to His will for themselves and for their world. I doubt if there is any problem—social, political, or economic—that would not melt before the fire of such a spiritual awakening.

America, in cooperation with the other republics comprising the Pan American Conference, has a great opportunity to stabilize the peace of the world. I hope the House will adopt my resolution and thus help to usher in the spiritual awakening so beautifully envisioned by the President. If the Western Hemisphere, under the leadership of the United States, can start a movement that will banish war and restore peace on this terrestrial globe, it will be doing the biggest thing imaginable, and humanity in every land and under every flag will rise to bless us. Congress speaks for the American people and the people want peace. If this resolution is adopted, it will be the voice of America to the world pleading for peace. Let us adopt the resolution and lift some of the pain from the aching heart of the world.

State Indemnity for Errors of Criminal Justice

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT M. LA FOLLETTE, JR.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 8, 1940

ARTICLE BY EDWIN BORCHARD

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article entitled "State Indemnity for Errors of Criminal Justice," prepared by Prof. Edwin Borchard, Hotchkiss Professor of Law, Yale University.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

STATE INDEMNITY FOR ERRORS OF CRIMINAL JUSTICE

(By Edwin Borchard, Hotchkiss Professor of Law, Yale University)

All too frequently the public is shocked by the news that Federal or State authorities have convicted and imprisoned a person subsequently proved to have been innocent of any crime. These accidents in the administration of the criminal law happen either through an unfortunate concurrence of circumstances or perjured testimony or are the result of mistaken identity, the conviction having been obtained by zealous prosecuting attorneys on circumstantial evidence.

In an earnest effort to compensate in some measure the victims of these miscarriages of justice, Congress in May 1938 enacted a law "to grant relief to persons erroneously convicted in courts of the United States." Under this law, any person who can prove that he was wrongfully convicted and sentenced for a crime against the United States may bring suit in the Court of Claims for damages of not more than $5,000 against the Federal Government.

The Federal act of May 24, 1938, limits the right of recovery to innocent persons who have been both convicted and served all or a part of their sentence. The innocence must be proved either by appeal or new trial or rehearing in which innocence is established, or by a pardon on the ground of innocence. It must also appear that the erroneously convicted person either committed none of the acts with which he was charged or that those acts constituted no crime against the United States or against any State or Territory. He must also show that he has not either intentionally or by willful misconduct or negligence, such as false, voluntary confession, contributed to bring about his arrest or conviction. On the establishment of all these conditions he may sue in the Court of Claims.

NEED FOR LEGISLATION

The justice underlying this principle of compensation is apparent. But the law adopted by Congress may not, of course, be resorted to by persons wrongfully convicted under the statutes of the various States. Since the enactment of such legislation was first proposed in 1913, only three States—Wisconsin, North Dakota, and California—have enacted compensatory statutes. Clearly there is need for the legislation in every State of the Union. While the Federal law is exceedingly narrow, I urge it as a model for the State legislatures.

It is true that on occasion several States have by special act granted indemnity to the innocent victim of an erroneous conviction. Parliament in England has sometimes taken similar action. But in the United States, as in England, these special statutes are enacted only spasmodically, and not all persons have the necessary influence to bring about legislation in their own behalf.

In moving for this amendment of the criminal law by the State, we should be guided not solely by a sense of justice but also by the models and precedents in the legislation of most of the countries of western Europe. France, Holland, Switzerland, Germany, Portugal, Denmark, Norway, Sweden, and Italy now have elaborate statutes governing this subject. So do several of the countries of Latin America. Ever since the French Revolution, reformers and criminologists have sought to bring about this amendment of the criminal law, and from 1886 on they have seen their efforts crowned with success in one country after another. The States of the United States ought not to lag behind any longer.

TYPICAL CASES

To illustrate the need for a corrective when justice stumbles, I would like to tell briefly the stories of several well-known cases. The first is that of a Hungarian immigrant named Toth. An innocent bystander at a saloon brawl in which a man was killed, Toth was arrested for the murder. Rather dull of wit, unable to speak English, and hardly knowing what was happening, he was quickly convicted and sentenced to life imprisonment. He continually protested his innocence. After serving 20 years of his sentence his innocence was established beyond a doubt. He was released from prison a physical wreck. The law could only give him his liberty; the State legislature declined to grant him compensation, and finally Andrew Carnegie extended him sufficient charity to take him to Hungary and gave him a small monthly stipend.

A case of pure circumstantial evidence occurred very recently in Georgia. Robert E. Coleman, 22 years old, came home one night from his work as a salesman of picture frames, and, as he claimed, found on the floor of his bedroom the battered body of his 18-year-old wife. The baby was crying in its crib. The police answered his frantic telephone call and promptly placed him under arrest, charged with the murder. His dazed and harassed condition made him a poor witness, badly confused. The fact that the woman was apparently killed about the time that Coleman probably went to work in the morning, that the death-dealing weapons used, a poker, a flatiron, and a piece of wood, were all in the house, the fact that the overalls in which Coleman worked around the house were found newly washed, with suspicious stains clearly visible, that he left the house that day earlier than usual and seemed excited, that he was shaken and nervous when the police questioned him, were sufficient to convince a jury. His violent denials injured rather than helped him. The jury recommended mercy and he was sent to the chain gang for life.

Inasmuch as Coleman could supply no better explanation of the murder than the one essayed by the prosecution, it is perhaps not unnatural that the jury believed the prosecutor's version of the story. It is not always safe to be the first on the scene to find a dead body. But for the fact that a series of new murders were committed in that region over the months and years following, the truth might never have been revealed. But the new murders led to the apprehension of one James Stark, a professional killer, who not only confessed the Coleman murder, but convinced an investigating body appointed by Governor Talmadge that he alone committed it. The Governor not only pardoned Coleman, who had served 4 years, but publicly deplored the miscarriage of justice and recommended to the legislature the appropriation of $2,500 for his relief.

The celebrated Beck case in England arose through mistaken identity in conjunction with gross negligence by the English police, prosecuting officers and the courts. Beck served 7 years on a serious charge and was then released only because the real offender fell into the hands of the police and the mistaken identity was established. As an act of grace, due largely to the unwelcome notoriety of the case, Parliament granted Beck an indemnity. In the vast majority of cases, the poor sufferer receives no second thought from the community or any responsible authority.

FALSE CHARGE OF MURDER

In the South, and possibly elsewhere, girls occasionally leave home and supply no mailing address. Then somebody discovers a rag or a bone or a hank of hair, and a vivid or malignant imagination concocts a tale of murder. The clothes are identified—in a typical case—as those of Jennie Wilson. It is recalled that she had a quarrel with her husband, Bill; possibly he even once threatened her. Bill has none too savory a reputation anyway, and out of these fragments a clever prosecution and an indifferent jury piece together a conviction of murder in the first degree. Only by a lucky accident is the sentence commuted to life imprisonment. Five years later Jennie Wilson is found hale and hearty in a neighboring State, having simply gotten tired of her husband. This case is not at all unique; yet probably in many cases Jennie Wilson, although alive, is not found.

In 1909 the Reverend Ernest Lyons, a Negro preacher of Reids-Ferry, Va., was convicted of the murder of his colleague, the Reverend James Smith. The two were rivals, Smith, the pastor of the flock, having to compete with the growing popularity of his assistant, Lyons. Smith lived in the Lyons house. They were known to quarrel, and Smith was suspected of intimacy with Lyons' sister-in-law. Both were to attend the regional church conference at Suffolk, Va., on August 1, 1908, and Smith was entrusted with the contribution of $45 painfully assembled by the little congregation. It was said that during a quarrel that day Lyons had threatened to kill Smith. They left the church together on the evening of July 31, and the next day Lyons arrived at Suffolk; but not Smith. Lyons stated that he had come alone and that Smith said he would follow, but apparently did not. Nothing more was heard of Smith or of the $45. Lyons became the pastor of the church, but Smith's friends were unconvinced by Lyons' story of their last separation, and when the corpse of a large Negro was found in the river near the church in a state of decomposition, their suspicions were confirmed. The body, about the size of Smith, was buried. Various friends identified articles of clothing found on the body, and, to make it certain, a woman parishioner who had not seen the body stated that if it were Smith's they would find on the little finger of the left hand a ring with a purple setting. The body was exhumed and, sure enough, a ring exactly fitting the description given was found on the little finger of the left hand. The ring could not be gotten off, so they amputated the finger and brought it into court. A doctor testified that the man had died from a blow upon the head and had been thrown into the river dead or dying.

All this evidence of fact, circumstance, and motive was presented to a trial jury, together with testimony that Lyons had told a number of conflicting stories about the disappearance of Smith, some of which were indeed shown to be obviously untrue. Although he had throughout the trial vigorously protested his innocence, after the verdict was rendered Lyons, moved either by hysteria or revenge, told his attorney that he had in fact committed the crime but that the parishioners who had testified against him had participated in it with him. When the resulting panic among the brethren had subsided, the officials again declined to believe Lyons, who was taken to the penitentiary on an 18-year sentence. An amateur sleuth, the clerk of the court, was not satisfied that justice had been done even if the law had spoken the last word. He made it his business to visit the countryside in Virginia and North Carolina, and after some years was rewarded by finding Smith preaching to a congregation in North Carolina. Smith was induced to return to Suffolk, where he was produced before the judge, admitted that the $45 was too much of a temptation, and that he had decided to make tracks for North Carolina. He had a ring exactly like the one on the corpse. "Witnesses may lie but circumstances cannot."

CIRCUMSTANTIAL EVIDENCE

Herbert Andrews, of Boston, signed a check for goods purchased, but the fact that the merchant failed to deposit it for some weeks resulted in its return from Andrews' bank with a notation "No account." Thus it reached the police. A wave of bad checks was then passing over Boston, and at last a clue was at hand. Andrews was taken from his home; experts agreed that the handwriting on the Andrews' check and on the forged checks was the same; 17 witnesses took the stand and identified Andrews as the bad-check passer. Inspector Conboy insisted that he had not made a mistake in 40 years' police service, and Andrews was duly convicted after spending the little money his family and friends could muster. Only the fact that Earl Barnes, the real forger, continued to pass the same kind of checks after Andrews had reached the penitentiary began to arouse suspicion that perhaps Inspector Conboy had made his first mistake, and a bevy of other people had similarly failed. When the two men, Andrews and Barnes, stood at the bar, the dissimilarity between them was striking. The State admitted its error, but that was all. Andrews was released. Only the thoughtfulness or carelessness of Earl Barnes in continuing to pass bad checks saved Andrews. Those who draw inferences from circumstantial evidence are subject to the same human weaknesses as those who make wrong identifications, and that is the reason why juries occasionally convict the wrong man.

AN EGREGIOUS ERROR

In one of the most sensational cases tried in the South, Will Purvis, of Mississippi, a lad of 19, a member of the Whitecaps, a sort of Ku Klux Klan, was convicted of murdering a fellow Whitecap, Buckley, who had complained to the authorities of the flogging of his Negro servant, and had thereby incurred the enmity of the Whitecaps. Suspicion was thrown upon Purvis by an envious neighbor, who had repeatedly attempted to acquire his land holdings, and 2 days after Buckley's killing in the woods, bloodhounds, after much coaxing, picked up a cold scent which led them in the direction of the Purvis home. That was enough for the mob, and when the victim's brother identified Purvis as one of the assassins, of whom he could have caught only a fleeting glimpse, a jury readily convicted. As Purvis was strung up to be hanged, the rope broke and Purvis fell to the ground unhurt. Whether Purvis had been "hanged," as the law had demanded, became a political question in Mississippi, even after the Supreme Court declared he had not been. Governor McLaurin fought his campaign on that issue. The sentence was commuted, and 25 years later it was established beyond a doubt that Purvis had had nothing whatever to do with the murder. The State of Mississippi granted him $5,000 for its egregious error. Purvis died recently, a respected citizen, the father of 11 children.

A recent case in New York, that of Philip Caruso, involved an erroneous identification by the victim of a robbery. Even the judge advised the mistakenly identified accused to avoid a long trial and confess. This case has been written up entertainingly by Mr. St. Clair McKelway in the New Yorker for November 11, 1939, and awakened renewed interest in the subject. A bill to indemnify innocent, convicted persons was introduced in the New York Legislature but did not pass.

II

The matter with which we are now concerned is to ascertain whether the State, by simply opening the jail door, has completely fulfilled its obligation toward these unfortunate victims of the errors of justice. Let us note what the State has done in these cases. It has taken the man from his daily occupation by mistake, either because circumstances appeared against him or because he looked like the real criminal, or for some other mistaken cause. The State must, of course, prosecute persons suspected of crime; but when the facts subsequently show that it has convicted and imprisoned the wrong man, an innocent man, does not the State owe the victim of its mistake compensation for the special sacrifice he has been compelled to make in the public interest?

STATE CAN DO NO WRONG?

Our law begins with the assumption that the State can do no wrong, and it is therefore apt to be indifferent when by its own wrong it has injured a private individual. With the progress of time, however, the State has come to make compensation for many of its wrongs, and our Federal Government and practically all the States for many cases now subject themselves to suit at the hands of injured individuals. It was for this purpose that the Federal Court of Claims was established. Again, the State freely admits that, for certain interferences with private rights in the public interest, compensation to the private individual must be made. Thus, when his property is taken for a public use, such as a public building or a road, compensation is made. This is fundamental. Yet when the liberty of an individual is taken for the public use—and the preservation of the public peace through the administration of the criminal law is a public purpose at least equally vital to social welfare as the erection of public buildings—the right to compensation is apparently overlooked. Why? Dean Wigmore has well said:

"Because we have persisted in the self-deceiving assumption that only guilty persons are convicted. We have been ashamed to put into our code of justice any law which per se admits that our justice may err. But let us be realists. Let us confess that, of course, it may and does err occasionally. And when the occasion is plainly seen, let us complete our justice by awarding compensation. This measure must appeal to all our instincts of manhood as the only honorable course, the least that we can do. To ignore such a claim is to make shameful an error which before was pardonable."

THEORIES OF COMPENSATION

Two main theories underlie such compensation. The first is the principle involved in the exercise of eminent domain—that is, that the owner of private property taken for public use shall be compensated. In this case private liberty, a right at least as sacred as that of property, is taken for the public use.

The other theory is the same as that which supports workmen's compensation. The principle is this—that in the operation of any great undertaking, such as the management of a large industry or the administration of the criminal law, there are bound to be a number of accidents. In other words, among the thousands that are annually convicted, some will be wrongfully convicted through mistake. We have recognized, in certain spheres of activity, that it is unfair to the individuals injured that they alone should bear the entire loss resulting from the accident, and therefore society distributes the loss among its members. Where the common interest is joined for a common end—maintaining the public peace by the prosecution of crime—each individual member being subject to the same danger (erroneous conviction), the loss when it occurs should be borne by the community as a whole and not by the injured individual alone.

III

We must distinguish two classes of injustice of the character under discussion. The first is the detention of an erroneously accused innocent person extending up to his acquittal. An injustice has here been done, undoubtedly, in that the accused has been unjustly detained and put to the trouble and expense of defense against a criminal prosecution.

Yet the case of unjust detention pending trial is left aside in order that we may deal with the much more flagrant injustice of a conviction of an innocent person followed by sentence and imprisonment. Where the facts show that the conviction has resulted through no demerit of his own, certainly the State owes the victim compensation for the grievous wrong he has been compelled to suffer. Most of the European countries provide for indemnification in both cases, that is, detention pending trial which results in acquittal, and the still harsher case of unjust conviction and imprisonment. We propose to deal now with the practical features of compensation in the case of erroneous conviction.

RIGHT TO COMPENSATION SHOULD BE LIMITED

A right to relief of this kind might be abused if it were not strictly limited. We propose, therefore, so to limit the right to compensation that its benefits could be obtained only in cases of the grossest injustice and most deserving relief. Here much may be learned from foreign legislation.

It is clear that we cannot compensate every acquitted person. In fact, under our lax administration of the criminal law and the possibility of technicalities producing injustice, we know that many morally guilty persons are legally acquitted.

We would first, therefore, compel the unjustly convicted person claiming the right to relief to prove that he was innocent of the crime with which he was charged and not guilty of any other offense against the law. And here he must satisfactorily show one of two things—that the crime, if committed, was not committed by the accused or that the crime was not committed at all. This at once eliminates from consideration a vast class of possible claimants.

In the second place, the loss indemnified should be confined to the pecuniary injury, that is, loss of income, costs for defense and for securing his ultimate acquittal or pardon, and similar losses. It is true that the pecuniary injury is in these cases the smallest element of loss; the damage to reputation and mental suffering are by far the greater injuries. To compensate this moral injury, however, might entail severe burdens on the State treasury and open the way to speculative claims. For this reason it might be better to exclude from all possibility of claim the moral injury suffered. In any event we would limit the amount of the relief to $5,000, as the highest sum recoverable.

OTHER LIMITATIONS

Again, certain other limitations must be provided for, either specifically, or by consideration of the court awarding the compensation. For example, the accused must not by censurable conduct of his own have caused his arrest, prosecution, or conviction; thus, the concealment of evidence, the voluntary making of a false confession, or any similar reprehensible act should operate as a bar to the claim. This follows the well-known maxims that a claimant must come into court with clean hands, and that no one shall profit by his own wrong. As the award of an indemnity is to be discretionary, the court should take into consideration all the circumstances of the case which may defeat or in any other way affect the right to and the amount of the relief.

There may be some difficulty in the matter of procedure, although this can easily be adjusted. The Federal act leaves the award of indemnity to the Court of Claims. A similar State court having jurisdiction of claims against the State would be the forum most appropriate for this relief, more so than the trial, appellate, or second trial court, even though these courts could perhaps better judge of the intrinsic merits and circumstances of the case. Moreover, an executive pardon is often based on evidence which has never been submitted to a court. We advocate jurisdiction being given to a court of claims in order to maintain the traditions of American judicial procedure. If the jury or trial court were given the right to pronounce on the propriety of an award in a case of acquittal (as is the case in some of the European countries), it would bring into our law a new kind of acquittal in which the jury or judge could acquit with degrees of approval or sympathy, a procedure which might give rise to odious distinctions. While it would be desirable to have the benefit of the special knowledge of the case secured by the trial court or by the jury, it is better to forego this advantage for the sake of conformity with legal custom and to leave the establishment of the damage to a court having jurisdiction of other claims against the State.

INFREQUENCY NOT A VALID OBJECTION

It may be argued as an objection to such a measure that the case is of infrequent occurrence. The very fact, however, that there will be few demands on the State treasury should overcome any hesitation there may be to enact appropriate legislation. The mere infrequency of the case is no reason for a failure to acknowledge the principle and to remedy the wrong. It makes the individual hardship when it does occur seem all the more distressing. Dean Wigmore has explained our previous indifference to the grievous injustice thus inflicted on innocent individuals as follows:

"It is nobody's interest, apparently, to move for such a law. You and I have never suffered in that way; no large business is threatened; no class of persons feel a loss in their pockets; and so nobody exerts himself. Only the casual victims feel the wrong and to expect them to unite in a demand for legislation is absurd."

APPENDIX

[Public, No. 539, 75th Cong., ch. 266, 3d sess., S. 750]

An act to grant relief to persons erroneously convicted in courts of the United States

Be it enacted, etc., That any person who, having been convicted of any crime or offense against the United States and having been sentenced to imprisonment and having served all or any part of his sentence, shall hereafter, on appeal or on a new trial or rehearing, be found not guilty of the crime of which he was convicted or shall hereafter receive a pardon on the ground of innocence, if it shall appear that such person did not commit any of the acts with which he was charged or that his conduct in connection with such charge did not constitute a crime or offense against the United States or any State, Territory, or possession of the United States, or the District of Columbia, in which the offense or acts are alleged to have been committed, and that he has not, either intentionally, or by willful misconduct, or negligence, contributed to bring about his arrest or conviction, may, subject to the limitations and conditions hereinafter stated, and in accordance with the provisions of the Judicial Code, maintain suit against the United States in the Court of Claims for damages sustained by him as a result of such conviction and imprisonment.

SEC. 2. The only evidence admissible on the issue of innocence of the plaintiff shall be a certificate of the court in which such person was adjudged not guilty or a pardon or certified copy of a pardon, and such certificate of the court, pardon, or certified copy of a pardon shall contain recitals or findings that—

(a) claimant did not commit any of the acts with which he was charged; or

(b) that his conduct in connection with such charge did not constitute a crime or offense against the United States or any State, Territory, or possession of the United States, or the District of Columbia, in which the offense or acts are alleged to have been committed; and

(c) that he has not, either intentionally, or by willful misconduct, or negligence, contributed to bring about his arrest or conviction.

SEC. 3. No pardon or certified copy of a pardon shall be filed with the Court of Claims unless it contains recitals that the pardon was granted after applicant had exhausted all recourse to the courts and further that the time for any court to exercise its jurisdiction had expired.

SEC. 4. Upon a showing satisfactory to it, the Court may permit the plaintiff to prosecute such action in forma pauperis. In the event that the court shall render judgment for the plaintiff, the amount of damages awarded shall not exceed the sum of $5,000.

Approved, May 24, 1938.

The Third World War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 8, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, in accordance with the permission granted to me, I present for printing in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Washington Times-Herald of Sunday, June 7, 1940, entitled "The Third World War."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Times-Herald of July 7, 1940]

George Washington said: "Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike for another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side, and serve to veil and even second the arts of influence on the other."—From the Farewell Address.

THE THIRD WORLD WAR

We're all so close to the awesome events of the second world war that it may seem drawing a long bow to talk about the third world war.

Yet there will be a third world war, though we hope it will be so long a time from now that Hitler, Stalin, Mussolini, Roosevelt, Petain, Reynaud, Carol, Churchill, and the present writers and readers of this column will be dead when it breaks out.

The reason why we're talking about the third world war is that the United States' participation in the second world war seems already pretty well assured.

When Great Britain and France declared war on Germany last September 3, a wave of isolationism swept the United States. Never, most of us solemnly swore, would we have anything to do with this latest outbreak of Europe's world-old quarrels.

We were very sensible to make those resolutions. Europe is what it has always been—an overpopulated continent, which cannot grow enough food to sustain its own people, and which is further crippled by a multitude of racial, political, and economic hates, many of which trace back to the beginning of human existence in Europe.

When we tried to settle Europe's wars in 1917–18 we failed ingloriously. Our interference only prolonged a state of artificial equilibrium in Europe. The Versailles Treaty makers made that equilibrium more artificial than before, by creating a lot of new countries for political and balance-of-power purposes.

We were so disgusted with what they had done that the United States Senate refused to ratify the Treaty of Versailles. But the damage had been done. Versailles bred Hitlerism; Versailles' chickens have been coming home to roost in the last couple of months with astounding rapidity and frequency.

WE'RE ON OUR WAY TO WAR

It is now proposed by our interventionists that we go back to Europe and try once more to bolster up an artificial equilibrium; that we refuse to let Europe's various nations find their own proper levels in the scheme of things.

The proposition on its face is fantastic. But that makes it look even more attractive to the interventionists—even as their cries for intervention have become louder and more urgent with each solar plexus blow plunked home to the Allied cause by Adolf Hitler.

Interventionism is on the upgrade in the United States. Those never-again vows of last September have been forgotten by large numbers of Americans and the frightful face of European war is losing much of its hideousness in the eyes of many of our people.

That this is so is best evidenced by the fact that the Republican Party has just nominated for President Wendell L. Willkie, whose public utterances show him to be in sympathy with the interventionists—though it is unlikely that he will come out for an actual A. E. F. II before election day.

On the Democratic side the renomination of Franklin D. Roosevelt becomes more likely each day; and the President is an interventionist up to everything except men, which, of course, in the long run will mean up to everything, including men.

The American people, therefore, are on the way to being cheated of their right to choose for themselves. We're in the war up to our chests now; shortly after next election day or next inauguration day, if the war goes that long, we can expect to be in it up to our necks.

What we started out to say about the third world war is this:

SHALL WE LEARN FROM THIS WAR?

There appears to be no hope that the American people learned from their first World War experience that they cannot settle the problems of Europe. We appear to be on the verge of trying it once more. The isolation cause seems to be almost as completely lost as the cause of France in this war. So the best the isolationists can hope for is that after a second world war misadventure the American people will learn and inwardly digest the lesson thereof, and that when the third world war comes along they will have sense enough to stay out of it.

What Preparedness Involves

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 8, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE MILWAUKEE JOURNAL

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an editorial from the Milwaukee Journal of Saturday, July 6, 1940. This editorial is entitled "What Preparedness Involves," and it presents a thought-provoking analysis of the factors vital to preparedness.

I wish particularly to direct attention to the thought so well expressed in this article, that preparedness is not only a matter of iron and steel, but also of an infiltration of the spirit of preparedness into the very blood of the citizens.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Milwaukee Journal of July 6, 1940]

WHAT PREPAREDNESS INVOLVES

What does America need to fit itself for possible war?

It needs fast planes, of course, and fine warships, and adequately equipped land forces. It needs a thousand and one items of material. It needs new laws to guard against "fifth column" activities.

These things the thoughtful citizen realizes. But what do we need to make these concrete evidences of preparedness available to us?

The American Institute for Economic Research devotes its current bulletin to a discussion of this question. It finds that fundamentally we need five things—a store of raw materials not produced within our borders, research consciously directed toward the discovery and development of substitutes and improvements in war essentials, an ample national credit, trained and eager labor, and a solid public opinion, fully aware of our needs and the difficulties which stand in the way of supplying them.

Fortunately there are only a few essential raw materials which are not available to us on this continent, the chief being rubber and tin. These we must store, or we must find substitutes for them, which brings us square into research. Research must also give us more and better fighting machines than our enemies can produce. Research must develop new methods in order that needed things may be made faster, and labor must cooperate to make the improvements effective.

All of this will cost money. So long as we are merely preparing, it will be possible to pay our bills as we go; but if war finally comes, credit will be of utmost importance. Preparedness now involves getting our debt structure into such shape that it can withstand the additions which the European war and the peace which follows that war will put on it.

These things, inasmuch as they involve determination on the part of citizens generally, demand a population aroused to needs and willing to sacrifice to achieve them. "This problem [of defense] will never be solved satisfactorily until we, the people, have thought it through."

Thus, in brief, does the Institute for Economic Research analyze our defense background. It is an exceptionally thoughtful analysis, deserving more than passing attention from those who have the prime responsibility for putting America in such condition that no foe can be effective against it. Preparation for defense is not merely a matter of billions. It is also a matter of attitude, a matter of attention to thousands of details, a matter of constant forging ahead.

Preparedness is a matter of iron and steel, forged into arms for defense, of course, but also instilled into the very blood of citizens.

The Philosophy of the Democratic Way

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. T. V. SMITH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 8, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. T. V. SMITH OF ILLINOIS

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I insert a national radio address which I gave July 3, 1940:

Ladies and gentlemen, it was at a banquet of the first American round-the-world flyers. A friend of mine asked the leader of the flight what had been the hardest thing on the trip. By way of chewing this cud out loud, the leader mused for a moment that the greatest hardship had not been physical, though there had been some grueling experiences. It had not been mental, though uncertainty of landing in strange parts and the worry of refueling in places unprovided were not soon to be forgotten. "No," said he, "it was neither physical nor mental; the greatest hardship was social, was moral. To be shut up day and night with one's own fellows, ever repeated so, until the mystery of companionship had given way to irritation with naked familiarity—that was the hardest thing to bear."

And so it is, my friends. How to stand one another through thick and thin—that's the hardest thing for human beings—hardest in the air, hardest on the land, hardest under the sea. For delightful as companionship is, sacred as friendship is, too much of friendship makes a sorehead and too much of companionship develops the rash of neighboritis. If you doubt the flyer, if you doubt me, just look around you; look at the divorce rate, that tells the hazards of intimate association; look at the nearest law court or at the policed street corner—they show the ragged edge of neighborliness; or look at the war, any war, ever-recurring war—that tells the traffic tolls of man's continuing efforts to voyage with men.

I

All social philosophies, great and small, are efforts to solve this problem, to help man live with men. Communism tries to solve it, only so far to enhance cruelty by calling it classless comradeship. Nazi-ism tries to solve it through the trampling might or racial pride and the crushing weight of its will to power. Fascism tries to solve it through corporate organization gilded with the pomp of resurrected empire.

That's what democracy is about also. It is a unique effort to lessen the hazards and to increase the joys of living together. Its secret is a proper mixture of solitude and society. Its recipe is to preserve privacy through a bill of respected rights and to rule all else by impartial law. Time was when this democratic way of life was young like fascism, and vibrant like nazi-ism, and devoted like communism. Now they say that democracy is dead or dying, that it is clearly decadent morally and awaits only the butcher's ax or the buzzard's beak. Maybe they are right. I would not know; I'm only an ignorant man and philosopher. You would know, you citizens of the greatest democracy; you alone would know what you are willing to die for, and more important what you are willing to live for. Communists are willing, Fascists are willing, Nazis are willing, all willing to live and to die for their faith.

What life's for and what death's justified, men must decide for themselves. I don't know much save for myself, but as philosopher I know this much for you: Democracy's a noble corpse if it's really done for. As philosopher, I can remember when it was young and vibrant and devoted to every high end. Now communism specializes in fanatical equality, and nazi-ism in frenzied fraternity, and fascism in liberty for leaders alone; but democracy, when it was young and vibrant and devoted, democracy didn't specialize at all—it generalized. It went out in the world to realize all three ideals all at once—liberty, equality, fraternity. Now that was something like. Democracy had then, too, a tongue most inspired. One of its poets, Wordsworth, fresh from democracy's debut in France, sang out in clear key:

"Bliss was it in that dawn to be alive
But to be young was very heaven!"

That in celebration of democratic liberty. And another voice, Shelley's, still more inspired, sang out its fine fraternity and blest equality:

"The loathsome mask * * * fallen, the man remains
Sceptreless, free, uncircumscribed, but man
Equal, unclassed, tribeless, and nationless,
Exempt from awe, worship, degree, the king
Over himself; just, gentle, wise."

Democracy may be dead now; but it certainly was alive then. If we could see what once made it so alive, we might yet think it worth saving. Come, now, and look with me at three pictures of democracy, full size, middle size, and life size.

FIRST PICTURE

Conceive the world as it might be if it were not at all what it is. Wave into existence by magic the brotherhood of man and establish by means magical the ministrations of mercy in all human relations. Give us as best you may a social order in which the material is fully subordinated to the spiritual and one in which justice is the shining light of every life—that's full-size democracy. But that, you say, is a miniature of heaven? So it is. Our democratic fathers were nobly drunk on prospects of the final perfectibility of mankind. Our fathers failed of full fruition. But to fail of perfection, is not wholly to fail. Heaven, lost, earth remains.

SECOND PICTURE

Conceive the world now on a lesser scale of excellence. Let compromise substitute for absolute ideals. Let every cause have its hearing in the legislature before laws are made, and then let every man have his day in court before he is convicted of violating the law thus made. That would be a middle-sized democracy, and it begins to sound something like what we have inherited from all that our fathers would have builded. But stay! There are the Negroes without even these rights; and Jehovah's Witnesses are being persecuted for their queerness in many a community; and there are the poor of every color and class—classless only in need and equal only in necessity—the poor who cannot get to the legislature to lobby and cannot find adequate counsel when charged with crime. When one thinks of all this, democracy shrinks to less than middle sized; it becomes life sized.

As perfection gave way early to gestures of justice, so with full justice lost, not all is lost. Not all of justice could be lost so long as there remains in living men any aspiration to improve themselves and so long as there is at hand the means of a more just justice, the machinery of a more legal law.

THIRD PICTURE

And remain there does with us, and for us, this machinery of self-improvement. That's the democratic way at its lowest ebb, democratic means of achieving democracy. This machinery of impartiality is itself so hard to get going that neither the Communists nor the Fascists nor the Nazis have as yet undertaken it. They boast of no more than "class justice," pure partiality. In our machinery of impartiality, bequeathed us by the fathers, we have a priceless heritage. In aim it's right, dead right; only its operation is creaky.

II

But all of this recounting leaves you cold? So I see. Still I do not repent of reminding you of the dream of the dead and of the legacy that dream has left to us the living. If this warm legacy of human worth leaves you cold, pray, let the philosopher of democracy show you a vision of opposite things to come, which may make even life-sized democracy seem warmer.

Fathers and mothers of America, do you hear that knock at your door? No, that's not the mild milkman dropping the morning bottle. That's the secret police that comes on the heels of your democratic indifference. They come without warrant and without charge, but with the power to tear you fathers from the bosom of your families, even to pull you bodily out of bed, and bustle you off to a concentration camp. Your wife is not told where you're going, nor your children when you'll return, nor are you kept informed of what fate befalls them. You only know somebody doesn't like you, and you'll soon find what it means to be disliked by those who are not obliged to respect any of your democratic rights—rights against illegal search and unlawful seizure; rights to know what you're charged with; rights to trial by a jury of your equals; rights against bodily cruelty or mental torture. Even at its lowest, democracy means protection against these indecencies, of which all other "isms" boast. Such practice of indecencies they call the social revolution, and I can tell you for certain that you aren't going to like it at all.

The philosophy of democracy, on the other side, calls for evolution to save the waste of revolution. It demands good sportsmanship of every citizen, willingness to compromise issues out of such self-respect as respects the equal rights of others. Tom Dewey went down in defeat at Philadelphia before Wendell Willkie, and so did Senator ROBERT A. TAFT. Don't think it didn't hurt, to see the hope of a lifetime and the efforts of years go up in smoke. But Dewey had Willkie on the telephone with congratulations half an hour before it happened; and I myself heard those gracious radio words of Senator TAFT on the man who bested him in "blitzkrieg." That's democracy for you. Why, Hitler shot his dearest friend, Roehm, for less than what Willkie did to Taft and Dewey; and Stalin has liquidated friends and enemies alike.

Democracy, which begets good sportsmanship through discipline, builds institutions of self-government to carry on its will and way. The ballot is our democratic budget. Let us keep it balanced with free speech and tempered minds. Balloting allows men leeway to get fed up on one thing, say liberty, then to try another thing, even its opposite, discipline—and all this without invalidating the processes of peace or surrendering the precious right of self-decision. The philosophy of democracy calls for liberty tempered by equality issuing into a fraternity of the free.

American Defense: Military and Moral

OF

HON. T. V. SMITH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 8, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. T. V. SMITH, OF ILLINOIS, ON JULY 4, 1940

Mr. SMITH of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I have the honor to insert a patriotic address which I gave on July 4 as a national broadcast:

My fellow countrymen, a citizen tasted the brew from the big bowl of totalitarianism, and it was too heady. He sipped from the little bowl of pacifism, and it left him cold. When he tasted from the middle-sized bowl of patriotic preparedness, it was just right—so he drank from it that day and from that bowl every day.

Here at the Nation's capitol, where the thought of preparedness is in every mind and the hum of armament making in every ear, we have been celebrating this Independence Day as solemnly as the occasion requires and as happily as the weather permitted.

But, with all our outer activity, I am deeply aware that our final preparedness is moral rather than military, is patriotic devotion to the deepest realities of our common life. What is everywhere most needed today is a patriotism that is just right—a middle-sized patriotism, if you will, which we can encompass without ourselves being consumed in its livid flame.

The witches' brew which the Nazis boast is too hot, so also that of the Fascists and the Communists. Patriotism so perfervid bursts of its own fermentation and buries itself at horrible last with its world-wide victims. The bowl from which our tired liberals quaff is too cold, so also the bowl of all Democrats who are despondent of democracy. Patriotism so pussillanimous sinks into the silly shame of lukewarmness and plays human loyalty for permanent loss. There is surely, somewhere between, a love of country that neither foregoes respect for the permanent processes of peace nor grovels meantime in fear of that great leviathan, the bloated totalitarian state. That's what we seek in order to make perfect our peace preparedness on this blessed Independence Day—this middle-sized patriotism, the golden mean of democratic citizenship in crisis.

Such bright but not burning flame of devotion to country—it is this in truth which July 4 requires of us: A love of country which lifts us above the belittling bondage to groups too small and invites us yet to love not our country less, but mankind more. Without patriotism we perish in provincialism; with too much patriotism we perish through self-provoked war. What does this golden mean of patriotism require of us?

I

It requires us, first, to be brave. Good citizens must stand four-square against the one-sided. When the ship of state lurches, it's easy to leer to the right or the left. It requires stamina to stand alone, even though one stand in the middle. Vigilanteism is already rearing its ugly head among us.

It's easy to be brave with company, but it's a crowded, suffocating courage which nourishes itself on borrowed strength. To the mob belongs bravado, not bravery. The brave man will have courage to be in the right with a million, or to be in the right with his own more majestic self. Courage is not of the tongue, as some seem to think, but of the heart, as the word itself clearly suggests.

A nation that acts heartlessly as though it did not care for its way of life, is rightly presumed not to care and becomes prey to those who do care and dare. A watchful readiness to defend one's own integrity is expected of a good man and is respected in the good man; and a nation that does not resist inroads upon its territory and upon its morale becomes today of all days a potential victim to brigands that infest the highroads of the world. Let our preparedness, military, symbolize our determination, moral. Only the ready are regarded today, and none is ready who does not know what he's ready for. We Americans are readying ourselves to live on in peace if others let us. We are readying ourselves to defend the continued right to peace of all the Americas.

Patriotism requires today, as it has required in the past, will require in the future as it does today, this readiness to defend what we hold dear and willingness to provide in men and munitions the means for such defense. In this regard, as in others, advance bravery is alone insurance against subsequent bravado and pathos. Middle-sized patriotism requires full-size bravery.

II

Patriotism also requires intelligence. Bravery in the hands of the stupid becomes bravado. "Don't I argue? Don't I sputify?" pleads Sandburg's backwoods preacher to his complaining church board. "Yes; you do argue and you do sputify," replied the dominant deacon, "but you don't tell wherein." In a sputification contest one may sometimes bluff, but "to tell wherein," one must know what he's talking about as well as know how to do more than talk.

Since such knowledge, knowledge of the "wherein," does not grow on trees, patriotism requires the fostering of intelligence as a portion of our preparedness. One might be patriotic in a totalitarian society through dumb devotion to duties already prescribed. But not in a democratic society, for new occasions provoke new duties, and democratic discipline means readiness not for death, as totalitarians are always saying, but for duties, new as well as old. The schools must be kept going, and any universal military service must itself be educative to meet emergencies as they arise. This is the meaning of the Government's new emphasis upon trained skills of a thousand sorts, as valuable in peace as they are necessary in war. This is the meaning of the talk, not yet completely formed, of civic and military service for all the youths of the Nation. Look at it from this angle, and you will be bringing to a difficult subject the light of a marvelous middle-sized patriotism.

This same sized patriotism will see also in the approaching Pan American Conference at Habana the application of civic intelligence to the problem of all-American trade. Military aggression will come upon us only through measures that can be watched and by stages that can be frustrated, given some maturity of our present preparedness program. But totalitarian infiltration by barter is sort of football to those who trust trade. We must be wary and we must be unwearied in wooing our South American neighbors.

It is only common understanding and prudence for us to be prepared to act energetically and resolutely to guarantee that no foreign foe gains any foothold whatever on this hemisphere. Our public opinion ought to be more fully prepared than it is for defense action to the south, at whatever time and to any degree whatsoever. President Monroe was right in proclaiming his famous doctrine as a matter of our own defense, and any energy required to enforce such defense will prevent untold offense measure hereafter. We'd find so intolerable the kind of peace of poison—that is, the war of nerves—to which Mussolini and Hitler have subjected Europe that we'd almost certainly prefer war on this continent at the first overt act of theirs rather than chronically to endure such precarious peace as the dictators press upon every neighbor.

That at the utmost. Short of that, we must meantime get used to buying peace in the market places of our hard-up neighbors. Totalitarians indeed make barter such an instrument of warfare that nations used to civilized trading welcome the Trojan horse of trade for the profit it brings, only to find that such profit is a death trap to their liberties. Any subsidy which South American trade requires of us will probably prove cheaper defense than our subsequent protection against the consequences of their trading one by one with the dictators. We must now in every way possible wage peace in South America to keep from having war waged upon us here at home through the homelands of our neighbors. A new kind of intelligence is required to see and stand this. But patriotism requires readiness to see things as they are. And this is the way trade now is—a wedge to war unless safeguarded through clarity of understanding and unity of all-American action.

The final requirement which the golden mean of patriotism makes is tolerance. At one level this quality manifests itself merely as the modesty which makes intelligent voting seem worth while to citizens. Each of us knows that he can count for but a drop in the ocean of the electorate, for but a pebble on the beach of citizenship. But little drops of water, little grains of sand, make the mighty the mighty ocean of democracy and this wondrous land. Modesty is tolerant of other equal units, and is willing to take its place and play its role, however humble. This is a patriotic thought of just the right middle-size during this national election year.

At another level this tolerance is the good sportsmanship which enables us to accept the results of an election that goes against us, or the results of any discussion anywhere in which we are overruled after our case has been put and heard. The real trouble with totalitarian patriotism is that it is puffy with false pride; it is prescribed by those who think they are God and is echoed down the line by those who are rotten sports. Only cowards, or "kamerads," attack the helpless. The psychology of dominance from above when matched with the philosophy of subserviency from below produces the moral poison brewed from bullying and bootlicking. This it is which they call patriotism. That brand is at least one size too large for any decent American. It constitutes a first refuge of the coward and the last refuge of the scoundrel.

At the highest level, this tolerance becomes good humor and magnanimity which not only puts up with others but learns to prize variety for its own sake. Our Protestant Anglo-Saxon America is richer for having in it the Jews, the Mormons, the Greeks, the Negroes, the Catholics, the Christian Scientists, and any group which does not ostracize itself by trying to exclude some other group. Our land is richer thereby if we only see it so, and will have it so. And what is here said of peoples goes also, and all the more, for variegated ideas. The more of both, the merrier. Under-sized patriotism has for this stirring variety all around us the toleration of indifference; over-sized patriotism has for it the sadism of Satan. The golden mean of patriotism knows no indifference toward anything human and admits intolerance against the intolerant alone—and not against hem—until it becomes necessary as a measure of national defense. It is the cowering, not the brave, who rush the chances to persecute the weak in the name of national unity. Let the F. B. I. do all your early scouting for you and the courts do all the final prosecuting. This is the golden mean of patriotism as touching the present position of the alien and the unliked among us.

To be brave; to be knowing; to be modest, sportsmanlike, appreciative of difference—these are the steps in self-knowledge and in social maturity that lead citizens of a democracy to the magnanimity that makes of patriotism not the treacherous wish-wash of war but the golden mean of peace, if moral preparedness can make military peace possible.

"So he died for his faith? That's fine, more than most of us do!
But stay! Can you add to that line that he lived for it, too?
It's easy to die. Men have died for a wish or a whim,
For bravado or passion or pride—was it harder for him?
But to live, every day to live out all the good that he dreamt,
While his friends met his conduct with doubt and his foes with contempt—
Was it thus that he plodded ahead, never turning aside?
Then we'll talk of the life that he lived, never mind how he died."

As the war drums roll all over our globe on this quiet July 4th, natal day of America, let me commend to you, my fellow countrymen, such peace-intending patriotism as the poet expresses. It blazes a national path which, like the way of the just, will keep America pointed toward its democratic destiny.

Totalitarianism and Administrative Absolutism

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSIAH W. BAILEY

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 8, 1940

ADDRESS BY JULIUS C. SMITH

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by Mr. Julius C. Smith, a member of the special committee on administrative law of the American Bar Association, and formerly president of the North Carolina State Bar Association, on November 25, 1939, at the University of Florida, Gainesville, Fla., before the Florida Law Institute, under the auspices of the Florida State Bar Association. The subject of the address is Totalitarianism and Administrative Absolutism.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE PROBLEM TODAY

Man, in the childhood of the race, had his habitation in underground caves. Throughout Europe and even in America these caves bear mute testimony across many centuries of that bygone and crude civilization. Once again, after the lapse of a long period of time which we are unable to measure with any degree of accuracy, highly civilized man in countries of Europe has resorted to caves in the ground, now called dugouts, in an attempt to protect his life. This time, however, the protection sought is not against cold and marauding beasts, but against other so-called civilized men who roam the skies, seas, and land, dealing death and destruction without warning and without discrimination against men, women, and children. No tribe of men in past geologic ages, and no American Indians on the warpath, ever dealt death and destruction any more completely or any more ruthlessly than the Germans dealt to unhappy Poland, or than the bombers from the sky on the battlefronts of the Maginot and Westwall lines who seek to destroy all life below—"to bathe their enemies in a sea of blood."

Truly has there been a reversion in this respect to a way of life many thousands of years ago when men, women, and children must rush to underground and man-made dugouts as the roar of the sirens signal the approach of death; when men, women, and children must go about with gas masks to protect their lives from deadly poisonous gases so elusive that they cannot be detected through the sense of smell. Undoubtedly this reversion is to a primitive way of life which existed, from different causes, in the childhood of civilized man, and even though we are across 3,000 miles of water from the scenes of such savagery, we know not at what time we may become participants in that struggle—even as we did 21 years ago; and if we should become participants, the present development in the airplane and the submarine may this time bring the enemy within our gates. We do know that during the past several years huge sums of the taxpayers' money have been spent by our Government on airplanes, fighting vessels, and munitions of war, including gas masks. I repeat that this is 21 years after we went to war to make the world safe for democracy, and almost everywhere democracy has been dethroned.

But European civilization has not only physically gone back to caves in the ground in an attempt to protect itself from destruction; it has spiritually and culturally gone primitive and, in fact, it was this phenomenon which prepared the way for the return to the caves. Are we in America going to stand idly by and permit the same forces to do their work here? I chose my topic so that I could develop and discuss this fundamental question with you today.

LIFE IN THE ANCIENT WORLD

Historians are not agreed as to where civilization first emerged from the black-out of savagery. It did emerge either in Egypt or in Asia Minor, and for present purposes we need not localize with any more particularity its place of birth. However, all modern historians are agreed that the ancient governments in those lands were totalitarian in character, with all governmental authority concentrated in the king, emperor, or whatever the title of the ruler may have been. In that respect the governments of those lands during the earliest days of civilization were not unlike the governments in the totalitarian countries of today.

They had both law and administration of laws in those days, too. Among ancient peoples law was a part of religion, and the chief administrators were descended from the gods—as is the belief today in Japan as to the Emperor—or the priests of the religions were the chief judges. The ancient codes were a collection of rites, liturgical directions and prayers, joined with legislative regulations. The laws concerning property and those concernng succession were scattered about in the midst of rules for sacrifices, for burial, and for the worship of the dead. "Law and religion were but one,"[1] whether in ancient Egypt, among the Hebrews, the Medes and Persians, Greeks, early Romans or Hindus. If we place these laws among the several peoples of the ancient world by the side of their religions for the worship of the dead and of the sacred fire and compare one with the other, we find that law and religion are in perfect accord. A learned author has said that:

"Man did not need to study his conscience and say 'This is just; this is unjust.' Ancient law was not produced in this way. * * * The ancients said that their laws came from the gods. The Cretans attributed their laws not to Minos but to Jupiter. The Lacedaemonians believed that their legislator was not Lycurgus, but Apollo. The Romans believed that Numa wrote under the dictation of one of the most powerful divinities of ancient Italy—the goddess Egeria. The Etruscans had received their laws from the god Tages. There is truth in all of these traditions. The veritable legislator among the ancients was not a man but a religious belief which men entertained. The laws long remained sacred. Even at the time when it was admitted that the will of a man or the votes of a people might make a law, it was still necessary that religion should be consulted, and at least that its consent should be obtained."[2]

The holy character of law—the common identity of law and religion—had a profound effect upon ancient administration of the law. The law participated in the mysterious character of religion, and the legal formulas, like those of religion, were kept secret, and this accounts for the fact that it was long after the foundation of Rome that the Twelve Tables were published and that Moses, Manu, and Hammurabi claimed divine origin for their codes.[3] Let me interject at this point, for further development, that even in America today we have men in charge of the administration of the Federal laws who seem to think that such administration should

"These provisions of ancient laws were perfectly logical. Law was not born of the idea of justice but of religion, and was not conceived as going beyond it. In order that there should be a legal relation between two men, it was necessary that there should already exist a religious relation; that is to say, that they should worship at the same hearth and have the same sacrifices. When this religious community did not exist, it did not seem that there could be any religious relation. * * * Law was nothing more than one phase of religion. Where there was no common religion there was no common law."

remain mysterious. They are actually resisting to the utmost all attempts of the American Bar Association and of both the Senate and House Judiciary Committees to compel them to hold public hearings and to publicly declare in rules and regulations so that all may know what they think the laws mean which they are administering.[4]

As the primitive law was believed to be of divine origin, and as the king was of divine descent, and as the priests were representatives of the divine power, it was a form of sacrilege to question either the law or its administration.[4a] There was administrative absolutism, by which I mean that the will of the ultimate administrator was supreme—whether the exercise of that will was just or unjust. You will exclaim that this was a terrible condition of affairs for the individual—and so it was, but again I may interject at this point a statement made on December 30, 1938, in the city of Chicago by the general counsel of a great Federal agency in the following words:

"Candor compels me to admit, however, that the remedy of judicial review, in most cases, has no practical content. Business transactions cannot wait upon the exigencies of appeal. * * * Time is of the essence. Even appellate procedure within the administrative by no means insures that the unfortunate results of action unwise or arbitrary will be cured. The remedy of appeal is not adequate." [5]

Furthermore, the dean of a great law school—many of whose graduates are in positions of power in the Federal Government—has publicly urged that some administrative agencies are set up to be, are intended to be, partial, and they are not expected to proceed after a full and fair hearing. They are created in the interest of one side only or, as it is put, of a certain policy.[6]

Truly are we not only physically back in the caves of ages ago, but there are those among us who would take us back to that same period in law administration. This is no idle statement. The proof of it lies in a comparison of law administration during antiquity and the law administration which is being urged today in high quarters in America.

It is too clear for serious argument that the genius of the oriental countries and peoples, where civilization originated, was religious and not governmental. All of such countries properly may be classed as theocracies—by which I mean governments believed to be under the immediate direction of some god—or as despotisms based upon the theocratic principle.[7] Contrary to popular belief, the Greeks did not originate democracy. A learned student has stated that:

"* * * the Greeks, as all of the peoples of antiquity, confounded the state with the Government and, because they recognized the state as sovereign, made government almighty. In other words, they recognized in their political science or in their practical politics no sphere of individual immunity against governmental power." [8]

In other words, during all of antiquity the individual existed solely for his government, and the present-day doctrine in America was unknown, namely, that government is the servant, not the master of the individual. As I have briefly indicated, this was due to the generally believed divine origin of both law and rulers, and a classical example of how rapacious rulers could interpret that law to despoil their people is contained in the Bible in the story relating how the king despoiled Naboth of his vineyard when he refused to sell it to the king.

During all of these many thousands of years of human history, the law was in the most primitive condition—depending for its promulgation, interpretation, and administration on the uncontrolled will of the rulers for the time being in the respective countries, whether they were theocratic or merely so in principle. Also, the law was sanctified through popular belief in its divine origin and the divinity of its interpretators, and any conception of liberty for the individual in the modern American sense simply did not exist. The governments of that long period were totalitarian in every sense of the word, and administrative absolutism existed unchecked in all of its glory. I need not remind a group of lawyers that the only possible check which has been developed during the subsequent centuries on law administration is through judicial review in courts not dependent upon the administrative will for their tenure in office or their salaries. As I have shown from the quotations of a prominent Government official, now in office, and from a prominent law-school dean, who has been in public office, we have before us the issue whether we in America shall revert to a primitive system of law administration prevalent in the childhood of civilization, and which we thought we had forever outlawed in Magna Carta, the Petition of Right, the Declaration of Independence, and the Constitution of the United States.

But make no mistake about it: Even as Mussolini and Hitler rose to absolute power under the forms of law and within the terms of the constitutions of Italy and Germany, respectively, so may administrative absolutism be fastened upon this country within the Constitution and within the forms of the law. No southern man dares to forget that a form of administrative absolutism was fastened upon the entire South in 1865 to about 1877, following the War between the States, when the carpetbaggers ruled supreme through the simple device of depriving the Federal courts of jurisdiction to review certain Federal administrative acts. We then had military rule, enforced at the point of the bayonet. That was administrative absolutism run riot, and it was publicly stated that mixtures of the whites and blacks would be forced under the law, and the entire southern civilization as it existed prior to 1861 should be and would be destroyed. What was attempted once before may be attempted again, but if it is attempted, I feel sure that as much as we would regret the reappearance of the hooded riders, they would ride again.

GREEK AND ROMAN PHILOSOPHERS OF ANTIQUITY

It is not my purpose to attempt any detailed discussion of the philosophy of government held by the Greeks and Romans of antiquity. However, it is necessary to give some attention to them in any serious discussion of government—not because they had any influence on their governments of the day, any more than did Sir Thomas More with his Utopia in 1516 on the English Government of his day, but because they have had much influence with the passing of the centuries. Some of the modern totalitarian governments have sought to justify their suppression of all individual rights and the subjection of their peoples to the exclusive purposes of the governments on the teachings of these philosophers of ancient times.[9] Socrates was tried and executed in 399 B. C. on a charge of corrupting the youth because he taught them to question the reasons for the existence of the current Athenian Government—and Burke, more than 2,000 years later, likewise thundered against the clever intellectuals grubbing away at the foundations of the accepted French morality.[10] Rulers then, as now, took most unkindly to those who were believed to be enemies of such rulers.[11] Plato, in posing his ideal state of experts:

"* * * insofar as he encourages the idea that there is a precise kind of knowledge which can be attained by experts and applied by them to the business of government—in the same way that the engineer applies his mathematical formulas to the building of a bridge or breakwater—lends himself to their (the dictators') pretentions. If there is such knowledge and they are in possession of it, it is absurd that it should be questioned and that they should be tripped up by an inexpert mob. Plato's parable of the navigator who is deposed by the ignorant and unruly crew exactly fits the case." [12]

This same student has stated that both Communists and Fascists have claimed Plato's support for their doctrines, and that either can make a certain play with him by judicious selections and suppressions.[13] But Plato, Aristotle, and Cicero were at one with Sir Thomas More in considering an ideal commonwealth—a government which has never actually existed in practice. Moreover, all Utopian governments which have been attempted, even in modified forms, have failed.[14] I would make it clear, however, that the philosopher Utopians—attempting to establish their ideal commonwealths as a result of speculation in thought—are not to be confused with their direct action successors who have seized the powers of government and purged their opponents. Doubtless most of you know that the ugly word purge, which was so prominently displayed in the public press in our neighboring States of Georgia and South Carolina only recently, did not originate in the campaign of 1938; this word purge was used by Plato more than 300 years before the commencement of the Christian era, or more than 2,000 years ago.[15] Is it not indeed strange that some of the attempted practices in government today in America, and some of the political catchwords were known long before the birth of the gentle Nazarene, and had to give way before the advancing rights of mankind? What breed of men are we of today that we should tolerate from hired servants of the people such primitive thoughts, phrases, and practices? But I would remind you that the final stage of government toward its downfall is reached when the people discover the kind of monster they have been fostering in their bosoms—a discovery which took place in governments of the past after administrative absolutism had taken away their arms and their governmental power, even as has been done within our memories in Germany, Italy, and Russia.[16]

Also, that the modern has the uneasy feeling that behind such thoughts there is looming the ugly apparition of the totalitarian states, with their domineering experts and dictators.

Cicero, the famous Roman lawyer and philosopher, wrote his De Republica, which is but a pale replica of Plato's Republic. For Cicero there was not any relation of religion and government; the two are one. For him there was no boundary between their functions, and this doctrine constituted the unsolved problem of centuries, resulting in incessant conflicts, even in lands which were then entirely unknown. Within our own memories there has arisen such conflicts in Mexico, Russia, and to a certain extent, in Rome. The principal business of ancient Rome was war. The country was an armed camp, and it fattened upon the tributes levied on the conquered provinces. Cicero's philosophy was based, in part, on the practice in Rome as he knew it and, similarly to other governments of antiquity, there were no rights of the individual which could be enforced against the Roman government of the day. Not unlike the other governments of antiquity, administrative absolutism prevailed at Rome throughout her entire history.[17] There is no gainsaying the fact that the Romans builded a great system of private law and laid the foundations of equity, yet in the public law field, that is, in administrative law, no such progress was made because of the union of religion, whether paganism or Christianity, and the state. Whatever was ordered by the head of the State was deemed as having not only the force of law but divine sanction, and Rome finally developed into a dictatorship through the military absolutism of the Caesars.[18] The ancient philosophers failed to suggest any solution in this respect.

MIDDLE AGES TO THE INDUSTRIAL REVOLUTION

The time finally arrived when heavy taxation, decadence from within, and enemies from without, brought about the fall of the Roman Empire and the long period of darkness, the period of serfdom and slavery and, except for the Catholic Church and the Jewish rabbis, the almost complete disappearance of learning from the world. In the year 800 A. D., Charlemagne knelt on Christmas Day in St. Peter's Cathedral in Rome, and the Pope pressed upon his brow the diadem of the Roman emperors. By that act there was added another 700 years of an uneasy marriage of church and state.[19] This had tremendous consequences for both rulers and ruled. As Lord Bryce has so well said:

"From the fifth to the sixteenth centuries, whoever asked what was the source of legal sovereignty, and what the moral claim of the sovereign to the obedience of subjects, would have been answered that God had appointed certain powers to govern the world, and that it would be a sin to resist His ordinance. From the eleventh century onward, it was admitted in Western Christendom, though less cordially in France, Spain, or England than in Italy and Germany, that there were two legal sovereigns, and according to the view more generally held, each was de jure absolute, the Pope in spiritual, the emperor in temporal matters. Both Pope and emperor were above all positive secular law, but subject to the law of nature and the law of God, these being virtually the same." [20]

Those who are curious may learn from the financial and economic histories of the Middle Ages that this was a period of administrative absolutism when the common man was a slave or a serf; when men had to attach themselves to some armed knight or baron or duke or similar powerful individual for physical protection; and when each strata of the people was cabined and confined within a legal system which was as unyielding as those of antiquity, and largely for the same reasons. Protection of life, liberty, and property was solely by might. With such theories of the law being currently accepted by those in authority, and the people confronted with all the horrors of excommunication and eternal damnation if they contested the exercise of unjust and oppressive administration of the laws, it is no wonder that this period in the world has become known as the Dark Ages!

THE REFORMATION AND THE RISE OF INDUSTRY

The Crusades, revival of learning, the development of the compass, and many other factors resulted in the Reformation and the industrial revolution. It would take me too far afield to discuss these causes at this time, but they had a profound effect upon the relation of the individual to his government,[21] largely originating in England with Magna Carta, the Petition of Right, and the position taken by Lord Coke—all of which brought about a parliamentary system wherein the representatives of the people and of the various classes, such as the clergy and the nobility, made the laws. There also arose contemporaneously a judicial system measurably free from executive domination. The English system was transplanted in part to American shores and further developed under the philosophy of the Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States. First in England and then in America, there was overturned the idea prevalent since antiquity that both laws and kings were of divine origin. When that was done, or rather in the process of overturning such universally accepted dogmas and beliefs, the avenue of progress was cleared for liberty and freedom of the individual. All of this has been made clear by Roscoe Pound, chairman in 1937–38 of the committee on administrative law of the American Bar Association, in his incomparable Spirit of the Common Law, and in his Interpretations of English Legal History, as well as in numerous papers in law magazines extending over the period of his long and busy life.

It is to be remembered in this connection that Roman law was never as strong in England as on the Continent of Europe, and such influence as it did have came through the Catholic Church, whose power was subsequently broken in England; that is, the Catholic Church was discarded as the State church, and thereafter the chief priests of the English church did not owe their appointments to Rome. Further, England was comparatively free from armed invasion after the Norman Conquest, and like Egypt thousands of years before, the English system of law and administration had freedom to develop without the interference of marauding foes. Similar conditions existed in America, and there is not to be overlooked in this connection the profound influence of Blackstone's Commentaries on both American and English legal development.[22] In this period of development, covering several centuries, both rulers and the law in England lost their divine sanction, and there developed the basic principle that the rights, liberty, and privileges of Englishmen were based on law, and not on the uncontrolled discretion of any man or group of men. Nothing like it existed in either antiquity or the middle ages where the law and rulers were either theocratic or based their authority on theocratic principles and both were supreme. This development in England and America did not come about in a day. It was a matter of centuries—and at the cost of heads, civil wars, and tremendous sacrifices on the part of those who made their contributions to the happiness of mankind by governing the governors and regulating the regulators—all under and by the terms of the law enforced by an independent judiciary aided and protected by an independent legal profession.

No such development took place on the continent of Europe, except in France after the French Revolution. Due to the conception of the unity of law and religion, coming from the days of antiquity, and the great influence of the Roman law on practically all of continental Europe, with the exception of Russia, there did not develop until comparatively recent times any administrative system similar to that in England and America. Further, these continental countries, with the fall of the Roman Empire and with the rise and fall of the Holy Roman Empire, were in more or less constant war. The periods of peace were largely periods of preparation for the next war, and that condition has prevailed right down to our day. Russia has never known a free government. Whether under the Tsars or under the Bolsheviks, there

[16] Plato, after writing his Republic, became an adviser to the tyrant Dionysius, of Sicily, which seems to have disillusioned him. He then wrote his Laws and in this study he would make his government all-powerful. It would cover "the whole of life, moral, religious, and material." Spender, above cited, p. 91. See also Carlysle, R. W. and A. J., 1 A History of Medieval Political Theory (1903), 1–18.

[17] Bryce, Two Studies in History and Jurisprudence (1901), pp. 638–662, refers to the deadening effect such a conception of law and religion with respect to Musselman in words as follows:

"Law becomes a set of dry definite rules instead of a living organism. It is a mass of enactments dictated by God or His mouthpiece, instead of a group of principles, each of which possesses the power of growth and variation. * * * Reason gets no fair chance because Authority towers over her. Forbidden to examine the immutable rules, she is reduced to weave a web of casuistry round their application. It is only through the interpretation of the sacred text and of the traditions that the law can be amended or adapted to the needs of a changing world; and one reason why the Musselman world changes so little is to be found in the unchangeability of its sacred law. * * * Such a system will obviously give little scope for the development of the legal profession. Advocacy is unknown in Musselman countries. * * * Its one idea of government is despotism."

[20] Bryce, Two Studies in History and Jurisprudence, above cited, 529. In Carlyle, above cited, p. 218, it is stated with respect to this point that "God (according to the accepted theory) is the source of all authority; the king, as ruler, derives his power from God, the evil king as much as the good; the former, indeed, as we have seen in the last passage quoted from Incmar, holds his power by God's permission rather than by His appointment, but still he holds it by God's permission for the chastisement and correction of evil. Therefore, they say, we must always obey the king and submit to him, even when unreasonable and unjust, lest we should be found to be resisting God."

has been no administrative system developed under which the individual Russian could challenge in an independent tribunal the legality of the acts and decisions of those from time to time in charge of the administration of the law. While Germany and Italy, and to some extent Austria and Hungary, had worked out a system of administrative courts, that system or systems tumbled like a house of cards when the big, bad wolves in the persons of Hitler, Mussolini, and Hogarthy blew upon them. As I shall subsequently show, the administrative systems in Russia, Germany, and to a lesser extent in Italy, are as despotic and all-inclusive as the administrative systems of antiquity and of the Middle Ages.

As I have stated, the French system constitutes an exception for the period, roughly, since the French Revolution. Prior to that time there was no more despotic country in Europe or known to history than the French Government. After the revolution there developed the system of French administrative courts. This system of courts is entirely separate and distinct from the regular French courts, or what roughly corresponds in this country to our constitutional courts. As Dean Pound has stated in his testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee concerning the American Bar Association's administrative law bill, designed to govern the governors and to regulate the regulators:

"If you will read the modern French books on the subject you will find that they have set aside the old purely administrative review and have what they call the contentien administratrif, review in a true court, which is, however, part of the administrative rather than of the judiciary. We do not need that kind of tribunal, because we have always reviewed administrative action. This development has been rather recent, and those who have read those French books cannot justify their contention for 'administrative absolutism' by what happened in France. The experience has moved them toward the kind of thing that I regard as real judicial review of administrative action.

"You have to discount a good deal you find in the books in our academic circles, because I do not think the nonlawyer or layman has quite appreciated what our legal situation was, on the one hand, or the legal situation behind the development of administration on the other hand. It requires a good deal of understanding of legal history and legal development to appreciate a situation of that sort." [23]

When French administrative absolutism was smashed in the upheavals of the Revolution and the people came to rebuild their legal institutions, they cast about for means to compel French administrative officers to obey the law. They did not have a long period of legal development, which England had, of regular courts reviewing administrative action, and the American system had yet to prove itself. So instead of conferring the jurisdiction on the regular French courts, there was created the administrative courts exclusively to handle appeals from and reviews of the actions and decisions of French administrative officers. As Dean Pound had stated, we do not need such a separate system of courts in this country, and the few such separate courts as we have had for limited administrative controversies—the old Commerce Court, for instance, which was abolished after a few short and turbulent years—have not been a success.

It is no doubt because France has this system of administrative courts to review the administrative acts of its officials that France is today regarded as one of the democracies and has not gone the way of the other three great totalitarian nations on that continent. While the Bolsheviks ascended to power in Russia after a revolution, such revolution was more for the purpose of killing and expelling the Czar and the Russian nobility. Certain it is that the tyranny under a comparatively small group of radical Russians, dominated by Stalin, is even more despotic than under the Czars, and there has been nothing in the history of the world to equal it except in the oriental empires of antiquity. Laborers and farmers have been enslaved, labor unions have been abolished, farmers have been left to die by the millions, capital has been abolished, estates have been confiscated, both resisting laborers and capitalists have been killed or exiled to Siberia at forced labor in the mines and elsewhere, family life has been all but destroyed, and instead of the religion of God there has been enthroned the paganism of the proletariat. This paganism, however disguised, is nothing more than the worship of Lenin and Stalin—a system of combination of law and religion of the most primitive period in the world's history.

Reverting to the doctrine of administrative absolutism which I have mentioned as being advocated in this country, I may quote from an article by John H. Hazard, writing from Moscow, which was recently published in the Columbia Law Review, concerning Soviet law. There is no pretense in the land of the Bolsheviks that the administration of the law shall be impartial. Mr. Hazard says that the rulers of Russia believe with Karl Marx that there are no rights of man in the abstract, and that:

"Each society develops its own conceptions of these rights in harmony with the preservation of the best interests of the dominant class. The method of protecting these rights as defined by the governing class varies in accordance with the danger the governing class faces. While there is still fear of counter revolution and attacks from the ranks of the ousted class, law must retain its revolutionary character. There will be time later for the introduction of a less vigorous phase, but never to the extent of sacrificing any of the principles of the revolution."

In fact, as has been well stated by no less an authority than Dean Pound, there is no law in Russia, but only rules and regulations which may be changed or modified at any time and disregarded at any time. The system is one of administrative absolutism run riot.

Thomas F. Woodlock, in a recent issue of the Wall Street Journal, said:

"Give the Soviet regime the benefit of every possible doubt. Charge its millions of starved peasants, its suppression of free speech, its attacks on religion, its wholesale 'purges', its confiscation of private property, etc., to stern necessity in the pursuit of its goal, and then ask what is that goal. Strip off even the 'dictatorship' and call it, also, a temporary necessity. Assume the goal to be a real 'democracy' of the 'people.' And what have you then? You have a totalitarian democracy, a despotism of the majority, the one thing which our Government was established to prevent. Of this kind of 'democracy' de Tocqueville—who foresaw the likelihood of its rise, said: 'If such a government were once established among a democracy, it would not only oppress men, but would eventually strip each of them of several of the highest qualities of humanity.'

"This writer has long insisted that our left-wing intellectuals are all consciously or unconsciously, totalitarians at heart, and that this fact, coupled with the deep-rooted antagonism of left-wing thinking toward the great mass of the 'middle class,' explains their attitude toward Soviet Russia—an attitude totally incompatible with the 'American theory' of democracy."

Unlike Russia, in Italy and in Germany, the current dictators rose to power peacefully and entirely within the form, if not the spirit, of the constitutions of their respective countries. After they had been elevated to power through the endeavors of their party associates, all they had to do to make themselves supreme was to gather into their own hands complete control over administration of the laws, using that control to crush out all opposition. Imprisonment, exile, and castor oil were used by Mussolini while Hitler used the detention camps, courtmartial, the ax head, and the firing squad. Even the men who assisted them to rise to power have been "purged"—and these men might have known such a fate would overtake them, because Cicero pointed out more than 2,000 years ago that such a fate awaited men who assisted tyrants to rise to power.

The Japanese Government has never been, within historical times, anything except a military-theocratic autocracy, and, roughly speaking, the same general system of administrative absolutism prevails in Japan, Germany, and Italy. While totalitarianism in Japan is based upon a military-theocratic principle, the totalitarianism of Germany and Italy is a form of theocratic paganism, if I may be permitted to use the two words in juxtaposition. Supremacy of the Aryan race, "baths in seas of blood," the power of their armies, persecution of the Jews in Germany, and, to a lesser extent, in Italy, veiled hostility to both Protestantism and Catholicism in Germany, and similar catchwords and use of prejudiced minorities have been the stock in trade of these two dictators. The Nazi and Fascist governments are supreme within their jurisdiction. The people exist for their respective governments; labor unions in the American sense have been abolished and receive no legal recognition; forced labor is the rule in Germany and to a lesser extent in Italy; there is no government regulation of the minute details of the life of the laborer; capital has been all but conscripted by these governments; and practically all economic, political, and social life in those countries is under the control and domination of nazi-ism and fascism to an extent similar to that in Soviet Russia or in the empires of antiquity. The great minorities in Germany and Italy who do not subscribe to the political dogmas of the majorities in control of the respective countries are rooted out or suppressed as ruthlessly as in Russia.[24]

The significant thing about all this is that the respective governments of Germany, Italy, Japan, and Russia—the totalitarian states of today—are based largely on collectivism and dictatorship, that is, the ordering of the economic life of the respective nations and their individuals by the state itself or by its dictators. Yet even these foreign proponents of change cannot agree among themselves as to which is the preferable order, and we find advocates of communism, of socialism, of fascism, of nazi-ism, of syndicalism, and of anarchism. Under whatever name, the rights and liberties of the people are no more in those countries. The legal profession scarcely exists in any of them. "The courts are working as a part of a team" with the dictators in the drivers' seats. Labor is enslaved as it has not been since Russia freed the serfs, and the "economic planners" are having such a royal good time that chicken experts may readily qualify as monetary or any other kind of experts. If anyone in those countries has the temerity to question what qualifications a grower of chickens has to pose as a monetary expert, a professor in a university to pose as a housing, agricultural, or resettlement expert, or in any way to question the expertness, he is conveniently, expeditiously, and effectively "purged."

WHAT OF THE UNITED STATES?

Is there any labor leader, any businessman, any lawyer, or any other citizen of America so blind that he cannot see that this country is drifting at an accelerating pace into administrative absolutism similar to that which prevailed in the governments of antiquity, the governments of the Middle Ages, and in the great totalitarian governments of today?—governments, I may say, in Germany, Japan, and to some extent in Russia and in Italy within the past 3 years which have overrun smaller countries, slaughtered much of the population of such countries, and which are even today driving their peoples to battle on land, sea, and in the sky.

If administrative absolutism had brought the peoples of those totalitarian states a greater measure of peace with their fellow men; if such governments had given them greater prosperity in a physical sense; if the leaders in such countries had not bathed themselves in the blood of their fellow men through the "purging" of opponents; and if life had been made more secure, happy, and contented under totalitarianism and administrative absolutism, we might welcome the drift in this country toward a similar system here. But we know that none of these things are true. On the contrary, the indisputable facts of recorded history, which I have attempted to summarize before you here today, prove beyond doubt that the most miserable state of mankind is that under a system of administrative absolutism.

Why do I say that we are drifting into administrative absolutism? That is a fair question, and I shall endeavor to answer it. The most recent occurrence is the publication by the congressional investigating committee headed by Mr. DIES, of Texas, of a list of over 600 present-day employees of the Federal Government who are members of a reportedly Communist-controlled organization, an organization which is controlled from the Kremlin, in Moscow. Stalin is an admitted enemy of all forms of government except his own tyrannical and despotic one. A most significant fact as to the publication of that list lies in this: That the majority of the Federal Government employees who are members of this communistically controlled organization are in the agencies concerned with public relief—the use of the money of the American taxpayers and their credit for the purpose of bringing the more abundant life to the poor and depressed. You might as well set a wolf to guard a lamb.

Again, the American Bar Association's administrative law bill, otherwise known as the Logan-Walter bill, is being strenuously opposed by a small minority group whose former president threatened to resign—if he did not resign—from the organization because he stated that such organization was controlled by Communists who had worked themselves into key positions therein—the famous boring-from-within policy so much advocated by the Communists. Also, a witness before the Dies committee a few weeks ago testified that this organization is a fellow traveler of the Communists, and this witness admitted that he had been a Communist. The executive vice president of this same organization publicly stated in Los Angeles a few weeks ago that the administrative law bill did not pass at the last session of Congress solely because of the efforts of the members of his organization.

On top of that, the director appointed by the Attorney General of the United States for his committee on Federal administrative agencies is a member of that same organization and a member of its committee on administrative law which submitted a report to the annual meeting of the organization opposing the bill. This director has called privately on one of the authors of the bill in opposition to it, and how many more he may have called upon I do not know. I do not mean to intimate that this director speaks the thoughts of or for a number of the splendid members of the Attorney General's committee—far from it! In addition to that, a considerable number of the Washington members of that organization—whose membership list is not made available—are employees of the United States in various and sundry agencies, and almost without exception these men are in open opposition to the comparatively simple requirements of the proposed legislation.

One of the prominent members of the same organization is likewise the chairman of a prominent Federal commission. At the Cleveland convention of the American Bar Association he publicly attacked Dean Pound and the report which the dean wrote for the committee on administrative law of that association in support of the draft of bill finally approved in Chicago last January. This attack did not meet with the approval of the lawyers of America, and when the dean countered by calling attention to the fact that this man was a proponent of a combination of Marx and Freud in the form of psychological realism, teaching that it is impossible for a judge to decide objectively, that the judge can only do what his temperament and prejudices and predispositions, determined by his bringing up and social surroundings dictate, this individual beat a retreat. A decisive element in such a judicial process was, as he saw it, the Freudian wish.[25]

As Dean Pound pointed out in his hereinbefore referred to testimony before the Senate Judiciary Committee and in the 1938 report of the Special Committee on Administrative Law, the advocates of this doctrine of administrative absolutism in America have been largely from publicists and teachers in some of the schools in the colleges and universities. Until within recent years, comparatively few of these men were lawyers. They were politicial scientists and students in other fields than law. They had no textbooks in the earlier years after such courses were installed in the colleges other than translations and other writings of continentals and the philosophers of antiquity, including Plato, Sir Thomas More, and other Utopians. These laymen were and are largely ignorant of legal history and the development of law administration in England and America. They overlooked or ignored that the philosophers of antiquity and the continental scholars were concerned with either ideal states or with states where there was no separation of governmental powers as under the written Constitutions of the United States, Canada, and Australia, or the unwritten constitution of the English parliamentary system. I may remark parenthetically that in England the courts have never been really independent of Parliament; that is, the courts are bound in England to follow the statutes, while in the United States both the courts and the Congress are bound by the Constitution unless and until the people change it in the mode prescribed.

Of course, if you can once deprive the courts of their jurisdiction in controversies between the Federal administrators and the individual, and if you can get a Congress sufficiently subservient to repeal such vestiges as may now exist of jurisdiction in the courts, administrative absolutism is upon us. Two illustrations within the history of the State of Florida prove exactly what I mean. One occurred when General Jackson invaded Florida and hanged two Englishmen without the benefit of a trial by jury—and I remind you that within the shadow of the United States Capitol there have been executions of civilians after a trial by court martial, and when the regular courts were open and functioning in the District of Columbia. The other instance in your State history was during the period immediately following the War between the States when you—along with others in the South—were under carpetbag rule enforced by the Federal bayonet. A radical Congress had at that time deprived the courts of all jurisdiction to consider the validity of either reconstruction statutes or practices thereunder.

This system of administrative absolutism—which is yet in a comparatively weak form when compared with Germany, Italy, and Russia or Japan—has come upon us since 1914. The Federal courts claimed, developed, and exercised the jurisdiction to review many administrative decisions during the first century of our national existence.[26] But taking a leaf out of the practices of the radical Congress during the days of reconstruction, many of the statutes enacted after 1914 establishing new instruments of governmental power have restricted the scope of judicial review of administrative officers and agencies in such instances. Generally it has been sought to restrict the courts to questions of law, leaving the facts to be found by the administrative tribunals.[27] Such a device is quite simple and entirely practical, as is shown by the condition we are in today.

I shall conclude by merely calling your attention to the reports of the special committee on administrative law of the American Bar Association from 1933 to 1939, inclusive; to Senate bill No. 915 and House bill No. 6324, Seventy-sixth Congress, and to the unanimous reports thereon by the Senate and House Judiciary Committees recommending the passage of said bills. The two bills are practically identical, were drafted in large part by this special committee on administrative law, and they have been approved by the board of governors and by the house of delegates of the American Bar Association; the National Association of Women Lawyers; the American Federation of Labor; the National Association of Publishers, Inc.; the Master Plumbers Association of America; the National Ornamental Metal Manufacturers Association; the National Electrical Contractors Association; the National Association of Manufacturers; by the State bar associations of California, Colorado, Idaho, Iowa, Illinois, Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska, North Carolina, Ohio, Oregon, Pennsylvania, Texas, Vermont, Virginia, Washington, and West Virginia; and by the city bar associations of Boston, Chicago (in principle), Cleveland, Dallas, Philadelphia, Phoenix, and St. Louis, as well as by the Erie County or Buffalo Bar Association.

These bills have not been disapproved except by the National Lawyers Guild, the Federal Bar Association, and two committees of the City Bar Association of New York.

Do not assume for a moment that I have an ounce of pessimism in my make-up. On the contrary, my whole being is permeated with optimism. I have an abiding faith in America and American institutions. This trend toward administrative absolutism can and will be stopped. With the American lawyer in the lead, supported by labor and business interests, the tide can and will be stemmed.

Where is the Florida bar standing in this fight to restore and preserve the American system of law administration from the menacing maw of administrative absolutism which has cursed the world since the beginning of civilization—the exercise of which by unscrupulous dictators has resulted in driving European peoples to

OF

HON. HERRON PEARSON

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 2, 1940

ADDRESS BY DAVID E. LILIENTHAL

Mr. PEARSON. Mr. Speaker, pursuant to permission heretofore granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I desire to call the attention of Congress to the following address recently delivered by David E. Lilienthal, at a public dinner tendered by Mr. Silliman Evans, publisher of the Nashville Tennesseean, at Nashville, Tenn.:

Tonight a single subject holds America's attention. One concern is shared by every citizen: That this Nation must be made safe against the threat of military aggression. Everywhere through the length and breadth of the country, Americans, in all walks of life, are measuring our resources for defense.

We are now in the midst of a great effort to transform our peacetime economic institutions so that the needs of defense shall be met quickly and effectively. America viewed as one great production plant is being geared to that task.

This adjustment to the needs of defense is one that the entire country is facing at this hour. We must face it in the southeast. For new industries, industries essential to the strengthening of our national defenses, are coming to this area. That is inevitable; in fact it has already begun. Remember that this southeastern region has been named by military authorities as one of the most desirable situations in the United States for the location of national-defense production units. Sheltered from hostile aircraft by mountain ranges and inland from the sea and its hazards, crisscrossed by modern highways, served by railroads and by a newly opened navigation channel, this area is also one of nature's depositories for many of the raw materials classified by the Army as essential for military purposes.

It was because of just such facts as these that during the first World War Muscle Shoals, on the Tennessee River in Alabama, was chosen as the site of a giant government munitions plant. It was for those reasons that Wilson Dam was built to furnish power for the factories erected there.

In 1933 the Tennessee Valley Authority was assigned the management of these properties at Muscle Shoals, originally built to serve the needs of war. The people of the country want to know today how T. V. A. has discharged its responsibility, and to determine whether during these 7 years the properties once built for our defense and the six dams newly constructed to serve the needs of peace have both increased the security of the Nation. And businessmen particularly have a right to ask what services, what specific, practical services the T. V. A. is ready to furnish to the existing essential manufacturing plants that must be expanded to meet the Nation's needs, and the new war materials industries which will begin operations.

The Nation has a right to such an accounting of T. V. A.'s stewardship; the Board of Directors is happy to be able in this way to report directly to you and to all of its 130,000,000 stockholders, the people of the United States. Our report tells a story of munitions; of a vast new supply of electric power, electricity that is producing aluminum for aircraft; it is a story of stepped-up construction schedules, and of industrial research that can speed the transformation of raw materials into the arms of defense. Let me sum up the T. V. A.'s part in the national defense—a four-point program—and then supply you with some of the details which as businessmen you may find of chief practical interest.

In brief compass, here is the T. V. A.'s report:

1. The munitions plant at Muscle Shoals is ready as soon as the signal is given to be adapted to the production of ammonium nitrate for high explosives.

2. T. V. A. has developed a huge supply of power that is now of strategic importance to the defense of the Nation, a power supply without which the production of airplanes on the scale needed would be impossible, for today T. V. A. power is a principal reliance in America's production of aluminum.

3. The need for power and ever more power in this emergency has led us to order our dam-construction program to be speeded up by every device: this pressure means the completion of one of T. V. A.'s new dams 10 months ahead of schedule; it will add five new power generators in dams already completed. Speed, the cutting of corners, possible only in a well-seasoned construction force, is the T. V. A. order of the day.

4. The facts about badly needed raw materials essential to the defense program, facts T. V. A. has been developing for 7 years, are ready and have been made available to the country's new Defense Commission, and to businessmen upon whom we must rely for a speedy production of essential defense materials.

So T. V. A. reports its stewardship. It offers its program as an aid to the defense of the Nation.

The T. V. A. munitions plant at Muscle Shoals stands as a symbol of the democratic conception of defense. It was built for war. But in the years of peace it has served the basic needs of a peaceful people. It is producing a phosphate plant food, an aid in the restoration of our soil fertility, a source of strength to the people who live on the land, a safeguard to our supply of foods and fibers. Now once more war is abroad in the world, and that plant is available for adaptation to the production of explosives. Yet at the same time, faithful to the democratic conception that we must conserve our basic resources for the ultimate strength of all our people, the production of plant food can continue. Detailed plans are ready so that concentrated phosphate needed for the land can continue to be produced at Muscle Shoals without jeopardizing the output of war materials. So far as T. V. A. can influence the decision and the results, you may be confident that the bill for our defense will not be paid this time as it was 20 years ago by the exhaustion of the soil. While this country prepares, if necessary, to meet force with force, we can go on with our program of soil enrichment, making our people secure against the hazards of the future, restoring the land from which we draw our health, our strength, our very life.

Power is the life line of modern industry, upon which preparedness depends. For the rapid expansion of private and public enterprise an enormous supply is necessary. All of you will remember that a few years ago it was charged that the T. V. A. was constructing facilities far in excess of any possible power need. Every request for T. V. A. appropriations was vigorously opposed as unbusinesslike because we were providing for a product that had no market. Experience has demonstrated that our judgment was correct and that our critics in this respect were wrong. There is no power surplus. Had the appropriations for the construction of any one of these T. V. A. dams been defeated or delayed, the preparedness program of this Nation would be impeded. If a single generator had been delayed in installation the capacity of essential aluminum production, for example, would be impaired. And remember that aluminum is the principal item in the construction of aircraft. At this moment T. V. A.'s dams are a major source of power supply upon which the aluminum industry depends to provide materials for the goal of 50,000 airplanes a year. Growth of the new airplane factory here at Nashville, the location of a powder factory at Memphis, developments of the past few weeks, call for added power. Other pending expansion requires extensive increases in T. V. A.'s power capacity.

T. V. A. is now operating at capacity a power system ranking seventh or eighth in the United States. What about the future? How much more expansion of war industries can existing power supply support? An unprecedented increase in demand for electric power is occurring in the United States. We believe that action has not been taken rapidly enough in most sections of the country to keep up with this mounting need. Even in the Southeast, where, because of the T. V. A., the increase in electric supply has proceeded at a swifter pace than for the country as a whole, our judgment is that there must be large and immediate expansion of electric supply beyond the plans already approved for the T. V. A. The T. V. A. Board has ordered a speeding up of its construction schedules to shorten the time when new power supplies can be ready. We have just directed that two new generators for Wheeler Dam be set ahead 5 months, to be ready next winter; the completion of Watts Bar Dam with three large generators, has been ordered shortened by 10 months; three new generators have just been ordered for Wilson and Pickwick Dams, to be turning out power during 1941. These additions total 151,000 kilowatts of power capacity. All of this quickening of pace is within current appropriations. It calls for careful planning and harder work for T. V. A.'s staff, but it is characteristic of the mood and purpose of the whole Nation. Even greater acceleration of the T. V. A. job is needed; we are armed with detailed plans to move without delay when the word comes. T. V. A.'s seasoned construction forces, 8,000-strong, are ready.

But more than assurance of an adequate power supply is needed, if private manufacturers are to produce needed war materials speedily. For every new development businessmen need to know in detail about amounts and costs of raw materials available, about transportation facilities and costs, about industrial water supply and markets, and labor supply and housing. Time is pressing these days, and short cuts around costly and time-consuming independent investigations are urgently needed. In many cases months can be saved in the Tennessee Valley region because for seven years the T. V. A.'s staff of technicians has been at work, in cooperation with other research institutions, obtaining information about the region of exactly the kind that is needed now. The T. V. A. is making the results of these investigations available for immediate use in the national defense program of industry.

About one-third of the commodities classified as strategic and critical by the Army and Navy Munitions Board are available in commercial quantities in the Tennessee Valley area. Already several important industrial plants are turning out large volumes of some of these materials. The problem is simply one of plant expansion. Private business has ample information concerning many of the important materials which are now in production, such as the ores of zinc, iron, copper, and so on. Where, however, such existing commodities are needed in the defense program, there will be a tremendous impact on their present markets, the greater because imports in many cases are cut off and threatened. Many other potentially useful materials in the Southeast, however, are now being used by industry, only to a small extent; much of the T. V. A.'s industrial research has concerned itself with these less used commodities.

For these reasons many materials which heretofore were little used in industry offer important opportunities for development. They may well prevent serious disruption of some of America's key industries. For 7 years now T. V. A.'s industrial engineers, geologists, chemical and mechanical engineers, and technicians in many other fields have been investigating and testing out specific ways through which the income of the area could be raised by the more extensive processing of the raw-material resources now available. The origin of all wealth is the application of technical knowledge, skill, and labor to raw-material resources; hence T. V. A.'s persistent effort over many years in studying the Valley's raw-material resources, and particularly those which could be made more valuable through processing in industry. We have concentrated effort on some of the more promising materials. We have studied amounts available, estimated costs, and we have conducted experiments concerning specific uses in industry. In several cases experiments have been carried to the point of operating pilot plants in which production costs were determined. There have also been a number of practical market investigations.

As a result of this backlog of practical information, we are in a position to render considerable assistance in the present emergency. The T. V. A. and the agencies with which it is cooperating have developed certain new uses for minerals. We have a new method for refining domestic talc so that it could be used as a substitute for imports in both the electrical and ceramic industries. We have information concerning deposits of olivine, which can be used as a refractory in the steel industry. We have studied the extent and locations of kyanite deposits; it can be used as a refractory and as a raw material for airplane spark plugs. Promising preliminary results have been obtained in processing olivine as a source of magnesium, a metal used along with aluminum in airplane construction. And it is worthy of note that the present production of magnesium in this country is very small, 3,600 tons a year. German production is reported to be about 40,000 tons a year.

Businessmen who will carry a heavy responsibility in the expansion of manufacturing for defense will be interested to learn that T. V. A. has developed some substitutes for high-grade raw materials, substitutes which can take their places for certain uses. The supply of cork from Spain, for instance, is largely shut off. Our technicians have tested a method of treating a mineral known as vermiculite so that it will serve as a good substitute for cork insulation. We have obtained promising results in developing a process in our laboratories at Muscle Shoals by which manganese might be produced economically from certain low-grade ores. Most high-grade manganese ores are imported. We have investigated deposits of low-grade short-fibered asbestos, the use of which would make it possible to conserve the limited supply of long-fibered asbestos.

I need not list all the instances here. Suffice it to say that experiments have been made in laboratories and pilot plants, cost records are available, likewise estimates on peacetime markets offering permanent outlets when the emergency is over. The discoveries made in the course of T. V. A.'s industrial research efforts are ready for private enterprise to use as it mobilizes in defense of our country. And to this end we have just made our facilities available to the new Advisory Defense Commission, representing as it does, both industry and government, as one of T. V. A.'s contributions to the defense of the country.

Let me at this point make one matter clear. The T. V. A. area is confined to the Southeast, but it is an agency of the Nation. In assisting the industries of the country to accelerate their activities in this area, in providing them with information on which to act, the T. V. A. is not now and never has been involved in a program designed to encourage the removal of any industry from one community to another, from any other area to this one. We are an impartial agency of the Federal Government. We have obligations to the country as a whole. Our function is to know the facts and make them available wherever they are needed. This is no new activity for the Authority. But its importance now is immeasurably increased. And it is a good example, I think, of the way in which public activity and private enterprise can work together in seeking a common objective, the increase of income of the whole people. This program demonstrates the falsity of the mischievous notion that the governmental and business institutions of America are mutually hostile in their objectives. It stands as a concrete illustration that business and government are both part of the same effort of a united people.

Plans on paper do not produce planes or tanks or munitions. Plans have to be carried out. People have to do the job. Factories decided upon must be built or expanded; ore must be mined and put on cars and ships; figures on paper of how many men are needed to do a job must be translated into men actually employed and actually standing at an assembly line in a particular plant. In a country-wide effort to accelerate production broad-scale plans and decisions must, of course, be made at the top. Experience, and sad experience, has shown, however, that often in the past the serious bottleneck has been in getting those plans and decisions carried out. Fatal delays are likely to occur not so much because of inadequate planning, but because of inadequacies in the executions of those plans. A good plan, a fine blueprint, isn't enough. Those plans and blueprints have to be adapted to suit local conditions. Here, too, the T. V. A. may be of assistance. For as a regional agency we have necessarily been close to the problems we have been charged with administering; we have acquired a habit of getting things done as much as possible through the use of local agencies and regional leadership.

For seven years it has been T. V. A.'s job to know this region, not only the location of its minerals, its forest resources, its transportation and labor supply and housing, but the men who are its leaders—businessmen, teachers, farmers—men in various capacities of the region's life. For seven years now T. V. A. has worked cooperatively with almost every kind of regional and local institution—public and private—the colleges, the farm organizations, the local chambers of commerce, individual local industries and laboratories of industrial research. That knowledge of local resources, that habit of administering a job at the grass roots will enable us to help to accelerate the speed with which the national program is carried out in the Southeast.

To you who live in the area, as well as to the Nation as a whole, it will be a matter of satisfaction that the peacetime program of the Authority can be so immediately effective in this crisis. Of even greater consequence may be the fact that we are determined that all our efforts directed toward defense shall build up, not tear down, the progress we have made. The T. V. A. program is not altered. It is the same. The emergency only accelerates its pace. The T. V. A. is directed toward a constant goal—to aid in widening economic opportunity, to seek to assure a rising standard of living. A democracy will be secure only if it serves its citizens effectively. While T. V. A. takes its part in the national program designed to make our country safe from attack, it will seek to continue its long-time job of helping to make it secure from disaster within.

Guns and bombs and aircraft and munitions we must have if we would be prepared to defend ourselves. But the will, the inner flame, must be there or all the engines of defense will be without avail. We live under a system fashioned out of sacrifice and devotion by free men for free men, and not by robots for robots. This will be our greatest asset of defense; that on the farm, in the mine and factory, in places of business, the people of this country shall feel deep in their hearts that they have a nation, a way of life, a future that is worth every effort to improve and every sacrifice to defend.

Division of Commercial Treaties and Agreements

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VINCENT F. HARRINGTON

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 8, 1940

STATEMENT BY HON. CORDELL HULL, SECRETARY OF STATE

Mr. HARRINGTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement by the Secretary of State:

The recent creation of a new Division of Commercial Treaties and Agreements was another of a number of steps taken, from time to time, for the purpose of improving and making more effective the administrative machinery of the Department. The new division will provide unified direction for carrying out important functions in the field of commercial policy formerly handled by a number of divisions.

Far from signifying an abandonment or weakening of the trade-agreements program, this administrative change is intended to strengthen and make more efficient our efforts in the direction of the widest practicable implementation of the program and of the basic principles of liberal commercial relations, which underlie that program. Continued advocacy of these principles has been and remains our fixed policy. The only alternative, especially after the war, would be the destructive course of totalitarian autarchy.

I should like to call attention again to the following statement made by the President on June 21, 1940, in connection with some of the emergency features of our current work in the field of inter-American economic cooperation:

"In some of its essential features, this program of cooperative economic action by the American Republics and possibly by other countries is being undertaken in response to new—but, we hope, temporary—developments in international relations. It is not intended to replace the program of reciprocal-trade agreements which has been steadfastly pursued by the Government of the United States. We continue to believe that the basic principles of that program offer the most effective basis for mutually beneficial economic relations among nations, and we are determined to work, as circumstances permit, for their fullest possible application."

Mexican Claims Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. PAUL J. KILDAY
OF TEXAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1940

Mr. KILDAY. Mr. Speaker, this bill has for its purpose the discharge of an obligation assumed by the Government of the United States. That obligation was assumed by the Government by its voluntary act and for reasons which seemed to it to be good and sufficient and to its own best interests. For the purpose of engaging in trade and commerce with the Republic of Mexico many of our nationals had gone into that Republic, had invested their money, and were engaged in businesses of many kinds. They were perfectly willing to hazard their money in that undertaking and were perfectly willing to abide by the established systems for the protection of those investments.

Unfortunately revolution tore the Republic of Mexico for many years. The period from 1910 to 1920 is generally regarded as the revolutionary period. During much of that period many irritating incidents occurred which strained the relations between the Government of the United States and the Republic of Mexico. These incidents ranged from the seizure or destruction of property of United States citizens to violent border raids in which our citizens were killed or injured. Many Members of this Congress remember the time they served on the Mexican border as members of the National Guard of their respective States. During some of this period war seemed to be imminent, costly border guards were being maintained by the United States and trade and commerce between the two countries were at a standstill.

In 1923 this condition existed. The United States found her trade and commerce stagnated and she was losing all of the revenue of Mexican imports as well as the benefit her citizens would receive from exports to Mexico. In this condition the Government of the United States began negotiations for a restoration of diplomatic relations and the resultant establishment of trade and commerce between the countries.

In September 1923, as a condition precedent to the resumption of relations with Mexico, a treaty was entered into between the two Governments. This treaty called for a commission to hear and determine the claims of United States nationals against Mexico and of Mexican nationals against the United States. This was regarded by the United States as being to her own best interests. So believing, this Government, under the treaty power possessed by it under the Constitution, required that citizens of this country submit their claims to this commission and deprived them of all other instrumentalities for the adjustment and collection of those claims. By so doing this Government agreed that it would pay to its citizens the amount awarded to its citizens by the commission and the Government of Mexico agreed to pay the amount awarded to its citizens and the lesser would operate as an offset against the greater.

That such was the effect of the treaty is acknowledged by the State Department and has been its position from the beginning. To such an extent has the State Department made this holding that it prevented a settlement privately negotiated by one of the claimants who had submitted its claim to the commission on the ground that the treaty removed its management from the hands of the claimant.

This bill is but the discharge of an obligation long delayed.

Representative Plumley, of Vermont, the Entire "Vermont Delegation"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FOSTER STEARNS
OF NEW HAMPSHIRE
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1940

Mr. STEARNS of New Hampshire. Mr. Speaker, some days ago the gentleman from Pennsylvania, Representative ALLEN, summer resident of Vermont and a "temporary constituent" of the gentleman from Vermont, Representative PLUMLEY, put in the RECORD an editorial from the Bennington Banner in re certain honorary degrees held by our mutual friend.

I do not propose as a "good neighbor" to be outdone by him, though he was one jump ahead of me, for I now propose, under consent granted, to include an editorial from the Keene Evening Sentinel, of Keene, N. H., in my district, indicative of the fact that Representative Plumley's friendships are not localized or confined by State lines.

The editor of the Sentinel is one of the ablest men in his field in New Hampshire, or elsewhere for that matter, so when Harry Shaw takes time and makes the effort to write such an editorial as that which I include you may know he speaks whereof he knows.

Incidentally, I happen to know that he and the gentleman from Vermont, Representative PLUMLEY, are long and old-time friends. I have heard him relate the fact that back in the early 1900's he was official reporter of the Vermont House of Representatives, by grace of an appointment at the hands of this friend of his, who was then Speaker, if I remember correctly.

Even before that time, after Shaw left Washington where he was secretary to Senator Page of Vermont to return to Vermont to engage in newspaper work he wrote a series of articles for the press covering the officials and prominent Members of the legislature and their idiosyncracies. Legislatime Luminaries it was called, and in his write up of the gentleman from Vermont, Clerk PLUMLEY, back in those days, he suggests that it will be wise to watch his progress.

Anyway, Shaw has watched him, as has most of New England, and he does not overdraw the picture he paints.

I do not, as I said, propose to let Pennsylvania get ahead of me. No summer resident of Vermont has anything on one who has been a long-time permanent neighbor, although there is an imaginary State line between us.

Incidentally it is a pleasure to let the doctor's colleagues know what his neighbors think of him, and to congratulate him on behalf of all of us, who are honored indirectly by reason of his selection for the honor conferred.

I am the more impelled to do this because of the fact that the gentleman from Vermont, Representative PLUMLEY has declined to become a candidate for the Senate to fill out the unexpired term of the late Senator Gibson—a decision that will be enthusiastically welcomed by his friends on both sides of the aisle in this House.

In his statement to the public through the press, the gentleman from Vermont, Representative PLUMLEY, says:

At this critical time in our country's history I would lose the respect of those who have so often and so signally honored me if I were to allow any desire to realize a personal ambition to go to the United States Senate to influence or determine my sense of duty and obligation.

I can do more effective work and render more valuable service to my State, to New England, and the country right where I am.

I am a candidate to succeed myself. It is a sufficient honor to be the sole Representative in the Congress from my native State.

PLUMLEY OF VERMONT

Boston University not only honored Congressman CHARLES A. PLUMLEY but it did a job that reflects honor upon the institution when it conferred the degree of doctor of laws upon the well-known Vermonter. Those who have been associated with Mr. PLUMLEY in educational and public service activities will very generally agree that this honor by the Boston institution has been long deferred.

CHARLES A. PLUMLEY, former president of Norwich is a long, and old-time friend of the editor. We have wanted to say a lot of things for some years, or since he left the presidency of Norwich; this affords the desired opportunity.

The writer recalls the days when as official reporter of the Vermont House of Representatives, he was called in to conferences had between the then president of Norwich, Charles H. Spooner, now of Charlestown, N. H., Col. Fred B. Thomas, and the then speaker of the house, Representative PLUMLEY, who were trying to save Norwich University from the Carnegie Foundation attack. "There never would be another war" said the Foundation, "so why continue Norwich? Why not make it a part of U. V. M.?" They saved it, and it proved their wisdom, for war soon came and Norwich men distinguished themselves, as always, in the service of their country.

The editor came to know this man PLUMLEY even before that, as clerk of the Vermont House of Representatives, while he was then a newspaperman on duty at the capitol.

The people of Vermont have shown their appreciation of his services by serving themselves in sending him to represent them in Congress. He has justified their confidence in him.

The people of Vermont and New Hampshire—for that matter all of New England—know of the outstanding record he has made in Congress. He is admittedly one of the leaders of the minority; holds very responsible positions on Appropriations and other committees; is deputy whip, and elsewhere recognized.

What they do not know, but we do, is that the 14 years he was president of Norwich University marks an unprecedented era of progress and advancement of that institution. A friend of mine some time ago sent me the financial statement of the university covering the years of 1920 to 1933.

When PLUMLEY took over the reins in 1920 there were mortgages plastered all over the institution. The buildings (and that was about all there was to the plant) were valued at $297,562. When he resigned he had reerected and newly constructed a plant which was valued at $918,600, or an increase of more than $720,000. And that at depression values, and for insurance purposes, so the books show. The mortgages were burned.

When he took over the management the total endowment was only $169,000. He left it at $800,000 in round numbers. The total physical value of the assets of the university, counting the plant and the endowment, when PLUMLEY resigned as president, amounted to $2,132,557 as against $393,127 when he was elected.

He increased its assets over a million and a half; that is to say, after deducting all indebtedness, and despite all handicaps.

However, the money end of it all is a small factor. During his administration the faculty was increased numerically; the faculty members each had a $100 increase for years; the cadet corps reached its maximum size; new courses were added which raised the academic standing; curriculum requirements and prerequisites of academic and educational standardizing boards were met, which made it possible for the first time for Norwich to be accorded recognition as an accredited college.

He erected new buildings, reconstructed old buildings, constructed an athletic field, a polo field, and furnished a foundation for the growth he envisaged along all lines.

He rendered faithful service under most disadvantageous conditions, oppcsed as he was by some jealous and narrow-minded and shortsighted people, and interfered with as he was by a group of noncooperative and disloyal associates in his administrative staff.

Such service marks the real era of the beginning of Norwich as a university, unappreciated perhaps by those who fought his program, but history will write it so.

Boston University has done well to acknowledge its appreciation of faithful service to his day and generation by one who never made and never would make any claim himself for his achievements.

President Raises Another False Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 8, 1940

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, from the press of July 6:

Better, said Mr. Roosevelt, that the United States suffer from the inefficiency of this Nation's democratic form of government and chafe under the "time-lag" which may stall for months and years needed improvement, than submit to the grim power of the dictator nations.

Thus the President sounded the keynote of the New Deal campaign to keep Republican Nominee Willkie out of the White House.

The President, backed by Farley and Bankhead, assumes that once again he can fool the voters by raising a false issue; that is, that an efficient administration under Willkie would destroy American institutions.

The President forgets that we remember that he is the man who, through the past 7 years, has been inordinately eager—crazy, it might be said—to grasp a dictator's power.

He was the one who attempted to destroy a coordinate—the judicial—branch of the Government, with his court-packing scheme. He it was who insisted that Congress follow him so subserviently that it became known as a group of "yes" men, a "rubber stamp" branch of the Government.

He is the one who has deprived industrialists of free speech, as, for example, when his Labor Board convicted Henry Ford because he told his employees they did not need to pay tribute to the President's then "buddy," John Lewis, for the privilege of working for the Ford Motor Co.

The President is the would-be dictator who has demanded and received blank checks for billions of dollars; who attempted to purge those members of his own party who ventured to disagree with him, to assert their independence.

The President's hypocrisy is so well known that this last dose will deceive no one.

Roosevelt is the one who, in violation of a Federal statute, was about to send American ships to a belligerent when his acts were halted by the protest of the gentleman from South Dakota, Congressman CASE.

Roosevelt assumes apparently, that we cannot have efficiency under a democracy. His assumption is correct, if he has in mind the kind of "democracy" that Roosevelt and the New Deal have given us—a pseudo—democracy.

In assuming that we cannot have as high a degree of efficiency in a democracy without loss of liberty, as in a dictatorship, the President must have in mind our Nation's experience with the New Deal, which took from us our "democracy"; gave us dictatorship without efficiency.

Roosevelt has grasped for and seized most of the dictatorial powers exercised by a Hitler, but he lacks Hitler's efficiency. He will fool no one by his attempt to raise the bogey man of fear of dictatorship through Willkie and a Republican administration. The people have taken his measure; they are familiar with his political tricks, his frightening crises, his false emergencies—all staged for political effect.

Roosevelt's fair-haired boy, Tugwell, early in the New Deal, was the one who said:

Business must logically be made to disappear.

The President and his new dealers have gone a long way on that road, but patriotic Americans, with the good Lord's help, will restore business to its rightful place; so that we may adequately prepare for the dangers into which the New Deal is arrogantly shoving us.

The only dictator on our present horizon is Roosevelt, who, contrary to all American tradition, would himself, during a third term, exercise absolute power from the White House or name his successor to do so.

No, Mr. Roosevelt, the people have at last "caught on" and, after January next, they will no longer suffer from the inefficiency of this Nation's New Deal. They will do things in a businesslike way, as our forefathers did in the years gone by. They will strip the Federal Government of some of its arbitrary power and retake for themselves and their representatives the liberties of which you and your political supporters have deprived them.

The days of boondoggling which you praised so highly; of spending for the sake of spending; of the purchasing of political support by the expenditure of Federal money; of the strutting and the bluffing while inadequately prepared, are about over.

Shocked by a knowledge of Hitler's power; of the effect of your foreign policy which has left us without a single friend who would unselfishly assist us; we are going back to work; to the way of life which heretofore has always insured our independence, our safety, and under which we always kept our freedom until you arrived on the scene.

Do not worry, Mr. President, about the loss of our freedom; the establishment of a dictator here in the United States. The only one who has attempted that has been yourself. Pointing an accusing finger at Willkie will get you nowhere.

The Future Is Our Own!

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLIFTON A. WOODRUM

OF VIRGINIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 8, 1940

ADDRESS OF HON. HAROLD L. ICKES, SECRETARY OF THE INTERIOR

Mr. WOODRUM of Virginia. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted, I herewith insert the address by the very able Secretary of the Interior Harold L. Ickes, entitled "The Future Is Our Own!" delivered at Washington's Fourth of July celebration in front of the Washington Monument, Thursday, July 4, 1940. The address was broadcast by the Mutual Broadcasting System.

Americans used to think that they knew all there was to know about orations. They used to think that they had heard all the orations there were to hear—the nominating orations—the dedicatory orations—the memorial orations—the commencement orations—the Fourth of July orations. For years, for generations, ever since the foundation of the Republic and even way back before that, they had been listening to the orators and to the orations, and they thought that they had heard them all.

They were wrong.

There is a new kind of oration in the world: an oration which has been given again and again, and louder and louder, and more and more frequently during these last few years.

You have heard it. You have all heard it. You have heard it on the radio blaring out from eastward over the water. You have read it in the papers. It is always the same oration.

It begins familiarly for you—for all Americans. It begins like the old-fashioned Fourth of July orations with fine-sounding words about the people, the new people, the superior, forceful, vigorous people who will rule the world—the people of the future.

When you hear these words you sit back in your seats. You relax. You listen.

But, as you listen, the familiarity of the words disappears. They change. There's a difference. And gradually, listening, you realize what the difference is. It is this: In the past, in the orations that you remember, the superior, forceful, vigorous people the orators were always talking about—the people who would conquer the world—were always you—you, the American people. But now, in this new oration, the fine new vigorous people are not you. They are not you at all. They are somebody else.

It is somebody else, somebody different, who is new now; somebody else who is young, and strong, and vigorous.

And what about you? Where do you come in?

You find out soon enough. You find out as you listen. You are told that you are old. You are tired. You are all through. You are a decadent, worn-out nation, full of decadent, outmoded ideas. You are finished. There is no place for you or for your ideas in the world any more. That is what you are told as you listen to this new oration.

And, as you listen, you become uneasy. You had always thought that democracy and liberty were the new things in the world and that you were the new people in the world, the people of the West. And here is this orator telling you that democracy is all through and that liberty is decadent and that the new people are not the people of the new world in America, but the people of the Old World overseas.

It is a startling idea to you, fellow Americans. And you sit and you listen and you wonder. And you hear the orator talking about the great deeds and the triumphs of this other, new and vigorous people, this different people, and you see that there are indeed triumphs. And you say to yourselves, "Maybe he's got something there." "Maybe it's true." "Let's have a look." "Let's have a look at this new, triumphant people boasting of their strength." "Let's have a look at the fresh and vigorous people who shout that they are fresher and more vigorous than the American pioneers or their freeborn children."

And you have a look. And you see. And what you see is this:

You see that this new and vigorous people are a people so vigorous, so virile, so energetic, so young, so strong, that they have surrendered their wills, their bodies, and their minds to the absolute will of a boss who tells them what to do.

You see that they are people so fresh and so forceful and so determined that they do whatever they are told to do—speak when they are told to speak, listen when they are told to listen, say what they are told to say, shut up when they are told to shut up, eat when they are told to eat, go hungry when they are told to go hungry, die when they are told to die.

You see that they are people whose vigor and force are so great and so overwhelming that they put up with snoopers, accept paid informers, permit themselves to be whipped and mutilated, read what they are permitted to read, salute when they are told to salute, marry when they are told to marry, beget children when they are instructed to beget children.

You see that these so superior and forceful people break their plighted word, rape peaceful lands at the word of their master, destroy the lives of little children, requite gentleness with brutality, reap where they have not sown, victimize helpless minorities.

You see that these superior people of the future who would rule the world abase themselves before new gods set up for them by a dictator.

You see all this. And you listen to the orator. You hear him tell you that freedom is now a mark of inferiority and of incompetence and that slavery is the badge of pride and of patriotism. You hear him tell you that obedience is the mark of a man and that independence is characteristic of a weakling.

You listen.

You have been listening now for a long time.

When are you going to laugh, Americans?

When is the big laugh, the coarse, loud laugh, the harsh laugh of Americans going to blurt out and fill the world? When are you going to imagine to yourselves the words that Lincoln would have used if he had listened to this orator?

When are you going to throw at this orator the words of Lincoln that "No man is good enough to govern any other man without that other man's consent"?

When are you going to imagine the words that your fathers would have used, and their fathers?

When is the great, hard, angry, shouting, "razzberry" laugh of the American people going to yell down the west wind of this continent and out to sea and on out past the horizon?

When are you going to say, all as one man and all together: "We haven't even yet begun to live!"

"We haven't even yet begun to create on this continent the new and untried and never yet realized world of freedom and security and self-respect!"

When are you going to shout again to the world the words that our forefathers shouted—that all men are created equal and that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights—rights of life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness?

Tonight, in the Capital of our free and young and great Republic, we are assembled to reaffirm to ourselves and to the world that we in America still hold these truths to be self-evident.

We swear that we will hold fast to the principles upon which this Nation was founded and that we will never tolerate any seeds of hatred that would raise one American against another.

We reaffirm our belief in freedom, freedom of speech, of worship, of assembly, of press, and of the individual.

We pledge continued allegiance to the eternal principles of truth and of justice.

We united and free Americans declare that we are prepared to defend our principles, our ideals, and our institutions, so that the future may be ours.

Pledge Allegiance and Fidelity to United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EARL R. LEWIS

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 8, 1940

RESOLUTION BY SYRIAN LEBANESE AMERICAN SOCIETY OF BELMONT COUNTY, OHIO

Mr. LEWIS OF OHIO. Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of a resolution passed by the Syrian Lebanese American Society of Belmont County, Ohio, pledging allegiance and fidelity to the United States of America. It is with genuine satisfaction that we observe the spontaneous declarations by many of our foreign-born citizens of unswerving allegiance and fidelity to the United States of America in these troublous times. Their conduct in this connection is an inspiration and I am glad to include in my remarks the resolution which is as follows:

Whereas it is recognized by proper authorities having as their duties the preservation of these United States of America as free and independent States within a great Nation that certain subversive activities directed against the Government of these United States does exist; and

Whereas certain people living within the boundaries of these United States are openly accused and publicly prosecuted for their traitorous acts against this Nation, which they have not denied; and

Whereas many of these individuals are persons formerly holding allegiance to a foreign flag or nation, or are one generation only removed from the influence of foreign demagogs and kings; we

Therefore feel that this activity has brought and is bringing upon the shoulders of all foreign-born citizens of this country and upon their children born in this country unfavorable comment and criticism which is not merited, and to which we as loyal citizens and patriotic Americans do object.

We therefore feel that the accident of birth should not hold against us influence which we find hard to deny except by word. We do, therefore, in an effort to pledge anew our allegiance to the only land we know, and in an effort to forever silence our detractors. offer the following pledge of loyalty:

"We the members of the Syrian Lebanese American Society of Belmont County, Ohio, do hereby declare, on oath, that we absolutely and entirely renounce and abjure all allegiance and fidelity to any foreign prince, potentate, state, or sovereignty, and particularly to the country of which we have been heretofore subjects; that we will support and defend the Constitution and laws of the United States of America against all enemies, foreign and domestic; that we will bear true faith and allegiance to the same; and that we take this obligation freely without mental reservation or purpose of evasion, so help me, God."

I Love the United States

HON. J. HAROLD FLANNERY
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1940

POEM WRITTEN BY JOHN V. HEFFERNAN

Mr. FLANNERY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem written by a constituent and personal friend, John V. Heffernan:

I LOVE THE UNITED STATES

I love the towns of the North,
The song of each vibrant street,
I thrill to the winds as they billow forth
Through the snow and the biting sleet,
And who shall say that they stifle breath
Or weave its mists into shrouds of death?

I love the towns of the East,
Cradled by mountain and sea;
They sprawl on the land like a lazy beast
But they tenderly suckle me.
From merry to mad their moods may range,
But what is life if it is not change?

I love the towns of the South,
Asleep beside slumbrous streams—
The palm trees convene at the river's mouth
And they speak with the voice of dreams:
Manana! Manana! They seem to say,
Tomorrow, lad, is another day.

I love the towns of the West,
Sun chastened and shrived by rain,
Clean-cut as the gems of a necklace dressed
For the goddess of peak and plain.
Their far horizons give man his scope
For the high emprise of dauntless hope.

I love the United States,
Endowed by the best of earth,
And I pray that ever within its gates
Stanch statecraft shall find safe berth.
Our pledge be the cause more right than just,
In God and Country our sacred trust.

Financing Additions to the Farm Program

OF
HON. BERTRAND W. GEARHART
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 4, 1940

ADDRESS OF CARL B. ROBBINS, PRESIDENT OF THE COMMODITY CREDIT CORPORATION, TO THE AMERICAN COTTON SHIPPERS' ASSOCIATION

Mr. GEARHART. Mr. Speaker, on April 26 last, Mr. Carl B. Robbins, President of the Commodity Credit Corporation, delivered an address at New Orleans which has excited widespread interest in agricultural circles, an address which he aptly entitled "Financing Additions to the Farm Program."

In the light of the conditions which have developed in the interim, the importance of that which Mr. Robbins then had to say cannot be overemphasized. In view of the plight of many farmers, there are few among us but would agree that a way must be found to increase and stabilize agricultural income.

In his speech, Mr. Robbins argues most persuasively for the adoption of Secretary Henry A. Wallace's marketing certificate program. Having been impressed by the logic of his presentation, I am quite certain that the certificate plan is well worthy of and should be accorded the careful study and painstaking consideration of the farmers of the country as well as the membership of this legislative body. To become informed in respect to the program is to become an enthusiastic advocate of the plan for which he so eloquently pleads. Of this I am quite certain.

Moreover, the promise that the marketing-certificate program holds of bringing about a most substantial and greatly needed increase in the income from several important crops in my State—including raisins, rice, and prunes—as well as such nationally basic crops as cotton and wheat, makes it important that the proposed program be given widespread consideration. This is especially true today in view of the fact that all these crops are threatened with serious injury as a consequence of the disruption by the current war of so many of our foreign export markets.

Because I am thoroughly convinced that Mr. Robbins indicates in the marketing-certificate program a possible escape from the intolerable conditions which in the past have all but overwhelmed the American agriculturist, I am constrained to, and do ask, the unanimous consent of the membership of this body that the text of his splendid address be spread upon the pages of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. And this with the hope that those who may hereafter peruse it will advise me in respect to their reactions.

The unanimous approval of the membership of the House of Representatives to the inclusion of the address hereinbefore referred to having been indicated, Mr. Robbins' speech follows:

OUTLINE

I. Foreword.
II. First question: What are the elements of the farm program and its results to date?
III. Second question: What are the basic needs and desirable requirements of additions to the farm program?
A. The need for increased farm income.
B. The need for permanence of farm income.
C. The need for strengthened-production adjustment.
(1) To compensate for lost markets.
(2) To avert unbalanced production.

D. The need for increased soil conservation.
E. The need for increased consumption of farm products.

A. The main choice.
B. General superiority of improved prices over increased appropriations as the principal source of funds.
C. Conclusions on improved prices and increased appropriations as sources of funds.
V. Fourth question: How should the required additional funds be obtained through the market place?

Financing Additions to the Farm Program

I. FOREWORD

It is a pleasure to respond to your invitation and present a comparative analysis of the marketing-certificate program and other alternatives for financing additions to the farm program.

The members of your association are engaged in a long-established and highly useful business that normally performs the necessary functions of classing, buying, holding, shipping, and selling cotton. The structure of your trade gives considerable assurance that cotton growers will receive as much, and cotton manufacturers will pay as little, as supply and demand conditions and keen competition in handling make possible. It is widely recognized that the merchandising services of cotton shippers, including the cooperatives, constitute one of our most efficient and valuable middleman trades.

Under these circumstances, you desire and deserve a continuing opportunity to render your normal services. Some of you, however, have become perhaps unduly apprehensive lest new additions to the farm program should take a form that would tend to cause Government to encroach upon your established business. Various farm plans have been proposed that you fear would jeopardize the cotton trade. You see potential dangers to your business in the numerous proposals which are basically plans for either price fixing or high commodity loan rates; and you are disturbed by the very considerable total support behind such proposals.

There is at least some basis for your present concern and pessimism with respect to possible future developments affecting the cotton trade; but there is also a sound basis for confidence and optimism with respect to the future of your business. Although there is some conflict between the interests of cotton farmers and cotton shippers—with respect to the quantity of cotton to be produced and marketed—there is no basic conflict of interests that would necessarily require your business to suffer. On the contrary, there is a very considerable identity of interests, and an important need for your services. In fact, it is hoped that this discussion will make it clear how, as it so happens, the various current proposals which you fear would threaten the cotton trade are not the most desirable alternatives from the standpoint of cotton growers. It is believed that in the course of this analysis it will become manifest that, fortunately, the plan for making additions to the farm program which the Secretary of Agriculture has developed to serve best the interests of growers is also an alternative that coincides with your own interests.

It may be well to refer briefly to the organization of the discussion which is intended to substantiate these somewhat sweeping and optimistic statements. It has been deemed best to proceed by describing: First, the nature of the farm program and its results to date; second, the basic needs and desirable requirements of additions to the farm program; third, the main choice that must be made between the Federal Treasury and the market place as the two principal sources of funds; and fourth, the various alternatives for obtaining additional funds through the market place.

II. FIRST QUESTION: WHAT ARE THE ELEMENTS OF THE FARM PROGRAM AND ITS RESULTS TO DATE?

The plight of farmers in 1933, when the farm program was adopted, is not pleasant to recall. Farmers were desperately striving to subsist on painfully meager incomes from 5-cent cotton, 32-cent wheat, and 19-cent corn. In 1932 the cash income of farmers had dwindled to the incredibly low figure of approximately $4,500,000,000. Foreclosure of farm mortgages was rife. The markets for farm products, at home and abroad, had been seriously impaired by increasing unemployment and trade barriers. Thousands of country banks and stores had become bankrupt. The fertility of the soil was being mined, and erosion of the land was being spread, in the production of undistributable surpluses. In fact, agriculture was so hard pressed and disorganized that farmers had found themselves driven to the device of local strikes as a last resort in a desperate effort to obtain a subsistence. Thought and order had been replaced by confusion and chaos. At the height of this storm the farm program was born; and it seems truly remarkable that under the stress of such an emergency there was adopted, not a mere temporary and expedient device, but a fundamental and sound program of permanent nature.

During the past 7 years the farm program has been enlarged and improved with the encouraging results that we see today. Agriculture's annual cash income has increased to $8,500,000,000. Soil rebuilding and conservation have been substituted for soil mining and erosion. Production adjustment, ever-normal granary, crop insurance, surplus removal, commodity loan, and tenancy programs have helped to prevent and control the conditions and forces that had impaired the welfare of American agriculture, and with that, the welfare of industry and the Nation. Today, in contrast, we have 10-cent cotton, 90-cent wheat, and 60-cent corn. The principal and interest on farm mortgages are much lower; the balance between agricultural and industrial production has been restored to a substantial extent; farmers are organized to deal effectively with their problems; the country stores and banks have reopened to enjoy an enlarged volume of business; and industry has recovered much of its market in the agricultural areas.

The farm program is not here today, to be gone tomorrow. It is not a trivial and decorative annual; it is a deep-rooted and enduring perennial which is so far-reaching, and so fundamentally sound and necessary that it will yield well-being and security for all the people in the years to come, no matter what may happen in this confused and uncertain world. Those who would attempt to destroy the farm program cannot be well informed; they must be unable to recall the miseries that it relieved and unable to see its crying need for the future. Consequently, as the only suggestion to the members of your association, it is proposed that for your own interests, as well as for the public welfare, you adopt a realistic attitude of reconciliation toward the overwhelming necessity for production adustment, even though it has meant a decrease in the volume of raw cotton for you to merchandise. That is your greatest single problem. If it were done, you would be in a position to cooperate and participate with the farmers, and give them and yourselves the benefit of the accumulated wealth of your technical and trade knowledge, in making additions to the farm program that would simultaneously be of maximum benefit to cotton growers and afford the maximum opportunity for the utilization of your own valuable services.

III. SECOND QUESTION: WHAT ARE THE BASIC NEEDS AND DESIRABLE REQUIREMENTS OF ADDITIONS TO THE FARM PROGRAM?

In order to reduce the problem of appraising the various alternatives for additions to the farm program to a realtively simple task, it is necessary to have definitely in mind the principal objectives to be attained. To that end, it is proposed to review as briefly as possible the basic needs and desirable requirements of new additions to the farm program.

A. The need for increased farm income

The great improvement in agricultural income during the past 7 years should not be misinterpreted as indicating that farmers have obtained an equitable participation in the national income. The worst suffering has been met, but crying needs still remain for increased farm income. It is not necessary to describe to you, whose business brings you into intimate contact with farmers throughout the Cotton Belt, how many farm families are still obliged to endure the privations of insufficient food, clothing, and medical services. The lot of the average share-cropper and tenant has not yet been brought up to the level of urban relief workers. The minimum wage of mill hands is 30 cents per hour but last year the farmer received, including governmental payments, only about 12 cents for the pound of cotton that may have required approximately a man-hour of labor to produce. Let it suffice to summarize the great deficiency and disparity in farm income by those basic statistics: Agriculture today has approximately 24 percent of the total population, and 31 percent of the Nation's children, but only 11 percent of the national income.

B. The need for permanence of farm income

To the extent that farmers are obliged to rely upon appropriations from the Federal Treasury as a principal source of income, their status is uncertain and vulnerable. In contrast, the aid that the Government has extended to industry and labor through such devices as tariffs, quotas, and franchises seems secure and permanent. Every year there has been a brisk struggle to obtain even an irreducible necessary minimum of agricultural appropriations. Last year, as you know, there was difficulty in obtaining the necessary funds to make possible the sale of cotton in foreign markets. You are also acquainted with the problem that has been encountered this year in obtaining appropriations for parity and export payments. With an increased Federal debt, and with a growing need for appropriations for national defense, it is possible that in the future the Congress may curtail rather than increase agricultural appropriations. Agriculture, like industry, is entitled to look for its income from sources that are more reliable than direct appropriations from the Federal Treasury.

C. The need for strengthened production adjustment

It is readily understandable that a cotton shipper might find it difficult to become enthusiastic about a farm program which had as one objective a reduction in the number of bales of cotton to be handled; but, as has been mentioned, you need to face the facts squarely in order to place yourself in position to act in your own best interest. The need for production adjustment is an overwhelmingly real and stubborn fact. Farmers must have it as the foundation for any successful program for cotton. Let us examine briefly the two fundamental needs for production adjustment.

(1) To Compensate for Lost Markets

Agriculture has lost much of its foreign market since the World War as a consequence of both the change in our position from a debtor to a creditor Nation and the mushroom growth of trade barriers throughout the world. The trade-agreements program is serving to lower old, and curtail the erection of new, trade barriers. The loss in our former foreign market, however, is still equal to the production from thirty to thirty-five million acres of cropland; and the supplanting of the horse by the gasoline motor has reduced the market for feed crops from an additional twenty-five to thirty million acres. The loss of these markets for the products of fifty-five to sixty-five million acres of land, despite increases in population, obviously make it necessary to adjust agricultural production.

(2) To Avert Unbalanced Production

Everyone recognizes that the general welfare of our Nation requires some balanced relationship between agricultural and industrial production. Unfortunately, however, the fundamental fact is not widely recognized that there is a difference between the inherent tendency of agriculture and industry to increase production, with the result that agricultural adjustment becomes necessary. Both agriculture and industry readily expand production under the stimulus of increasing prices, but, taken as a whole, the reactions of agriculture and industry to decreasing prices are quite different. When the general price level of products declines industrial production decreases sharply, but the agricultural production of soil-mining cash crops may even increase, and soil-conserving practices tend to be discontinued, as farmers struggle to maintain an already meager income. Agricultural depression and an imbalance between industrial and agricultural production are the natural results of this greater inherent tendency of agriculture, as compared with industry, to expand production. Lack of knowledge of this fundamental fact has caused farmers to be accused of wanting a scarcity program; whereas, on the contrary, the real situation is that farmers almost invariably possess a keen desire to increase production to the full extent that consuming outlets can be found.

It is a common mistake to interpret farmer recognition of the necessity for balanced production as indicating a desire for underproduction. The great single economic objective of our people is to increase the standard of living; and by the term "standard of living" we mean the total amount of all the various services and agricultural and industrial products consumed. In order to increase the standard of living, therefore, we must increase total consumption; and in order to increase total consumption we must increase total production, because in the long run, with normal spoilage and waste and with imports and exports tending to become equal, it is self-evident not only that we cannot consume a total amount equal to more than we produce but also that we will consume an amount equal to all we produce. Consequently, there is no argument against increasing the total production of the Nation. The total production, so long as it is distributed so as to give consumers the things they need in the proportions they are needed, cannot become too great, notwithstanding variations in the problems of distribution. But we can have, have had, and still have a total production that is not distributed among various products in proportion to the needs of consumers. Nor can we expect to enjoy the fruits of a reasonably balanced distribution of our total production of industrial and agricultural products unless we utilize a production adjustment program to counterbalance the greater inherent tendency of agriculture as compared with industry to expand production. Greater total production is essential to an increased standard of living; and reasonably well balanced industrial and agricultural production is essential to both urban and rural prosperity.

D. The need for increased soil conservation

It was only in recent years that as a nation we were awakened to the fact that we had been permitting the most valuable and fundamental of all our natural resources to be washed and blown away at a rate which, if unchecked, would ultimately have resulted in a great lowering of our standard of living and all the disintegrations of a people that such a major calamity entails. The farm program was so designed, however, that soil conservation is proceeding apace with production adjustment. To date, the task of rebuilding our soils remains uncompleted, but soil-conserving and home-consumption crops have already been substituted for approximately 40,000,000 acres of surplus soil-depleting production. When our soil-conservation program was written into the statutes, a determination was permanently engraved in American policy to discharge fully and faithfully our highest responsibilities as trustees for ourselves and for posterity. The completion of this great work awaits only some means for increasing farm income in a manner that will serve as a strong incentive for increased soil conservation. If any term ever deserved to be recorded in letters of gold it is surely soil conservation.

E. The need for increased consumption of farm products

Our great cruel paradox for many years has been malnutrition, or slow starvation, in the midst of burdensome surpluses of raw foodstuffs. No one has failed to see and feel the pressing need for bridging the gulf between unmarketable surpluses and undernourished people. It has now been demonstrated that the food-stamp plan, and the program of surplus purchases for relief distribution, are exceptionally well adapted to meet this need, provided only that adequate financing can be found.

F. The need for utilizing the services of the normal channels of trade

Changes in industries and trades that meet new needs and increase efficiency may be painful but they are desirable and inevitable. Sailing boats gave way to steamships, buggies to automobiles, phonographs to radios, and railroads to trucks—with probable net gains for the public welfare. Those changes worked themselves out under the free play of openly competitive forces, and in the absence of any external control, so that we may feel confident that they were desirable and economically justifiable. But today, with governments finding themselves compelled to exercise controls in many new directions, it is highly desirable that before any new governmental program is adopted it be scrutinized carefully to determine whether it is so designed that directly or indirectly, immediately or ultimately, it would unnecessarily sacrifice the valuable services of some trade or industry. There is always a possibility that a governmental program, developed quickly and under pressure to meet a critical major condition, may appear to be generally satisfactory here and now, but that upon unfolding into operation it may unavoidably result in some unnecessary and undesirable impairment of an established and valuable activity. Obviously, a sound program with respect to cotton should utilize fully the high efficiency and value of the established services of cotton shippers. It seems reasonable to assume that cotton shippers have as much reason for wanting farmers to appreciate the need for utilizing the services of the normal channels of trade as farmers have for wanting cotton shippers to appreciate the need for production adjustment.

IV. THIRD QUESTION: SHOULD THE REQUIRED ADDITIONAL FUNDS BE OBTAINED PRIMARILY THROUGH THE FEDERAL TREASURY OR THE MARKET PLACE?

A. The main choice

If you should agree that the considerations which have been enumerated constitute the basic needs and desirable requirements of new additions to the farm program, it would not be difficult for you to find by a process of elimination the best alternative for financing their attainment. There are two main sources from which increased farm income may be obtained, namely, through either increased appropriations from the Federal Treasury or improved prices in the domestic market place. To be sure, these two main alternatives are somewhat interrelated rather than mutually exclusive. Most plans which call for increased appropriations would also bring about an increased income from the market place through the use of appropriated funds for strengthened production adjustment; and several of the plans that have been proposed for increasing the income of farmers from the domestic market would ultimately require an increase in appropriations. Nevertheless, it is useful in approaching the general problem to begin by classifying the various proposals for increasing farm income into two groups, depending on whether principal reliance would be placed upon the Federal Treasury or the domestic market place as the source of funds.

B. General superiority of improved prices over increased appropriations as the principal source of funds

Increased appropriations from the Federal Treasury are obviously the only available means for meeting certain needed additions to the farm program such as, for instance, increased surplus-product removal; and in order to meet the special requirements of certain crops which do not pass through a single processing or marketing channel so as to facilitate the administration of another alternative method of aid, increased appropriations must serve as the principal source for obtaining increased income. This means simply that no one method of financing additions to the farm program is well adapted to meet all needs.

In view of the fact that Federal appropriations provide the only practical means of financing some of the basic needs of agriculture, it would be in the public interest if those who decry the size of farm appropriations would go into the problems of agriculture far enough to acquaint themselves with the real situation.

They would soon learn the fact that farmers seldom request appropriations to fill any need for which there is an adequate substitute. They would not be long in recognizing the fact that the farm payments of the past 7 years have been made in ways which not only relieved untold suffering but also served in helping to bring about an increase in farm income of approximately $7 for each $1 of farm payments. They would also learn more about the great need for soil conservation. They would see clearly that the Nation probably never made an investment for the general welfare that has yielded greater returns than these farm payments. They would also acquaint themselves with the fact that the $3,000,000,000 of farm payments during the past 7 years have been inadequate to the extent of $12,000,000,000 in bringing parity income to farmers.

It is manifest that the appropriated funds now being expended for farm payements are yielding returns to the public welfare equal to several times the cost. It is also clear that some of the needs for additions to the farm program must be financed through appropriations; but it is not believed that appropriations should be chosen as the main alternative for bringing about a further increase in farm income. The vast majority of farmers desire that appropriations be employed to increase farm income only under conditions in which no well-adapted and self-financing alternative is available. Some farm critics apparently have given themselves a fantastic notion that the favorite dream of the American farmer is to see the Congress direct the Secretary of Agriculture to sit astride the Federal Treasury and use the Great Dipper to ladle out tons of cash. It would be difficult to imagine anything more unjust or more remote from fact. Farmers deeply believe in the necessity for economy in the affairs of government. A typical farmer does not seek governmental payments except when he considers it the last resort and when he is acting under the compulsion of dire need. Nevertheless, some persons, with an ignorance protected by bulwarks of economic security, and who have never shared with farmers the bitter flavors of privation, seem to take delight in indulging themselves in the convenient cynicism with which all recipients of governmental payments may be tagged as unconscionable Treasury raiders.

The inadequacy of appropriations as the principal source of funds for needed additions to the farm program is not merely a temporary condition that arises at this time on account of special budgetary problems or special needs for national defense. The inadequacy of direct appropriations as the main source of funds is attributable to a more fundamental and permanent phenomenon. It goes back to the deep-rooted feeling of people generally against grants of aid appropriated from a public treasury. The practical reflection of this feeling is that the people generally seem willing to meet a need for, let us say, $2 of governmental aid with a measure that will provide an increase of $2 in selling price; but as an alternative they would be reluctant to support an appropriation of more than $1 from a public treasury to meet the same need. Industry has long been aware of this basic fact. Manufacturers have sought and obtained great amounts of public aid. They were successful in doing so, primarily because they turned away from the alternative of appropriations and sought their grants of public aid in the market place through such arrangements for increasing selling prices as tariffs, quotas, and franchises. This fact is so important that it is worth putting another way: People generally tend to look upon public aid in the form of appropriations as relief grants, and it is expecting too much of human nature to assume that appropriations can be made which would be considered in part relief grants and which would be large enough to do much more than help the recipients keep their chins above the water.

The history of practically all governments demonstrates that prosperity is sometimes legislated but seldom appropriated. In advocating a self-supporting method for financing new additions to the farm program, Secretary Wallace has drawn the attention of farmers to the fact that "the appropriation route, as compared with increased prices, is the hard and disappointing way. * * * This practical situation determines the result to such a great extent that it is impossible to believe that farmers are going to have a fair and equitable share of the national income so long as they are handicapped, as compared to industry, by being obliged to receive increases in their income primarily through appropriations rather than through improved prices. This in no way, however, lessens the importance of appropriations in the absence of other means of increasing farm income.

In addition to the inadequacy of appropriations as the principal means of financing needed additions to the farm program, careful consideration should also be given to the uncertainty of appropriations, to which a reference has already been made. It would hardly seem fair, after having granted industry and labor protective measures of a permanent nature, to oblige agriculture to rely primarily upon greatly enlarged appropriations for increased income, and thus place farmers in an especially vulnerable position because of the uncertainty that increased appropriations of public funds would be maintained under changing conditions.

C. Conclusions on improved prices and increased appropriations as sources of funds

To summarize, certain generalizations can be drawn with respect to the main choice which must be made between increased appropriations and improved prices as the principal method of financing needed additions to the farm program. In the first place, the current appropriations are greatly needed, and they yield returns equal to several times their cost. In the second place, there are certain needed additions to the farm program for which increased appropriations provide the only practical source of funds. In the third place, the special circumstances with respect to certain crops, especially those which do not pass through a single manufacturing or marketing channel so as to facilitate the administration of other alternatives, give rise to requirements that must be met through appropriations. And in the fourth place, if agriculture is to obtain a more nearly fair and equitable share of the national income it will be necessary to look to the market place as the principal source of funds for needed additions to the farm program, because it is impossible to expect to obtain appropriations that would be adequate in either amount or permanency.

V. FOURTH QUESTION: HOW SHOULD THE REQUIRED ADDITIONAL FUNDS BE OBTAINED THROUGH THE MARKET PLACE?

If you recognize that legislatures have an effective preference for increasing selling prices rather than taxes, you will probably agree that in order to obtain a more nearly fair and equitable share of the national income, agriculture is obliged to turn to the market place rather than to the Federal Treasury. A very considerable number of different plans have been proposed by various groups for financing needed improvements to the farm program through the market place. For the purpose of making a comparative analysis of these proposals it is useful to classify them into three principal groupings depending on whether they would place principal reliance upon (a) fixing prices at higher levels by governmental decree, or (b) increasing commodity loan rates, or (c) applying the principle of marketing certificates.

A. First alternative: Fix prices at higher levels by governmental decree

Price-fixing proposals are numerous and variable, and they enjoy considerable support. Some of them are called cost of production plans because they would utilize some so-called cost of production, rather than parity price or parity income, as the standard at which minimum selling prices would be fixed by the Government. One incidental aspect of these proposals is rather interesting. The elusive term "cost of production" appears to have such a peculiar attractiveness that it finds much favor as a price standard even though under most definitions the amount of the cost would be somewhat less than parity. Fixed-price programs have the merit of seeking funds in the market place. But the price-fixing proposals that we have examined seem to have some major disabling characteristics.

(1) Invalid Theory for Sacrificing Production Adjustment

A typical price-fixing plan would (a) undertake to assure farmers a price equal to cost, or parity, on the portion of the crop to be consumed domestically and (b) disregard any arrangement for production adjustment. This sacrificing of production adjustment must rest on the assumed theory that, if a substantially fair price were received on the domestically consumed portion of a crop, the production for export would automatically take place in desirable proportions. That theory hardly seems valid. Except by rare accident, the production for export could not be expected to fall automatically at a practical and desirable level.

The chances are that the quantity produced for export would fall significantly above or below the mark. In either case serious difficulty would be encountered. If production were increased, soil depletion would be increased; and we should also find ourselves confronted with unmarketable surpluses, because it is no longer true that unlimited quantities of products can find a foreign market. In the end, this would give rise to a budgetary problem in taking care of the surplus. If the result should fall in the other direction, that is, if farmers should find it unprofitable to produce an excess over their share for the fixed-price domestic market, which surplus would have to be sold at low world prices, the program would cause an excessive and violent adjustment of production that would give rise to a vast amount of farm unemployment. We cannot make a drastic sacrifice of our foreign outlets. Agriculture is dependent to a very substantial extent on the foreign market. Occasionally we hear voiced the catch phrase, "the American market for the American farmer"; whereas, obviously, the American farmer needs more than the American market. It is also true that the American farmer does not need unmarketable surpluses.

Thus, it will be noted that we have in this invalid theory for sacrificing production adjustment, the first of two great dilemmas presented by price-fixing proposals. The chance is considerable that with fixed prices, and in the absence of production adjustment, we should find that we had either burdened ourselves with an unmarketable surplus or denied ourselves a greatly needed foreign market.

(2) Incentive for Government to Encroach on Business

The second major dilemma presented by price-fixing proposals is encountered upon considering the problem of administration. In order to enforce a governmental decree fixing minimum selling prices it might be necessary either for the Government to undertake a vast project for policing numberless transactions or to engage in the buying and selling, which functions are now performed in the normal channels of trade. In view of the fact that both of these alternatives should so obviously be avoided, it seems desirable to look for some means other than price fixing for obtaining the funds required for the needed additions to the farm program.

B. Second alternative: Adopt high commodity-loan rates

(1) Functions of Commodity Loans

A sound program of governmental commodity loans serves several basic and necessary purposes. Loan programs are necessary to meet the emergency that arises from an abnormal situation which otherwise would result in ruinously low prices. The exceptionally large crop of cotton in 1937 is a case in point. A farmer who is protected against the emergency of an abnormal crop by a program of commodity loans, and is also protected against the emergency of a subnormal yield by a crop-insurance program, finds himself in a well-protected position. The sudden disappearance of the demand for a large part of the 1939 tobacco crop, upon the withdrawal of foreign buyers from the domestic market last fall, is an example of a situation in which commodity loans may be used to protect farmers against what would otherwise be ruinously low prices as a consequence of temporary decreases in demand. A commodity-loan program is also useful in obtaining the important advantages of an ever-normal granary.

(2) Collateral Plans Required for Financially Successful Commodity-Loan Programs

In order to avoid sacrificing foreign outlets and accumulating unmarketable surpluses, it is obviously necessary that a commodity-loan program on an export crop, whenever the loan rates are in excess of world prices, be accompanied by some form of an export subsidy. It is also obvious that a financially successful commodity-loan program must be supported by adequate production adjustment. The experience of the Federal Farm Board demonstrated rather emphatically that a commodity-loan program will inevitably be swamped by continued excessive production. With these required collateral programs in mind, let us turn to a consideration of the problems of high commodity-loan rates.

(3) Problems of High Commodity Loan Rates

Export subsidies, which are required in connection with commodity-loan rates in excess of world prices, can soon encounter budgetary difficulties. The higher the commodity-loan rates, the greater the funds required for export subsidies. These requirements can mount rapidly. For example, let us assume that a loan rate equal to parity price were adopted for cotton. That would mean that the Government would be in a potential position to acquire a crop of 12,000,000 bales of cotton at a price of approximately 16 cents per pound. Assume further that an export price as low as 8 cents per pound might be required in order to obtain our normal share of the world trade in cotton. The appropriation that would be required to meet a loss of 8 cents per pound on 6,000,000 bales of cotton would be approximately $240,000,000.

The high export subsidies that must accompany a program of high commodity-loan rates might also tend to hamper the trade-agreements program in reopening foreign markets. Unnecessary, long-continued, and high-export subsidies would hardly be in consonance with the principles on which the trade-agreements program rests. It is believed that the payment of large export subsidies should be confined, as it has been, to circumstances in which there is no other practical resort. It was made clear at the time export subsidies were adopted for cotton that their use was intended only to meet an emergency such as we faced at that time. From this standpoint it might be better to adopt some method other than high loans for obtaining an adequate price from the domestic market, and to use the funds that would otherwise be required for export subsidy payments under a high loan program, to make increased payments to farmers for needed additional soil conservation and production adjustment.

A program of high commodity-loan rates not only might tend to give rise to budgetary and foreign trade problems but also might have a tendency, after a certain point, to impinge upon production adjustment and soil conservation. If a high price-pegging program were to be successful, production would have to be decreased and domestic prices thereby advanced to a point that would permit liquidation of the loans without loss. These higher domestic prices, however, which could be brought about at least temporarily through high price-pegging loans, might tend to encourage increased production, and withdrawals from the soil conservation and production-adjustment program, by those who would find irresistable the incentive to forego Government payments in order to produce and market a surplus to take advantage of the greatly increased market prices. But this, in turn, would tend to defeat the loan program by placing a large supply on the market which would drive down prices and thereby make it impossible to liquidate the loans without incurring large losses. Thus, what had started out to be a high-loan program, might have been converted into simply a system of increased governmental payments, through the appropriations that would be required to cover the loan losses; and in the meantime, it might also have impaired the programs for production adjustment and soil conservation.

Some of the advocates of high commodity-loan rates contend that marketing quotas could be used to avoid the increased production that might otherwise accompany and ultimately destroy both a high-loan and production-adjustment program. It may be possible that marketing quotas in the case of a crop like cotton could withstand the stress of high loan rates for at least a short time, but there is at least some doubt that it could be continued indefinitely. Moreover, it seems clear that the high loan approach has no advantage over all other alternatives, except that it alone is readily available, that would justify subjecting farmers to the great hazard that the collapse of a system of high loan rates would entail.

A program of high commodity-loan rates, if continued for any length of time, might also have a potential tendency to cause an encroachment of government on business. Cotton shippers are exceedingly aware of this possible hazard to their trade. The foreboding nightmare that you cotton shippers conjure when you contemplate the possibility of a high loan rate on cotton seems to have a full quota of ghosts, but it cannot be contended that there is not at least some basis for your fears. When the question of a parity-loan rate on cotton is raised, you allege that the Government would be buying the cotton rather than making a loan. You assert that one of your functions disappears when the Government classes the cotton in the process of preparing it to go under loan; that when the loan is made the cotton has been bought, and your buying function has disappeared; that after the loan has been made, the Government will be obliged to store the cotton, and take the risk of loss, so that your holding function has disappeared; and, finally, that if the loan is not repaid, title to the cotton will fall into the hands of the Government, and it may be sold directly to manufacturers so that there would no longer be any need for you to perform the function of selling. Then you summarize the situation by observing that practically all your functions would have disappeared, and that the cotton trade, despite its efficiency and value, would have been supplanted. Although the developments under a high loan program most probably would not be anything like you are inclined to fear, it is not difficult to understand why you assume that a program of high loan rates on cotton would have a definite tendency to cause an encroachment of government on your business.

To recapitulate, it seems clear that this second alternative of adopting high commodity-loan rates, in order to finance the needed additions to the farm program, is open to several serious doubts. It might tend to cause budgetary difficulties, to obstruct progress under the trade-agreements program, to impinge upon strengthened production adjustment and increased soil conservation, and to bring about an encroachment of government on established business and the normal channels of trade. Nevertheless, in the absence of other alternatives, higher loan rates might be found necessary.

C. Third alternative: Apply the principle of marketing certificates

At last, with the somewhat lengthy background having been covered, we are prepared to substantiate the statement made in the beginning that the program which Secretary Wallace is advocating, namely, marketing certificates, would meet best not only the needs of agriculture but also the need for utilizing the services of cotton shippers. Let us begin by describing the marketing-certificate program briefly.

(1) Description of the Marketing-Certificate Program

A marketing-certificate program is essentially a simplified method that could be conveniently administered for achieving the economic advantages of a system of processing taxes without making taxes and appropriations necessary. It would consist of—

(a) Distribution to farmers

First, allotting marketing certificates to farmers who participate in production adjustment and soil conservation under the farm program in such amounts and having such values as would be necessary to cover their allotted normal production and assure them an income equivalent to parity price on the domestically consumed portions of their crops.

(b) Requirement of manufacturers and importers

Second, requiring manufacturers and importers, upon the sale of finished products, to acquire certificates in amounts which would assure a market for the entire supply, and return them to the Government. Manufacturers would be granted an exemption from certificates on sales for export.

(c) Revolving pool to facilitate the purchase and sale of certificates

Third, establishing a governmental revolving pool to purchase certificates from farmers and sell them to manufacturers whenever necessary in order not only to maintain the market price of the certificates at their face values but also to make buying and selling certificates convenient operations and to assure that an adequate supply of certificates would be available for the needs of manufacturers and importers at all times.

(d) Legal nature of the certificate requirement

There is a fundamental legal difference between a marketing-certificate program and a processing-tax program. Under a marketing-certificate program no tax would be levied and no tax proceeds would be appropriated; the program would be based on the power of the Congress to regulate commerce.

(e) Adaptability of the marketing-certificate program to various crops

A marketing-certificate program would be readily adaptable to those products which must be passed through centralized manufacturing or marketing processes in order to prepare and deliver a large majority of the crop for ultimate consumption. As illustrations, such crops would include cotton, peanuts, prunes, raisins, rice, tobacco, and wheat.

(2) Superiority of the Marketing Certificate Program

For those needs and crops to which it is adapted the superiority of marketing certificates, as compared with the other classes of possibilities that have been discussed, may be summarized as follows:

(a) More nearly adequate income for farmers

The marketing certificate program would promise to accomplish more than any of the other alternatives as the principal method for bringing about a fair participation of agriculture in the national income, because it would constitute the most practical arrangement for obtaining the additional income through the market place. It is evident that there is little likelihood of obtaining even temporarily a commensurate amount of income through increased appropriations. It also seems probable that neither a system of price fixing nor a program of high loans, in view of their inherent weaknesses and vulnerability, could be expected to provide as much income for farmers over even a brief period of a few years as could be obtained through the marketing-certificate program.

(b) More permanent source of farm income

A marketing certificate program would give agriculture a more dependable and permanent form of financing than the other alternatives, and one that would be more nearly comparable to those now enjoyed by industry through such devices as tariffs, quotas, and franchises. Obviously increased appropriations are not a dependable and permanent form of financing; this is also true of price fixing and high-loan programs because, as the analysis has shown, they both possess inherent characteristics that might tend to generate forces of self-destruction.

(c) Greater contribution to production adjustment and soil conservation

The marketing-certificate program would contribute more than any of the other groups of possibilities toward strengthening production adjustment and increasing soil conservation. In view of the fact that the additional funds which could be expected through increased appropriations would be considerably less than the increased income that could be derived through marketing certificates, it is clear that the greater value of the certificates, as compared with any possible increase in appropriations, would serve as a stronger incentive to adjust production and conserve the soil. It has already been pointed out that price-fixing proposals and after a certain point high-loan programs might tend to reduce rather than increase the incentives for production adjustment and soil conservation.

(d) Less burden on the Budget and public debt

The marketing certificate program is obviously superior to the other possibilities from the standpoint of budgetary and public-debt considerations, since it would not require appropriations. The fact has already been mentioned that there is reason to believe that either a price-fixing program or a high-loan program might give rise to budgetary difficulties.

(e) Less burden on foreign trade

The marketing-certificate program would avoid the danger of impairing the trade-agreements program, which would be inherent in the use of export subsidies over a long period, as would be necessary in conjunction with a high-loan program.

(f) Less accumulation of surplus stocks

The marketing-certificates program would avoid the accumulation of unmarketable surpluses which would be a definite possibility under a program of either fixed prices or high loan rates.

(g) Less encouragement of competitive products

The marketing-certificate program can be so designed as largely to avoid the practically inescapable disadvantage under a system of high loans or fixed prices of impairing slightly the competitive position of cotton with other products. It would be a relatively simple matter to accompany a marketing-certificate program with a set of partial or complete exemptions from the certificate requirement with respect to those manufactured products which compete most strongly with other articles on the basis of the cost of raw material, but there seems to be no practical way of applying the principle of exemptions in connection with either a fixed price or a high-loan program; and it would probably be exceedingly difficult, if not impossible, to establish a fully equivalent system of compensating taxes on competitive products in conjunction with a fixed-price or high-loan program. Briefly, in conjunction with the marketing-certificate program there may be both exemptions and compensating taxes, whereas only the latter are well adapted for use in connection with fixed-price and high-loan programs.

(h) Less interference with the normal channels of trade

The marketing-certificate program would be superior to either a fixed-price program or a system of high loan rates in that it would not increase the investment per unit in privately owned inventories. Manufacturers would not need to purchase the certificates until the finished products were sold. The marketing-certificate program would also tend to keep inventories out of the hands of the Government and in the normal channels of trade, and thus also facilitate and stimulate increased marketing. The marketing-certificate program would also avoid causing inverted prices on futures contracts for commodities, which make it impossible under a system of high loan rates—and most probably a price-fixing program would have the same effect—for manufacturers and dealers to hedge their risks on the exchanges and carry full inventories.

(3) Invalid Objections to the Marketing-Certificate Program

Apparently the objections one may find to the marketing-certificate plan may be reduced to two principal contentions. One relates to competitive products and the other to prices to consumers. It is believed that they are both invalid.

(a) The contention about competitive products

Let us examine first the contention that the seeking of increased farm income through the market place, rather than through increased appropriations from the Federal Treasury, would seriously impair the position of cotton products in competition with other articles.

Both our technical studies and actual experience when the former processing taxes were in effect, show that this objection is not so important as it might seem on first sight. It is largely one of those alarmist arguments that is more impressive than real. The competition among many products is primarily based not on small differences in their raw-material costs, but on greater differences in the degree of their physical adaptability for certain uses. For instance, if a woman should desire the sheen of a synthetic fiber in a dress, she could hardly be expected to shift her purchase to a cotton dress for the sole reason that the marketing-certificate program had not added 3 cents to the cost of the cotton in the dress. If it should be found that for some industrial purpose a new synthetic fiber had considerably more resistance than cotton to heat, friction, or tension, that factor, and not a few cents difference in the cost of cotton, would probably determine which product would be used.

Moreover, the raw-material cost represents an especially small part of the price of products manufactured from such major commodities as cotton, with a result that an adoption of the certificate program would not increase the cost of stockings a cent a pair and would not add more than a fraction of a nickel to such items as dresses, shirts, underwear, or bath towels. The marketing-certificate program would increase the cost of raw material, but it should be borne in mind that the total cost of the raw material represented in the price of such typical articles manufactured from cotton does not account for one-fifth of the total price paid by consumers. Consequently, the consumption of such manufactured articles fluctuates primarily with changes in industrial activity and the general purchasing power of the country rather than in response to variations in the relatively low cost of the raw material.

It seems clear that the only really appreciable effect that the marketing-certificate program might have on cotton would be with respect to coarse, low-grade products, such as bagging and toweling, that compete with those jute and paper products for which the cost of raw material is a substantial item. Whatever merit there may have been originally in this contention against the marketing-certificate program would seem to have disappeared, because exemptions from the certificate requirement would be granted on those coarse cotton products which encounter some competition from paper and jute.

This whole problem is primarily a matter of choosing among alternatives. It should be observed that the competing alternatives of fixed prices and high loan rates, rather than the marketing-certificate program, are the proposals to which should be attached whatever minor merit this competitive product complaint might possess. Finally, it may be pointed out that even if this objection were applicable to the marketing-certificate program, it would only mean that, as with all endeavor, it might be necessary to incur at least a little cost in order to obtain a much greater increase in income.

(b) The contention about prices to consumers

The other principal contention against the marketing-certificate program is that it would be better to seek increased farm income exclusively through enlarged appropriations in order to avoid any increase in the prices of manufactured products to consumers. This objection would, of course, apply equally to a program of fixed prices or high loans. The answers to the objection are rather overwhelming. The contention holds in effect that in their search for equitable income farmers are to be confined to the single alternative of enlarged appropriations. Substantially increased appropriations either could or could not be obtained; but in either event agriculture could not entirely welcome the ultimate result. If the enlarged appropriations could not be obtained—which seems to be quite clearly the case—the position of those who voice this argument would mean that agriculture, having been prohibited from utilizing any of the alternatives for seeking an increased income through the market place, would be permanently assigned a terrifically deficient share of the national income, with the consequence that American farmers would find themselves practically relegated into the position of a peasant class. If the increase in appropriations could be attained, agriculture would find that its position had been pushed over into a category which had the tinge of a relief load. No one who is acquainted with the fair-mindedness of the Congress could believe for a moment that any such things are going to happen. There is good reason to believe that the unrealistic and unjust position that would force them is not going to be sustained, and that in the end farmers will be enabled, as have been manufacturers, to obtain a reasonable income primarily through the market place.

Let us look still further into this objection. In the first place, it will become obvious to anyone who examines the situation that agriculture is receiving a seriously deficient share in the national income. The average income of all consumers in the United States is considerably greater than the average income of all farmers. Likewise, some of the lowest nonfarm-income groups, for instance, workers on urban relief projects, enjoy incomes appreciably greater than some of the low-income farm groups, such as sharecroppers and tenants. In addition, it is difficult to understand how a cotton spinner who pays his employees a minimum of 30 cents per man-hour could consider it fair to take the position that the farmers who produce the cotton itself should not receive for their labor an income equal to even half that much. In the second place, in view of the fact that agriculture's income must be increased in order that farmers may have a fair participation in the national income, and since the way is not open to the greatly enlarged appropriations that would be required to bring this about, those who insist upon that alternative or nothing are in effect taking the position that it is better for consumers not to pay fair prices than it is for farmers to receive fair prices.

Such persons do not voice the feelings of consumers. They would have you believe that consumers are a special underprivileged group with an unsympathetic and unreasonable attitude toward the plight of farmers. A more misleading impression could hardly be given. Consumers are not a sick and irascible minority; they are all of us; and they are not unfair. In fact, it is practically impossible to find a consumer in the United States who would knowingly object to paying a price that would give producers a fair return. The same persons contend that under the marketing-certificate program consumers would be asked to subsidize farmers. It hardly seems fair to complain that farmers are being subsidized when the truth is that farmers are not receiving, even including Government payments, a fair income or a fair price, and that while this condition remains uncorrected the actual situation is that consumers are being subsidized by farmers.

VI. CONCLUSIONS

The farm program has accomplished a great deal for the benefit of agriculture and the national welfare during its first 7 years. It forms a sound foundation for both agricultural and industrial security that will endure through the years. At the present time, certain additions to the farm program are needed. There is need for increased farm income, for more security of farm income, for strengthened production adjustment and increased soil conservation, and for utilizing the services of the normal channels of trade. These needs cannot be met by the route of increased appropriations, and upon turning to the market place as the principal source of increased funds, we find three principal groups of alternatives, namely, fixed prices, high loans, and marketing certificates. Of these, fixed prices and high loans hold the least promise for farmers and they might tend to cause an encroachment of government on business. The marketing-certificate program, in addition to possessing several special advantages over the other alternatives, seems to be the definitely superior choice from the standpoint of meeting most adequately the basic needs for additions to the farm program.

Resolution of Iowa State Convention of Spanish-American War Veterans

OF

HON. ROBERT K. GOODWIN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 8, 1940

ARTICLE FROM CEDAR RAPIDS (IOWA) GAZETTE

Mr. GOODWIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include therein an article appearing in the Cedar Rapids Gazette of June 18, 1940, covering the Iowa State Convention of Spanish-American War Veterans. Included in this story is a set of resolutions which they have passed. The article is as follows:

A resolution calling for adequate defense of the Western Hemisphere, but condemning the "spilling of the blood of a single American boy on European soil" as endangering our own democratic form of government, was passed by the Iowa Department of the United Spanish War Veterans in session Tuesday at the Memorial Coliseum, with only two negative votes recorded.

The convention officially went on record as opposing intervention in Europe, citing the Monroe Doctrine which forbids European intervention in America. A copy of the resolution is to be forwarded to President Roosevelt.

The anti-intervention resolution was drawn up by H. M. Havner, of Des Moines, and Elmer Johnson, of Cedar Rapids. It was introduced by Hugh L. Stephenson, of Sioux City, chairman of the resolutions committee. Its text is as follows:

"Whereas it has been the fixed policy of the United States to avoid all entangling European alliances since the time of the delivery of President Washington's Farewell Address; and

"Whereas this country is committed to an insistence upon the observance of the Monroe Doctrine, which means that all European nations must leave the control of the Western Hemisphere to the protection of the United States; and

"Whereas we participated in the World War upon the understanding that it would end all wars and make the world safe for democracy; and

"Whereas Europe is now engaged in another and greater war than the former World War, and the existence of democratic government is in greater danger than at any time since the establishment of such government; and

"Whereas if the United States insists upon the enforcement of the Monroe Doctrine we would, under the same rule, have no right to interfere in European affairs, but should leave the settlement of the disputes in Europe to the Europeans; and

"Whereas it is our firm belief that an intervention in the present European conflict would endanger our own democratic form of government: Therefore be it

"Resolved, That we hereby declare ourselves in favor of an adequate defense program and such preparedness as will enable us fully to enforce the Monroe Doctrine, and we hereby volunteer our services to the full extent of our ability to carry forward such a program, but we hereby state we are opposed to the spilling of the blood of a single American boy on European soil;

"Resolved further, That we hereby respectfully petition the President and Congress of the United States to at this time avoid any character of intervention in any European controversy which will directly or indirectly involve the United States in any armed military or naval conflict with any European nation."

Independence Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRED BRADLEY

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 8, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. FRED BRADLEY, OF MICHIGAN

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I ask to have printed a speech which I delivered in Rudyard, Mich., in my district, on the Fourth of July.

Mr. Chairman and fellow citizens of Chippewa County, I am indeed glad that, due to a recess in Congress for the balance of the week, I find it possible to join you for a short while today. You can well imagine the tremendously important problems with which we have been wrestling and the strain under which we have been in Washington for the past few months. That is our duty, and that duty we will not shirk. The Congress should remain in session until this international crisis has passed. The Congress should not adjourn to come home and campaign for votes. It must remain in session ready to cope with the ever-new problems arising out of the rapidly changing European and world situation. You, the people, have put your trust in us. We must not fail your trust. One hundred and sixty-four years ago today our forefathers declared their independence from tyranny and oppression. Today the entire world may become oppressed by tyranny and dictatorship. One hundred and sixty-four years ago today we threw off the yoke of collectivism and overgovernment. One hundred and sixty-four years ago today we proclaimed our independence from class hatred and caste hatred, and we ordained that henceforth self-initiative and self-determination, with equal opportunity and freedom of worship, freedom of speech, and freedom of press should guide our destiny. Today we must guard that destiny.

Let us, then, take stock of ourselves. Let us, then, see where we are today heading.

In 1776, and for the next 40 years, roughly, we learned that stout hearts and strong wills, honest endeavor, and strong muscles could protect this land against the might and power of Europe. We won our Revolution from the tyranny of the Kings of England because we were mentally alert and were morally strong and because we were physically strong. We had little else in the way of preparedness, but our adversary had a mighty ocean to cross with men and a mighty ocean to cross with material to supply those men on the battlefields.

In the War of 1812 we found that the same problems and same strength prevailed in our favor. Have we that same stock and fiber left in this Nation today? Particularly in the light of world events? Particularly in the light of modern mechanized warfare which has in such ruthless fashion trampled under the heel of the invading dictators, the democracies of Europe? History will never record a more valiant stand against overwhelming odds than that of brave, honest Finland, even a vanquished Finland, who even 2 weeks ago insisted on paying its last war-debt installment, even when reminded that Uncle Sam was willing to pass it up. When has history recorded a nation with such international integrity, honesty, and bravery?

Down in Washington, from such information as is made available to us, and I hope it is more accurate information than sometimes comes to the public at large through the newspapers, over the radios, and from other means of communication, we learn that this Nation is woefully unprepared should it be called upon to face the armies of the European dictators on an equal basis and on their battlegrounds. For example, we know that the valiant English Army which went into Norway, abandoned on the battlefields of Norway more arms, ammunition, cannon and aircraft than we have in the entire United States Army and National Guard today. We are told that in the debacle of Flanders, the English and French lost more men than we have in our standing Army today. I hope to tell you, 1,325,000 men (per London press). We know, further, that we are more inadequately prepared to send men or equipment to Europe today than we were in 1917, to fight on a comparable basis with the warfare now raging abroad. Therefore I think it behooves us to take stock of ourselves here at home.

First of all let us look to our physical well-being. Are we today, as a people, physically comparable to our forefathers? Have we the moral courage and the physical strength of our forefathers who hewed the pine of this country and who brought therefrom this wonderful farmland that we see about us here today? Have we today the moral courage, have we the physical fiber to face the hardships of the Revolutionary period without flinching? Or have we become a Nation of puddle ducks?

Do you know what a puddle duck is? He is a little duck who found himself a friendly puddle with plenty to eat, fed to him daily, and no one to disturb him. Therefore he soon found that he did not have to fly out across country in search of food. And so he took fewer and fewer trips abroad, and finally ended up with wings that would carry him no further. As his little ducks came along and joined the family their wings grew weaker and weaker and finally they were contented to stick in their own back yard in their own little puddle, until one day along came a drouth and their food supply dried up and lo and behold they perished because they had not the strength to fly afield to search for the staff of life.

Have we as a Nation then, because of a paternalistic philosophy of government, which is stifling self-initiative, become a nation of puddle ducks? Have we become a nation that has grown so soft that it seeks not its own food but instead looks to a great father in Washington to supply him? Have we become a nation that looks forward to nothing more than a bounty to be doled out by some Government bureaucrat? Or, have we as a nation still within our hearts the moral courage and in our bodies the physical strength in these critical days to think for ourselves and act for ourselves and to fight for the traditions which we hold dear and which has made this the greatest Nation on earth?

I personally feel that the American people are at last awake to their danger. I personally feel that the American people realize that if we, the last great democracy is to survive, we must arouse ourselves, we must prepare ourselves. Our greatest danger is not from without, it is from within ourselves. By that, I do not refer to any "fifth column" excepting one. I refer to the "fifth column" in our own mind. If we will arouse ourselves from the lethargy, if we will awaken ourselves to the danger besetting us, if we will restore to this land our moral courage and our physical strength, if we will return to private initiative, if we will return to clear thinking, then America need fear no danger from without nor Trojan horses from within.

Let not yourselves be troubled by the same propaganda which beset this Nation in 1916. America must prepare itself against any foreign invasion. We should be strong enough to have our word respected to the ends of the earth. That is what Congress and the White House is now embarked upon. That will be done as quickly as possible. But do not mistake me when I tell you why it is physically impossible for this Nation, mechanically and industrially great as it is, to get ready to fight a modern day European battle on any other than American shores in less than 2 years. That is the word of our Army General Staff. That is the opinion of our leading industrialists. However, mistake me not, when I say that there is no European nation nor combination of nations strong enough at this moment to overwhelm America on our shores. You veterans in the crowd, well recall the difficulties that this, the greatest industrial nation on the earth, had to supply matériel to our forces in Europe in 1917. Do you for one moment believe that any European nation coming to America would have any less difficulty than we had? Our present danger, however, in this hemisphere is far greater from infiltration and so-called "fifth-column" efforts in Central and South America than it is by any frontal attack. This will be our greatest problem with which to cope when the European conflagration has burnt itself out. And when the democracies might all be subdued, I should not be at all surprised to see a gigantic struggle among the dictators—like a flock of wolves after the spoils.

But I did not intend to go into that international situation today. I started out to confine my speech to ourselves and this being Independence Day—our national birthday—I want to go back into history and I want to talk with you about the Father of our Nation and some advice which he left for us.

Today it is fitting that we should derive fresh inspiration and hope from the life and character of George Washington. From every and any angle his versatility furnishes us an example for emulation. Whether in war or peace, whether as soldier or statesman, whether as businessman or country gentleman, whether as engineer or President, banker or realtor, or any other of the relationships of his many-sided life—in all spheres of which he was most proficient—this generation, whatever our occupation or profession may look to him to guide us and our country in the right way. Because, after all, and I quote this:

"A people is but the attempt of many
To rise to the completer life of one;
And those who live as models for the mass
Are singly more value than they all."

Therefore, and I quote:

"Keep but the model safe;
New men will rise to study it."

Now while we are in the midst of this great world crisis, let us remember that mere politics of the kind that deals only with the ponderables of the situation, is impotent to solve our problems. But that brand of politics from which our first President bore the imprint, was the essence of true statesmanship which took into account the imponderables—that is the spirit of this American Republic. These offer a solution for they were based upon eternal verities, for those were the true principles which our founding fathers chose in the light of mankind's experience in the quest for a stable government of the people. Today, knocking at the very gateway and citadel of the birthplace of freedom, there is a vast military machine seeking to overthrow Christian civilization, the heritage of liberty, and to establish upon their ruins the iron rule of dictatorship. Yet, thank God, there stands in the Harbor of New York, the statue of the Goddess of Liberty. There stands the symbol of a still valient and courageous liberty-loving people with this challenge:

"My name is Liberty
From out a mighty land
I face the ancient sea.
I lift to God my hand;
By day in Heaven's light,
A pillar of fire by night.
At ocean's gate I stand
Nor bend the knee."

My friends, upon what has the foundations of this Nation really rested? Has it not rested upon the Bill of Rights? And yet today, in these critical times, that Bill of Rights is challenged. It is not challenged by those of us who have in our hearts and in our actions a love for America, but it is challenged by a small minority numerically, and far smaller minority mentally by a clique of people whom we have recently come to call the "fifth columnists" or the Trojan horses. But let me say this word about that question. Let no one assume for 1 minute that these Trojan horses are all aliens. We love our loyal aliens. America has always been the beacon light of freedom to aliens from every land on the face of the earth, and praise God it always will remain so. But we have the right to expect that when these aliens come to our shores seeking our protection, seeking the freedom that this Nation alone today can offer them, we have the right to expect that they should live as we want them to live, and as they came over here to live, in accord with our ideals and traditions. When those do not suffice, when they do not like the American way of living, when they are perhaps disappointed in what they found in this country, then, please Heaven, give them the strength to go back where they came from because America does not want them.

But again I say to you, remember this, that America loves, America welcomes, America treasures all those aliens who come here unashamed and unafraid, who want to become one of us and we shall ever welcome them to the bosom of our hearts. May I remind you right now that this past week in Washington there was enacted into law a bill which recently passed both Houses of Congress, practically unanimously, directing the Department of Justice to fingerprint every alien in the United States. Those of you in this audience, who may be aliens, please fear not that act. You have nothing to fear if you came into this country legally and if you have lived honestly and as we asked you to live since you came here. That bill was passed as much for your protection as for ours. I am proud to say that I have my own and my wife's fingerprints in the F. B. I. files in Washington. And I have told all of my friends who have visited me in Washington to go down there and to have the pleasure of going through that remarkable institution and to put their fingerprints on record. It is one of the greatest protections you can have to guard your civil liberties and your civil rights in this country.

I wish that every American citizen and everybody within the protection of these United States could have his fingerprints on file. In many, many cases it has proven of tremendous value to countless numbers of individuals. And I speak not of the criminal cases when I say that; I speak of cases where there have been accidents and the fingerprints have been the only known method of identification. While I am on this subject, let me tell you about the case of a man who was kidnaped, who, while in the hands of the kidnapers and realizing that his fingerprints were on file, took advantage of every possible opportunity to leave his fingerprints behind doors, under tables, under chairs, and so forth, and after the prisoner was turned free and the criminals were finally apprehended it was possible for the Federal Bureau agents to trace every movement of the criminals by his own fingerprints, and a perfect case against the abductors was possible, and they are presently of no menace to society.

So I say to you that all of us, whether citizens or aliens who are law abiding, should regard the fingerprinting of everyone in this Nation, aliens or citizens, as one of the greatest means of protection for ourselves by providing the means for the positive determination of criminals wherever and whenever they happen to appear. And it should be one of our best aids for combating espionage and sabotage. Incidentally, may I tell you this, that our Federal Bureau of Investigation in Washington formerly had working agreements with eighty-odd nations for the interchange of fingerprint information. We formerly fingerprinted aliens upon arrival in this country. If a criminal got out of a foreign country or was suspected of leaving, word and his fingerprints were broadcast throughout the nations of the world. When this alien arrived and was fingerprinted, of course, he was easily apprehended, and, as a known criminal, was placed in custody where he belonged. We stopped this practice in 1934 for some reason, and until recently we were the only nation on the face of the earth, to my knowledge, not fingerprinting aliens on their arrival. And consequently here for the past 6 years we have had no way of positively identifying any criminal who might seek a haven on these shores until they were actually caught committing a crime within this country.

And so, I say to you aliens who may be here, fear not this recently enacted law, because it was put on the statutes entirely for the protection of those whom we want to welcome and whom we want to become citizens of this country. And again may I say this further to you citizens who have not yet been fingerprinted, may I suggest in all sincerity that you take advantage, for your own protection, of our Federal Bureau, and at the earliest opportunity have your fingerprints taken by your nearest police authority and request that they be forwarded to Washington to be placed in the noncriminal files in the Federal Bureau of Investigation.

But again, I am getting somewhat beside my point. I want to return now to the Virginia Bill of Rights, the forerunner of our Declaration of Independence and I want to recount to you just one sentence from that historic document which reads as follows: "The blessings of liberty can only be preserved by a firm adherence to justice, moderation and temperance, frugality and virtue, and by frequent recurrence to fundamental principles." This was the thought and those were the principles which animated and motivated the founders of this Republic and upon such a foundation we should stand unswervingly against any enemies from without or any enemies from within seeking to undermine us.

Much of the world today is in the hands of a dictator. To this day we in this Nation have never had room for any dictator. Washington himself was tempted to become one. Do you know that a body of army officers attempted to make him a monarch. Those officers planned not only a mutiny of the Army but a coup d'etat in which they aimed to set up a monarchy. They wrote Washington about their intentions and expressed their belief that he would make an ideal monarch. To this offer Washington replied as follows, I quote him: "I must view with abhorance and reprehend with serverity. I am at a loss," he said, "to conceive what part of my conduct could have given encouragement to such an address which seems to me to be big with the greatest mischief that could befall our country."

"If I am not deceived in the knowledge of myself, you could not have found a person to whom your schemes are more disagreeable. Let me conjure you, then, if you have any regard for our country, concern for yourself, or respect for me, to banish these thoughts from your mind and never communicate as from yourself or anyone else a sentiment of like nature." That Washington wrote to one Col. Lewis Nichols and shortly afterward he wrote to Lafayette as follows: "There cannot, in my judgment, be the least danger that the President will by any practical intrigue ever be allowed to continue himself in office, much less perpetuate himself in it, but in the last stage of corrupted morals and political depravity; and even then, there is as much danger that any other species of domination would prevail. Though when a people shall become incapable of governing themselves, and fit for a master, it is of little consequence from what quarter it comes."

I am inclined to think that if Washington were alive today, he might perhaps be more specific and he might have changed that last sentence a bit to read as follows: "If the people are incapable of governing themselves, it makes no difference if their master be a Hitler, a Stalin, a Mussolini, or somebody else."

My friends of Chippewa County, this is a great Nation. We live under a great Constitution. Let us ever keep that Constitution. Grover Cleveland was a great President and here is how he spoke of that great Constitution of ours: "To us is delivered this ark of the people's covenant, and to us is given the duty to shield it from impious hands. It has been found sufficient in the past and it will be found sufficient in all the years to come, if the American people are true to their sacred trust."

So let me admonish you thus. Each of us here today is a receptacle of the faith of our fathers. In us, just as in a safety-deposit box, are the securities—security against tyranny, security of our persons and our property, security of our rights, and a due sense of our obligations. Let us therefore go forth from this meeting today with the example of Washington before us, holding fast to our priceless relics and resolved to "keep the securities of the faith intact" by adherence to the principles transmitted to us by Washington, by Cleveland, and by other men who established a great—this great American Republic.

In conclusion let me read to you what I consider one of the finest creeds written in our day. It is called I Am An American, written by Benjamin E. Neal:

"I am an American; the Golden Rule is my rule. In humility and with gratitude I acknowledge my undying debt to the founding fathers, who left me a priceless heritage which now is my responsibility. With steadfast loyalty I will uphold the Constitution and the Bill of Rights. I will treasure my birthright of American ideals; I will place moral integrity above worldy possessions. Problems of interest to my country shall be problems of interest to me. I will count my right of suffrage to be a sacred trust, and I will strive diligently to be worthy of that trust. I will give my full support to upright public servants. But those with unclean hands I will firmly oppose. Each obligation that comes to me as a true American I will discharge with honor. My heart is in America and America is in my heart. I am an American."

Monday, July 8, 1940

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, since the House is to have before it for consideration the first thing tomorrow, July 9, the problem of pollution, I want to take this means of answering some questions which have been put to me concerning the so-called Mundt amendment. Many Members have called my office or talked with me personally concerning the scope of this amendment, its significance, and the reasons why it is favored by all national conservation organizations and opposed by certain commercial or industrial interests. It shall be my purpose to review this situation candidly and fairly at this time, so Members who may have given only cursory study to the pollution problem and the attempts to abate it may be fully informed before the time comes to vote on this important matter tomorrow afternoon.

MUNDT AMENDMENT A COMPROMISE BETWEEN CONSERVATIONISTS AND POLLUTERS

Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of the Seventy-sixth Congress, two types of legislation dealing with pollution were introduced in Congress. One was the legislation from which S. 685 has evolved which appropriates money from the Public Treasury to study the pollution problem, to permit interstate compacts, to create a bureau to deal with the subject of pollution but which studiously and completely avoids setting up any restrictions or regulations to eliminate existing forms of pollution or to curtail or discourage new sources of pollution. It is purely and simply a study bill which was originally drawn to cost the taxpayers $1,000,000 per year for bureaucratic bounties, but which has since been amended to reduce these costs although it continues to be a bill which polluters themselves endorse and conservationists generally oppose because it does positively nothing to outlaw either existing pollution practices or new types and sources of pollution even when discharged into virgin streams. It is more of an anticontrol of pollution bill than an antipollution bill and was actually named by its sponsors, the Water Pollution Act, until its title was amended after the Mundt amendment was adopted on March 1 with the consent and support of the House committee in charge of the bill.

So much for the type of legislation represented by S. 685 before it was amended by this body. The other type of legislation has long had the support of such organizations as the Izaak Walton League of America, the National Audubon Societies, the American Wildlife Federation, the American Association for the Advancement of Science, and similar public-spirited groups and was introduced in the House during the present session of Congress by me. Known as the Mundt bill for pollution control, it was modified several times to meet objections raised at committee hearings and to develop a more gradual approach to the problem of eliminating pollution so that this public menace could be corrected by easy stages and in harmony with sound business practices. However, the polluters of America continued to cry "too drastic" in criticism of the pollution bill developed by the conservation organizations and to plead for a still more gradual approach to the problem of correcting the pollution evil.

Consequently, shortly before S. 685 first came before the House for a vote, a compromise formula was agreed upon between the forces of conservation in this country and the commercial interests who claimed that the correction of pollution would work an unfair hardship on them. The House Committee on Rivers and Harbors, which had previously made some amendments and improvements in S. 685 to the extent of taking out the "premium on pollution" which the bill in its original form actually carried, met with some of the supporters of the conservationists' antipollution bill and an area of agreement was reached. The so-called Mundt amendment embodied this area of agreement and was supported by the House Rivers and Harbors Committee when the bill came up for consideration on March 1. This compromise accepted the contentions of polluters arguing against legislation stopping existing forms of pollution and simply set up restrictions and restraints against the indiscriminate spread of pollution by the discharge of new sources and types of pollution to the extent that such pollution would be deleterious to the public interests. It is now found as section D, paragraphs 1 and 2 of S. 685 in the form in which it passed the House. Section D starts on page 17 of that bill.

JUST WHAT DOES THE MUNDT AMENDMENT ACTUALLY DO?

To the surprise and disappointment of conservation-minded Members of the House, certain determined polluters of American waters then switched their position from support of S. 685 to outright opposition to it because of the Mundt amendment. It thus became clear that the most persistent polluters in this country would favor no legislation which did not actually protect them in their practices even though, as in the case of the Mundt amendment, the approach to the correction of the evil was so gradual and rational that it prescribes no penalties and makes no restrictions against existing forms of pollution.

Much misunderstanding and much misinformation has been developed about the Mundt amendment. For the purpose of clarity, here is what this amendment actually does. It simply prescribes that "after date of enactment of this Act, no new sources of pollution, either by sewage or industrial waste, shall be permitted to be discharged into the navigable waters of the United States and streams tributary thereto until and unless approved by the Division (of Water Pollution Control set up in S. 685 itself)." It should be noted that the prohibitions against new sources of pollution apply only to sewage or industrial waste—there are no restrictions against purely incidental types of pollution, occasional pollution, farm wastes, et cetera.

There are no restrictions against the extension or expansion of existing types of pollution—the prohibitions apply only to new sources of pollution. Additional units of existing sewage lines, an expansion of plant facilities in polluting industries are not affected—the language of the amendment is so moderate that no restrictions could be made against pollution of any kind in any more reasonable terms unless the polluters' dream is to be realized and this body is to publicly and openly endorse all pollution practices and declare itself as favorable to the indiscriminate expansion of the pollution evil on all virgin streams and by all devices and systems as yet unknown to man. Ignoring the existing evils entirely, this amendment simply seeks to quarantine America against the spread of the pollution disease and to stop the problem from growing increasingly worse while it is being studied by the other provisions of S. 685. It seems obvious, that it is an inexcusable waste of the public money to provide funds and bureaus for studying the evil aspects of a problem until and unless Congress is ready to take some action to prevent the problem from becoming more and more impossible of solution.

MUNDT AMENDMENT CLEARLY DEFINED BY LAW

In addition to misinformation previously mentioned to the effect that this amendment would stop all new developments in city housing, plant expansions, and so forth, it has been erroneously argued that the amendment would affect every tiny stream or obscure creek in the country. The refutation of this argument is positive and authoritative; it comes from no less a source than the Supreme Court of the United States and from Major General Schley, Chief of Engineers of the War Department. The language "Navigable waters and streams tributary thereto" is used in other legislation conferring authority upon Government departments with regard to stream control for purposes of building bridges, constructing dikes, erecting piers, and other matters. It does not include every inlet which eventually flows into a navigable stream, but describes a well-recognized network of waterways with which the War Department now deals.

In a decision of the United States Supreme Court (21 Pickering 344 and the Montello Case (20 Wallace 430)) it was held:

> It is not to be understood, however, that every ditch or inlet in which the tide ebbs and flows, nor every small creek in which a fishing skiff or gunning canoe can be made to float at high water, is a navigable highway; but to give it the character of a navigable stream it must be generally and commonly useful to some purpose of trade or agriculture.

In fact, the War Department has an established tabulation of streams and rivers affected by the language of this amendment—it is indicated by a series of 507 photostats which I have in my possession, and which are available to every Member of Congress. This amendment does not convey a great undefined authority upon any department of Government, but simply sets up a basis for regulating and restraining new sources of pollution upon the acknowledged public water system of America.

Again the United States Supreme Court—the Daniel Ball case, 10 Wallace 557—held in another memorable decision:

> A river or other waterway that lies wholly within the limits of a State and has no navigable connection with any navigable waters outside the boundaries of the State is a navigable water of the State, subject to regulation and control by State laws, and does not come within the jurisdiction of Congress nor of the laws enacted by Congress for the preservation and protection of navigable waters of the United States. A river or other waterway constitutes a navigable water of the United States within the meaning of the aforesaid acts of Congress when it forms by itself or by uniting with other waters a continuous highway over which trade and travel is or may be conducted between the States themselves or between the States and foreign countries.

MUNDT AMENDMENT CONFERS NO UNREGULATED AUTHORITY

Thus the language of the amendment is clear and its purposes are obvious. It would simply prevent the indiscriminate extension of the pollution evil to the established public waters of America until and unless such pollution should be approved by the Bureau of Water Pollution Control or the Public Health Service. With such approval, secured upon the presentation of an adequate case showing the necessity for pollution or the fact that such pollution would be noninjurious to the public welfare, the pollution-producing project could go on. But without such approval the willful and unnecessary contamination of the public waters would be restrained. Surely no conservation-minded and welfare-serving Congress could do less than to take this cautious step toward the eventual correction of one of the most malodorous evils to plague America. Unless we are willing to take this single forward step we might as well surrender entirely to the polluters and deliver the streams of America to their nefarious and selfish purposes.

It is small wonder that among those who favor the Mundt amendment in S. 685 and oppose the passage of the bill without such amendment are to be found all of the national conservation organizations in America. The surprise comes from the fact that a few selfish polluters, a few misguided chambers of commerce, and a few backward States which offer unrestricted pollution as a lure to invite industries to move there from more enlightened commonwealths should oppose such a reasonable approach to the whole problem of pollution control.

SUPPORT FOR MUNDT AMENDMENT TO S. 685, WIDESPREAD AND GENERAL

Mr. Speaker, among the many communications, resolutions, petitions, and letters reaching me in support of this amendment I offer for the RECORD under leave granted to me copies of letters written by Surgeon General Thomas Parran, of the United States Public Health Service, to Mr. Kenneth A. Reid, General Manager of the Izaak Walton League of America, and by Secretary of Interior Harold L. Ickes to Mr. Tom Wallace, editor of the Louisville Times, of Louisville, Ky., who is one of the ardent advocates of effective water pollution control.

[Copy of letter from General Parran]

UNITED STATES PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE,
Washington, April 5, 1940.

Mr. KENNETH A. REID,
Izaak Walton League of America,
Merchandise Mart, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR MR. REID: Absence from the city has prevented an earlier acknowledgment of your letter of March 16th relative to the stream pollution bill now before a conference committee of the House and Senate.

In my opinion, the bill as passed by the House represents a constructive approach to this important and constantly increasing problem. It affords the opportunity for all agencies and organizations which are interested in cleaning up our streams to work together in accomplishing the purposes of the proposed legislation, and I earnestly hope the legislation will be enacted.

Sincerely yours,

THOMAS PARRAN,
Surgeon General.

[Copy of wire from Tom Wallace dated April 17, 1940, to Kenneth A. Reid, advising that Secretary Ickes endorses Mundt amendment]

Ickes authorizes me to say he endorses Mundt amendment.

[Copy of letter from Secretary Ickes to Tom Wallace, May 13, 1940]

Mr. TOM WALLACE,
The Louisville Times, Louisville, Ky.

MY DEAR MR. WALLACE: I appreciate your sending me, with your letter of April 26, press clippings pertaining to the Barkley water pollution bill which is now in conference.

The anticipated early meeting of the conferees has not yet been held, and I have asked Senator BARKLEY to try to bring about this meeting as soon as possible. I repeated to him that the Mundt amendment to the bill as it passed the House seemed to me to be entirely reasonable, since it would merely prevent new sources of water pollution in connection with a program of Federal aid for the abatement of existing pollution.

I also reminded the Senator that the Mundt amendment represents a considerable concession on the part of the conservationist groups, and suggested that the industrialists should be willing to accept this very reasonable compromise if they have any interest at all in antipollution legislation.

Sincerely yours,

HAROLD L. ICKES,
Secretary of the Interior.

I also offer for the RECORD an extract from the Louisville Times for April 17, 1940, of which paper Mr. Tom Wallace is the editor. I especially call attention of the House to the last statement in this article which quotes Dr. Arthur T. McCormack, head of the Kentucky State Board of Health, in endorsement of the Mundt amendment. Incidentally, I might add that most of the State boards of public health of the country are in favor of the Mundt amended S. 685.

ICKES BACKS POLLUTION BILL—TELLS TOM WALLACE HE HOPES IT PASSES

(By Lorenzo Martin)

WASHINGTON, April 17.—Approval of the Mundt amendment to the Barkley-Spence stream-pollution bill was voiced today by Interior Secretary Ickes.

"I see no reason for increasing sources of pollution when we are trying to abate pollution," he told Tom Wallace, editor of the Louisville Times.

Ickes authorized the statement, Wallace said, that while he had liked the original Barkley-Spence bill, he thought the Mundt amendment a good one and hoped the bill as passed with the amendment by the House would become law.

Opposed by the American Mining Congress, the Ohio Chamber of Commerce (Columbus), and the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce, the Mundt amendment provides that new sources of pollution affecting waters and tributaries shall not be created without authorization by an agency of the Federal Government.

TIMES EDITORIAL READ

The House adopted the amendment after debate in which an editorial from the Louisville Times in its support was introduced in the RECORD by Representative JENSEN, of Iowa.

The Izaak Walton League of America, of which Wallace is a national director, led the fight against the Barkley-Spence bill until the House adopted the Mundt amendment, but this organization endorses the legislation as passed by the House.

The legislation is now before a conference committee, but action has been delayed because of absence of one of the conferees, Representative MANSFIELD, of Texas, chairman of the House Rivers and Harbors Committee.

Senator SHEPPARD, of Texas, one of the conferees, is understood to oppose the Mundt amendment. Conservationists have not procured from Senator BARKLEY, another of the Senate conferees, any statement supporting it, but express hope that he will endorse it.

SUPPORT IS VOICED

The American Planning and Civic Association, headed by Horace M. Albright, former director of the National Park Service, whose board chairmanship is held by Frederic A. Delano, an uncle of President Roosevelt, has addressed a letter for the conferees supporting the Mundt amendment.

Dr. Thomas Parran, Surgeon General of the United States Public Health Service, who was for the Barkley-Spence bill as originally drawn, says, in a letter to Kenneth A. Reid, executive secretary of Izaak Walton League:

"In my opinion, the bill as passed by the House is a constructive approach to this important and constantly increasing problem. It affords the opportunity for all agencies and organizations which are interested in cleaning up our streams to work together in accomplishing the purpose of the proposed legislation, and I earnestly hope the legislation will be enacted."

MINERS DECLARE WAR

In a circular letter to members and to its legislative committee, the American Mining Congress has declared a last-ditch fight against the amendment.

The Izaak Walton League of America charges that lobbyists of polluters are fighting the amendment. Representative MUNDT, of South Dakota, says the Cincinnati Chamber of Commerce has "dropped its mask of favoring antipollution legislation" and now is "openly advocating defeat of a pending bill to set up a stream pollution control division in the Public Health Service." He asserts the opposition to the revised version of the bill was due to his amendment giving the proposed pollution board the right to grant or refuse permits for establishment of new sources of pollution.

Conservationists say 1 quart of each gallon of water in the Ohio River below Cincinnati has passed through human kidneys or consists of industrial pollution. Surgeon General Parran said sometime ago that "only a thin line of resistance is between Louisville and water-borne epidemics."

Dr. Arthur T. McCormack, head of the Kentucky State Board of Health, endorses the Mundt amendment, and says:

"It is time to begin keeping pollution out of the water instead of trying to take pollution out of the water."

Mr. Speaker, I now offer an editorial from the Grand Rapids Press of Grand Rapids, Mich., entitled "Stand By the Amendment," as typical of much editorial comment throughout America in favor of the Mundt amendment, which gives substance and significance to S. 685 by setting up barriers against the spread of the disease which the bill is destined to study.

[From the Grand Rapids (Mich.) Press of March 28, 1940]

STAND BY THE AMENDMENT

The Barkley antipollution bill, carrying the Mundt amendment prohibiting "new sources" of pollution from discharging waste into the navigable waters of the United States and streams tributary thereto, is now in conference between the House and Senate. By refusing to accept the House amendments the Senate made it possible for pollution interests to launch a new attack on effective pollution control, which means an attack on the Mundt amendment, since that is the chief control feature of the measure.

Typical of this attack is a letter sent out by the natural-resources division of the United States Chamber of Commerce, opposing the Mundt amendment, stating:

"The amendment is a departure from the principle to which the chamber is committed, viz, that in any measure to control pollution the basic principle of maintaining State and local initiative and responsibility rather than Federal control should be preserved. Moreover, it creates a situation where part of the pollution problem would be dealt with by the Federal Government and part by the States—an obviously complicated system to impose on any industry or community."

It happens, of course, that the streams of the country, meandering from one State to another and along State borders, actually present a Federal-State problem. The chamber's protest on this score is without substance. More than that, in seeking the elimination of the Mundt amendment, the chamber is saying, in effect, that it favors new sources of pollution.

Conservationists throughout the country dropped their opposition to the Barkley bill in return for this one amendment to ban future pollution. But apparently they can't even have that, if the interests represented in this protest have their way. The Izaak Walton League, which led the fight for the Mundt amendment, meets the United States Chamber of Commerce statement with the words:

"We will let the public be the judge whether the United States Chamber of Commerce is in favor of controlling pollution or whether it is actually in favor of protecting industrial polluters against any control over their pollution, actual or potential."

It is clearly the duty of House conferees on this measure to stand by this amendment. To do otherwise would be to break faith with the real conservation interests of the country.

Americans generally are coming to realize that pure streams, clean water, happy recreational places, healthful environments, and protection against unnecessary pollution are elements of a better society. This is evidenced by the following partial list of organizations and groups endorsing the Mundt amendment to S. 685. I call attention to the variety of the groups which have endorsed this amendment, Mr. Speaker. The list which I am offering for the RECORD is typical, but it is far from exhaustive. A great many more organizations have sent in petitions and requests that the Mundt amendment be retained as a part of S. 685 to the end that this country be not delivered lock, stock, and barrel over to the polluters to do with as they please.

THE AMERICAN GOOD GOVERNMENT SOCIETY,
Washington, D. C., July 8, 1940.

Hon. KARL MUNDT, M. C.,
United States House of Representatives.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN MUNDT: In many respects America today stands at the crossroads. The topic on everyone's tongue is national defense. Now, what does defense depend upon? It depends in the first instance upon having men of high patriotism and ability as well as adequate fighting weapons. But, what do these in turn depend on?

Men must have food to eat. If streams are too foul, they will have no fish or game to eat, they will find their trees and crops poisoned and killed, and they will even risk typhoid and perishing of thirst. If streams are polluted, it may prevent the establishment of communities at such points as needed to develop manganese or other essential minerals for defense. The killing of fish, trees, and plants will create bottlenecks in industries depending upon products made from such raw materials.

We therefore deem it urgent to national defense that the House of Representatives hold firm to the Mundt amendment for the reasons indicated in the attached statement from our American Good Government Review.

Yours most cordially,

RICHARD A. STADERMAN,
President, the American Good Government Society.

[From the American Good Government Review, Washington, D. C., May 1940]

MUNDT-AMENDED ANTIPOLLUTION BILL URGED—CLEAN STREAMS' LEGISLATION VALUELESS UNLESS PROVISO AGAINST FUTURE POLLUTION IS RETAINED

WASHINGTON, April 24.—The American Good Government Society revealed tonight its endorsement of the House version of the antipollution bill, S. 685, which includes the Mundt amendment. Passed by the House in a form having important differences with respect to the Senate-approved version, the bill is now in the hands of a conference committee composed of Senators and Congressmen representing their respective Chambers.

According to Richard A. Staderman, president of the society, the "unamended Senate version of S. 685 would be a gross waste of funds for mere additional 'study' of pollution, because it does not prevent conditions from becoming worse. In fact, we feel that no legislation at all on the pollution problem would be preferable to a bill which did not outlaw new polluting. We, therefore, hope that the conferees and both branches of Congress will approve S. 685 as amended and passed by the House. By thus retaining Congressman Mundt's amendment barring future polluting, the Congress will have made a big start in preserving a healthful drinking-water supply and sports facilities—fishing, boating, hunting, and photography—for millions of American citizens."

Mr. Staderman, elaborating on his organization's basis for support of the House version, continued:

"It is especially subsection (d) of section 2 of the House-approved bill (p. 17 of March 6 print of S. 685) that we urge be retained.

"This is the section outlawing future polluting. It therefore seems strange to the author of this statement, who was born in Cincinnati, that many Cincinnatians actually opposed this section which is the Mundt amendment to the Barkley bill, S. 685. We fear that the people of that city do not realize that the supporters of the unamended bill are akin to Mark Twain's views on the weather in talking much about pollution but doing little if anything positive about it.

"Cincinnati is cited as just one instance of this national clean-streams problems. In the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD (daily ed., July 24, 1939, p. 13813; revised ed., vol. 84, pt. 14, p. 3470)

we of the American Good Government Society opposed spending $1,000,000 a year to have bureaucrats warm chairs, talk about pollution, and do little else about it. In that issue of the RECORD we viewed such an appropriation as being an unwarranted drain on 'our already overladen taxpayers.' We therefore note with pleasure that the House version as amended has provided a reasonable authorization of only $250,000 appropriation.

"The preventing of an excessive expansion on top of the already swollen Federal pay roll is important to the American way of things. Several years ago Col. O. R. McGuire, general counsel of our society and chairman of a committee of the American Bar Association, collaborated with the late constitutional authority, James M. Beck, in writing the book, Our Wonderland of Bureaucracy, which pointed out the seriousness of having some 500,000 Federal employees in 1932. If that was serious, what is the present problem of almost 1,000,000 employees?

"Streams are largely of an interstate character. Therefore, pollution control is well within the province of the Federal Government."

WHAT YOU CAN DO TO HELP!

Mr. Speaker, an encouraging indication that America is awakening to the real seriousness of the problem of pollution and that Americans, today, are eager to do something definite to stop the continued rape of our rivers is seen by the fact that so many Members of Congress and so many individual citizens throughout the country have called or written my office asking, "What can I do to be helpful in the drive to stop the indiscriminate extension of the pollution peril?" Let me answer this question specifically and briefly, now, and then I shall conclude these remarks.

Members of Congress can render service to the cause of clean streams, of course, by voting to retain the Mundt amendment in S. 685 when we have a roll call on that decision tomorrow. They can further implement their good intentions by urging the Senators from their respective States to approve the amendment when the bill goes to the Senate as it will if the House reaffirms its support of the Mundt amendment.

Private citizens and public-serving organizations can give effectiveness to their support of the move to regulate future sources of pollution by writing to the Members of the United States Senate urging them to accept the Mundt amendment and then to ratify S. 685 as amended by the House. If the Senate will thus acquiesce in this progressive legislation, the fight against indiscriminate pollution in America will be won and new protection will be given the health and happiness of this great country. Your sentiments should be conveyed to the Senators without delay as it is important that action be taken on this legislation before adjournment.

Should America Sanctify Pollution or Stop Its Spread?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

Monday, July 8, 1940

STATEMENT OF PHIL G. PLATT

Mr. MUNDT. Mr. Speaker, on the first day of March the House wrote into the Senate bill on pollution (S. 685) an amendment, known as the Mundt amendment, which declared the expansion of pollution to be contrary to the public policy of the United States and which made it illegal to inject new sources of pollution into public waters unless such pollution could be shown to be noninjurious to the public health and national interest and would therefore be approved by the Division of Public Health. This amendment was adopted by an approximate 2-to-1 vote of this House.

Tomorrow, on July 9, this House will be called upon to reaffirm its disapproval of detrimental and deleterious new sources of pollution. On that day this body must vote either to sanctify pollution and to place its official stamp of approval on the sordid business of using the public waters as a private sewer, or it must vote to stop the spread of pollution by reaffirming its approval of the so-called Mundt amendment which would set up restrictions against new forms and new sources of pollution in the public waters of America. July 9 is therefore destined to become one of the most important legislative days in American history from the standpoint of the conservation of our natural resources. It is my sincere hope that this day will be marked by a forward step toward the preservation of the health and happiness of America and not be marred by a backward step, undoing the progress we have made, and reverting to the doctrine that the streams of America belong to the polluters thereof.

I have received a statement from Phil G. Platt, of Wallingford, Pa., which discusses the matter of pollution very effectively and under leave granted me by the House, I wish to include it in the RECORD. Mr. Platt is national vice president of the Izaak Walton League of America, and I am sure members will be interested in his observations in connection with the important decision which we must make tomorrow.

The statement follows:

Back in 1908, the great Theodore Roosevelt said:

"Conservation of natural resources is the fundamental problem. Unless we solve that problem, it will little avail to solve all others. It is the chief material problem that confronts us, second only—and second always—to the great fundamental questions of morality."

There is meat in those words, yet we wonder if an orderly plan of conservation of natural resources is not a guiding, rather than a secondary, factor to morality? History teaches us that as a nation neglects conservation of natural resources by means of profligate waste, morality declines, unrest and warlike tendencies become rampant, and the nation finally succumbs to the seed sown from within rather than from without.

Two years ago, the Izaak Walton League of America, a nonprofit organization dedicated to the conservation of our renewable natural resources, said:

"Intelligent conservation of natural resources is the most important long-time problem before the Nation today. War scares, labor wars, industrial depression, and the condition of the Budget may be more immediately pressing, but next year or 10 years hence, they will be history, while the problem of intelligent management of natural resources will still be with us—and don't forget that they are the source of all wealth. We cannot endure by a mere balancing of that artificial Budget which is ultimately worth no more than its collateral—the natural resources."

On July 1, 1940, Hon. MARVIN JONES, distinguished Representative from Texas, said on the floor of the House:

"We have adopted a program of conserving and rebuilding the soil. Every man, woman, and child in America, in the long road of the future, is vitally interested in this program. * * * For many years by building levees down near the mouth of great streams, we tried to channel the water into the sea, thus working against nature with the consequent result that the beds of the streams became filled up above the surrounding valleys, and bringing about periodic floods that destroy the homes and properties of many people living in those valleys. By starting at the sources and utilizing the water, holding it where it falls and in the tributary streams, water is being made to serve a great and useful purpose. Thus by working with nature from the time the water falls as rain, following it down through the tributary streams and on to the sea, the double purpose can be served of making use of this great essential of nature and at the same time preventing many of the great floods that have caused broken homes and cost millions of treasure. * * * We have for years treated water as a sort of curse instead of a blessing."

On the same day, Hon. JOHN R. MURDOCK, Representative from Arizona, contributed the following:

"We must conserve it and utilize it as if it were lifeblood—and indeed it is very similar to lifeblood."

Well spoken, Mr. JONES and Mr. MURDOCK. In your statements relating to soil conservation and water utilization, you have expressed the views of the Izaak Walton League of America. We especially congratulate you, Mr. JONES, in urging that floods should be corrected at their source rather than at their destination, meanwhile making use of the "lifeblood" to which Mr. MURDOCK refers.

Besides the quantitative factor which was so ably discussed on July 1, there is an equally important consideration which was not touched upon, inasmuch as it is not a part of agricultural administration. I refer to the quality of this "lifeblood" of ours. This may seem relatively unimportant in the wide open spaces of Texas and Arizona, but in the more densely populated industrial States, this problem is at least equal in importance to that of quantity. Our people are clamoring for relief from a "lifeblood" impregnated with disease germs and filth injected into it by those who find a river to be the easiest method of disposal of their wastes in the form of human excrement and poisonous industrial wastes.

On July 9 the House will be requested to reinstruct the conferees appointed to consider the Barkley water-pollution bill; it is anticipated that the House may be asked to recede by eliminating the so-called Mundt amendment which provides that no new sources of pollution on interstate streams shall be permitted unless approved by the United States Public Health Service. The Mundt amendment does not disturb present polluters, but merely places a quarantine upon a nefarious practice of the past and states that we, the people, feel that it is time to call a halt. Opposition to the Mundt amendment can be construed only as favoring unrestrained pollution of the Nation's waterways.

We are embarking upon a great emergency defense program which will mean mobilization of industry and manpower which must result in industrial expansion and water utilization. Let this not be an excuse to expand the heedless policy of water pollution. We have the Dust Bowl as a grim reminder of agricultural overproduction during the last great emergency. The same forces which would use the present emergency as an excuse for increasing water pollution would, in a time of industrial depression, use that fact as a deterrent in taking the initial step. Because of the vilely polluted condition of the waterways from which Americans derive their drinking water, it has been necessary to invest many millions of dollars in complicated waterworks which by some almost miraculous feat of ingenuity, are able to deliver safe drinking water to their patrons. During these times of discussion of an adequate national defense, reference has been made to the vulnerability of strategic points such as canals, arsenals, railway terminals, etc. What would be the result if a well-placed bomb were to be dropped on the waterworks of say, the city of Philadelphia, which derives its drinking water from the Schuylkill and Delaware Rivers? Or the city of Cincinnati, drawing from the much publicized pool of the Ohio River?

From the agricultural standpoint, Messrs. JONES and MURDOCK have ably pointed out the necessity of conserving water at the source, rather than the destination. Let the same philosophy apply to the quality of water by correcting pollution at its source, rather than at its destination. In the name of health, fisheries, recreation, aesthetics, and sound economics, this is the only solution. The Mundt amendment to the Barkley bill must be retained. It would be in the nature of a national calamity to eliminate it from the bill.

Vice President, Izaak Walton League of America.

Willkie Gets House To Act on Hatch Bill

OF
HON. CLIFFORD R. HOPE
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Monday, July 8, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE CHRISTIAN SCIENCE MONITOR

Mr. HOPE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following interesting article from the Christian Science Monitor of Saturday, July 6:

[From the Christian Science Monitor of July 6, 1940]

WILLKIE GETS HOUSE TO ACT ON HATCH BILL

WASHINGTON, July 6.—Republican Presidential Nominee Wendell L. Willkie is already getting action out of Congress—a Democratic Congress.

The new Hatch "cleaner politics" bill is now being lifted out of a committee pigeonhole in the House of Representatives, where it was imprisoned by the strong-arm tactics of New Deal Congressmen, and is now receiving the friendly nod of House leaders, who have agreed to call it to the floor of the lower Chamber next Tuesday.

Nothing has happened to bring about this sudden about-face of the Democratic leadership except that Mr. Willkie casually announced in Philadelphia last week in his first interview after his nomination that the Republican Party would be voluntarily bound by the limitations of the Hatch law, regardless of what the Democratic House did with the bill. He hoped that Congress would pass the law so that its restrictions could apply uniformly to all candidates and all parties in the coming campaign.

Evidently the Democratic leaders have taken note of Mr. Willkie's challenge and believe it would be bad politics if they let the Republicans take the ball entirely out of their hands in this matter and confessed to the electorate that they wouldn't let this measure, which has already passed the Senate, come before the House for vote.

PURPOSE AND SCOPE OF BILL

The new Hatch bill originally was merely an extension of the Hatch Act of last year which prevented Federal employees from engaging in political campaigns and excluded them from financial contributions either to candidates or parties. The new measure extended these restrictions to State employees paid in part or wholly from Federal funds. The objective of the act is to keep the vast Federal bureaucracy from becoming an instrument for perpetually keeping one party in power.

Amendments to the 1940 Hatch bill have now been added to cover the size of campaign contributions from any source and the total amount which any party can spend.

Senator JOHN H. BANKHEAD (Democrat), of Alabama, first proposed that no individual be allowed to contribute more than $1,000 to political campaign funds. That almost went through, commanding 36 votes in its favor against 45 in opposition. Then another Bankhead amendment to make the limit $5,000, as now urged by Mr. Willkie, did squeeze through the Senate by a margin of 2 votes, 40 to 38. Still another amendment voted by the Senate would forbid State and local officeholders employed on federally financed projects to coerce other employees into making campaign contributions.

DEMOCRATS "NO LIKE"

Finally passed by a nearly unanimous Republican vote in the Senate and against the opposition of fully half of the Democrats, the Hatch bill fell immediately into the clutches of the unsympathetic and unfriendly arms of the House Judiciary Committee, which first voted to table it for the session, then the following week voted to rescind the tabling motion, and at last on May 29 reported it out favorably by a vote of 16 (9 Republicans, 7 Democrats) to 8 (all Democrats). The committee added the new provision that no political committee may spend more than $3,000,000 in any campaign.

The Hatch bill of 1940, like the Hatch Act of 1939, found politics written all over the opposition to it as the measure struggled along its way in Congress. Most old-line Democrats privately abominated the 1939 act, at least while their party was in power, and correspondents heard Senator CARL A. HATCH (Democrat), of New Mexico, roundly booed by his fellow Democrats at the Jackson Day dinner in Washington last January.

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. FRED L. CRAWFORD ON THE CHANCES FOR THE G. O. P. TICKET

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks, I present herewith my statement last night on the American Forum of the Air program on the subject What Are the Chances for the G. O. P. Ticket, broadcast over the Nation-wide facilities of the Mutual Broadcasting System.

What are the chances for the G. O. P. ticket? Fundamentally, they are the best we have faced during the present century. A grand Scotch father taught me to be a conservative in thought and action, and 6 years' service in the House in the atmosphere of, and under New Deal pressure, has not changed me. Conservatively speaking, I now submit the reasons why the G. O. P.'s chances are so good.

The American people have again discovered themselves. Although they were for a number of years lulled to sleep on the pillow of the state and were led to believe the Government was an everlasting milk cow, they have now come back to themselves.

The present generation has had its splurge of irresponsibility. It has found that parties alone cannot conduct free government. Permitted to do so, parties will demand more and more power, and still more dictatorial power in order to be able to administer the country. If an irresponsible electorate permits, the substance of the people, as the citizen delivers it to the tax box, will be consumed by the politician as a form of manna, to perpetuate himself in office. A sleeping electorate encourages the political procurer to act as a purveyor of public funds back to the local parish, in the form of gravy. This practice dulls the conscience of the voter, destroys the fiscal structure of government, decreases pride in national life, and it leads the people to think only in terms of "local projects" instead of along national lines. And this creates a localized individual selfishness that positively will not support a free government.

Government derives its just powers from the consent of those governed. National defense is much more than social reforms. Permitted to do so, the politician will, under an appropriate catch phrase, make call after call on the people to which they will respond, for more and more tax dollars. In due course, the taxpaying citizen naturally questions the use of the funds, and invariably, will find the substance has been applied to promote more so-called social reforms.

This has happened in most all of the countries of western Europe, particularly in France and England. We are, I trust, quite familiar with the fact of the parallel in our own policies, here in the United States, in recent years.

Free men and women have duties to perform as well as rights to enjoy. For too many years we have had preached to us the "easy way of life." God Almighty has arranged the affairs of mankind so that the idea that "government won't let you down" can remain in control for just about so long a time. Then, there comes an awakening. If it comes too late, the people—like the French—become the slaves of some stronger group.

Now our people are, before it is too late, we hope, participating in a rebirth. The American voter is now in a frame of mind which demands a degree of statesmanship from his legislators. The voter now insists upon the interests of the Nation being placed before those of the individual politician and his party. Those who falsely preach that the proper duty of government is to arrange an easy way of life can no longer lead the voter.

The voters of this Nation have again determined that under God, citizens of both sexes are going to defend their country, preserve its liberties, and bequeath to their children an opportunity to live under a free government.

For a decade, the voters of this country have witnessed a debauch which, like rich food, palls their taste and becomes nauseating. They have had enough of this leveling of the Nation and the people, always down to a lower level. Our awakening is rude. We face terrific tasks. Those who thought they had retired, must now go back to work.

We the people have made colossal errors but we are now anxious to correct them.

The voters will now support the new leader "Win" Willkie and help him transform this country and—

1. Take our natural resources and create jobs for 9,000,000 workers in private industry;

2. Break the spell gold has over us, remove its dangerous inflationary threat, stop its further purchase from foreign countries, prevent the $20,000,000,000 of gold we now hold being dissipated through giving it away to the central banking systems of the world in a futile attempt to restore the so-called international gold standard;

3. Put the $1,000,000,000 worth of foodstuffs and fibers, now cornered by the Commodity Credit Corporation, back into the channels of trade where it can be consumed before it becomes another loss to chalk up against the taxpayer;

4. Restore life to a dying Cotton South which has lost its historical cotton export market;

5. Reinstate order in Government fiscal affairs, raise the necessary funds to provide an adequate peacetime and defense budget, and all without further destroying our private enterprise system with improperly applied taxes and more Government competition.

6. Proceed to collect a large portion of the $14,000,000,000 owed us by European countries.

7. Prevent the dumping in our markets of loot taken from the conquered countries.

8. Lead our people back to active and vigorous participation in representative government and maintain our position as a first-rate world power. Certainly we will support Willkie in making our Nation strong enough to command the fear and respect of every aggressor; stop our growing weakness, and actually provide genuine national defense.

Thoroughly and practically trained in our American enterprise system, "Win" Willkie can weld a sound Pan-American Union either on a triangular-trade basis or, if forced to do so by the totalitarian countries of Europe and Asia, he can place our hemispherical defense in a position to deal blow for blow, until the opposition grows weary and reasonable.

This, I would have you understand, will all be no pink-tea affair operated by "reds." This program, this necessity, demands a leader who has no taint of the wastrel or of the fallacious philosophy of the past decade. "Win" Willkie is a graduate of the school of hard knocks.

Nominee Willkie is not a politician; therefore he will be engaged in rebuilding the physical and moral forces of this Nation instead of just playing politics. That is what the people expect and will get from him—and they will like it.

Our domestic situation is not in order, and capital investment is profoundly missing, and this must be corrected if labor is to be materially increased, costs reduced, and goods improved to get and hold markets, in Latin-American countries, for instance.

A high standard of living is never created by legislation. But it comes from coordinated research, engineering, management, capital, and labor. "Win" Willkie thoroughly appreciates these facts.

The G. O. P. is now the young people's party. The people will support the G. O. P. ticket because they know "it is back to work we go" if there are to be any more "happy days."

EDITORIAL FROM THE CLAY CENTER (KANS.) DISPATCH

Mr. REES of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, having been given unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am including herein a timely editorial by Ray Breitweiser, one of the prominent editors of Kansas—which appeared in the Clay Center Dispatch under date of July 3, 1940.

[From the Clay Center (Kans.) Dispatch of July 3, 1940]

WILL BE A TWO-WAY FIGHT

Wendell Willkie isn't the only person in the United States who owns utility stock. People who have money to invest almost without exception have some utility stock. There is nothing wrong with owning utility stock and personally we can see nothing wrong with a young man starting from scratch and going to the top of a huge concern such as the Commonwealth & Southern in less than 20 years. In fact it is one of the success stories that we like to read about and we admire any man who is a success and we claim that being president of any concern that pays a salary of $75,000 a year is a successful career.

As for Willkie being a rich man or holding utility stock, he is neither as rich as Roosevelt and if the truth were known, we venture the assertion that Franklin D. Roosevelt owns more stock in utility companies than a dozen Willkies.

But there is nothing wrong in holding stock in utility companies. There is nothing wrong in owning a few cattle, a few farms, some bank stock, or even a newspaper. The simple fact that some utility companies went broke, sold a lot of useless stock to innocent people, is no sign that all of the utility heads and all the utility companies are crooks. There are thousands of utility companies in the United States and the crooked ones number only a very small percent.

But the smearers, the scandalmongers will be at work early but this much is certain, it will be a two-way fight and no holds will be barred.

"Fifth Column" Folly

EDITORIAL FROM THE OSKALOOSA (IOWA) HERALD

Mr. LeCOMPTE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Oskaloosa Herald of July 6, 1940:

[From the Oskaloosa (Iowa) Herald of July 6, 1940]

"FIFTH COLUMN" FOLLY

The howl from American Communistic and Fascistic groups, following the Nation-wide drive against "fifth column" activities, again brought to the fore the question of whether or not groups and individuals seeking to overthrow the present form of government have the right to seek protection under the Constitution they seek to destroy. With democracy on trial and in danger of extinction, United States citizens are at last protesting against the activities of un-American elements.

Under the Constitution, Communistic, Fascistic, and Nazi groups have openly organized, held meetings, and distributed propaganda extolling the totalitarian form of government and discrediting the democratic philosophy. These activities are admittedly carried on at the sufferance of a democratic people, and the subversive elements while taking full advantage of democratic privileges of free speech, assembly, and press, point to this sufferance as one of the great weaknesses of our system.

When the founding fathers set up this Government under the Constitution, they attempted to provide freedom for all. But they did not specify that this freedom should extend to a point where it could not defend itself from destruction. On this point most Americans agree—any group or individual that conspires to overthrow the Constitution and the freedom it guarantees should not be protected by that Constitution.

LETTER FROM CONSTITUENTS

Mr. LEWIS of Ohio. Mr. Speaker, many of our best citizens are deeply disturbed by the evident purpose of past and pending moves by the executive branch of our Government that appear to be leading us step by step down the path that leads to war.

There is no group of our citizens more firmly opposed to war, as an instrument of national policy, than is the religious denomination known as the Friends or the Quakers. The members of this religious group are made up of some of the finest people in this Republic.

In my district, the Eighteenth District of Ohio, I have many constituents who belong to this religious group, and I am proud, Mr. Speaker, to be their Representative in Congress and to deliver to the Congress a communication which I have received from the Stillwater Monthly Meeting of Friends, of Barnesville, Ohio, which is as follows:

Congressman EARL R. LEWIS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: We are much concerned by the recent move of those in control to inaugurate some plan of youth training.

We are very strenuously opposed to any form of compulsory service for youth. It is the very denial of all that our Government has stood for in the past. We hope that we are not thus to lose one of our democratic rights. Cannot this wave of hysteria be stopped?

Can we depend upon you to help in every way to check this steady rush toward war?

Sincerely,

STILLWATER MONTHLY MEETING OF FRIENDS,

England's Prayer and Ours—Ink Versus Steel

Monday, July 8, 1940

EDITORIALS FROM THE DETROIT FREE PRESS

Mr. BRADLEY of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, this morning's Detroit Free Press carried two very timely editorials which I feel should be called to your attention at this time, and to the attention of other Members of the House. Under leave to extend my remarks I include them herewith: England's prayer and ours, and also ink versus steel. This is once when the pen is not mightier than the sword.

[From the Detroit Free Press of July 8, 1940]

ENGLAND'S PRAYER—AND OURS

We are still getting but glimpses of what went on behind the curtain in France. As far as can now be seen it is a ghastly picture of the failure of democracy to function.

Has Great Britain been much better?

Have we?

At least there is time for us to learn our lesson and, God grant, there is still time for the British to learn theirs.

A strangely prayerful note may be found in a recent editorial in the London Times, generally accepted as the quasi-official organ of the British Government. One pregnant paragraph:

"The European house cannot be put in order until we put our own house in order first. The new order cannot be based on the preservation of privilege, whether privilege be that of a country, or a class, or an individual. * * * The problem of the new order is social as well as international."

This is going a long, long way for the London Times, bulwark of the old established order. One cannot have gone through the mining areas of Wales or the slums of London, Manchester, Liverpool, without acute and ready understanding of the needs of a "new order" if democracy is to prevail after the war on the British Isles.

The "privileged classes" of England have grown to be such an established decadent type that they have been the subject of merrymaking the world over, on stage and screen, in song and story. P. G. Wodehouse, and other writers of his type, owe the tremendous success of their efforts to the fact that they had to do but very little exaggerating to make their satires vivid.

It would be pleasant if we of the United States could point with pride.

But it ill behooves us to dwell upon the sins that have been England's.

For every wretched hovel in Great Britain its counterpart can be found in this land of wealth and opportunity—lush and fresh and at its beginnings, instead of being age-old and weary from the burdens of tradition as is England.

Our sense of shame should be even greater than that of the older countries, hide-bound by habits, for it was to escape from these conditions that most of our people came to these shores.

It is to be hoped that all this silly political poppycock about "our frontier ends at the Rhine" is over, that what has been revealed of the internal picture of France will act as a sobering influence upon those superpatriots who have been insisting America's destiny is to save the world.

Our job is to save ourselves.

Not by grubbingly pinching pennies and counting the costs, not with the idea that out of the woes of other peoples shall we make a profit, but by giving to our own people real equality—political, social, economic, intellectual, spiritual democracy.

You cannot have a Christian nation without Christianity and you cannot have a democratic nation without democracy.

To mention superpatriots again we hear, over the radio and on the platforms, the orators shouting that we should be willing to die for democracy.

Is it not, however, much better to live for it?

As France was yesterday, we are today. The only difference is one of degrees. France so lost the soul of democracy that, if most reliable reports are true, it was a nation divided between extreme left-wing radicals and Tory sympathizers with the Nazis.

The believer in democracy must have been in the wishful and ineffectual minority.

We, too, are a divided people, divided by politically promoted class hates—often made easy because of the plentitude of material on which to base such claims.

Until we get our own house in order we need not look with scorn upon France nor with pity upon England.

"Democracy, as a fighting faith," says Dr. Robert Hutchins, "can only be as strong as the convictions which support it. If these are gone, democracy becomes simply one of the many ways of organized society, and must be tested by efficiency."

If it is the best form of government we have got to prove that it is the best. We must prove that we are capable of governing ourselves as a free people, working for a common cause, each rendering unto the other that which is his by right of justice and not by the might of one class over another—whether that class be called capital or labor.

In a true democracy we are all workers, we are all capitalists, we are all citizens of equality, because we are all Americans.

That must be our real national defense.

INK VERSUS STEEL

We now have "on order" or under contemplation at the White House a $14,000,000,000 emergency preparedness program. Unfortunately, paper ships, paper planes, and paper armies protect no coastal cities, no factories, no homes. A less pretentious program being put through with a hum would make us all feel more comfortable.

This is once when the pen is not mightier than the sword.

Pan-Americanism or War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ

OF NEW MEXICO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 9 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. DENNIS CHAVEZ, OF NEW MEXICO

Mr. CHAVEZ. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered by me over the red network of the National Broadcasting Co. from station WRC, in Washington, D. C., on July 8, 1940, on the subject, America Must Choose—Pan-Americanism or War.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICA MUST CHOOSE—PAN-AMERICANISM OR WAR

Teachers of American history in introducing the subject of the Monroe Doctrine point out that there are two essential parts:

1. A warning to European nations not to establish new colonies in the Western Hemisphere; and

2. Assurance that we would not take part in European wars, nor would we interfere in their internal concerns.

It is this second cardinal principle of the Monroe Doctrine upon which the first rests, which radio commentators, columnists, and editors consistently or purposefully overlook today.

While all true Americans are ready to shed their blood in defense of the Monroe Doctrine, how many have more than a vague idea of its language and import? How many are aware that the only justification for telling Europe to keep hands off our hemisphere lies in the principle of nonintervention in Europe's affairs, stated by President Monroe in his historic message to Congress on December 2, 1823:

"* * * In the wars of the European powers in matters relating to themselves we have never taken any part, nor does it comport with our policy so to do. * * * Our policy in regard to Europe, which was adopted at an early stage of the wars which have so long agitated that quarter of the globe, nevertheless remains the same, which is not to interfere in the internal concerns of any of its powers * * *."

In short, we promised hands off Europe and warned Europe that we would not tolerate European interference here. That is the Monroe Doctrine. If we break our promise of nonintervention in Europe, what complaint have we if Europe intervenes in this hemisphere?

In the old West the ranch owner who trespassed on the land of his neighbor waited with drawn six-shooter for the retaliation which was sure to come. We face a deadly parallel today. Continued trespassing in Europe invites retaliation. Meddling is an unwarranted deviation from our traditional policy. It can only lead to war.

We are faced with a crucial choice: "America must choose Pan Americanism or war."

Let us not confuse this issue with our sympathy for one of the belligerent powers. American public opinion is overwhelmingly opposed to our entry into the war. In spite of the imminence of the invasion of England, the latest Gallup poll shows that only 14 percent of the people favor intervention. Letters from my constituents are unanimous in expressing a fervent desire to keep America out of war. This preponderance of public opinion is attributable in the main to a deep-rooted and traditional attitude of nonintervention and, second, the full realization by the man in the street that airplanes, tanks, and organization are the decisive factors in war. Sharing the conviction of the chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee that nothing that we can do now will alter the outcome of the coming battle of England, our people are determined to remain at peace.

With these facts before us, we can best appreciate the decision America must make. Either we cease our meddling in Europe and choose the road to peace by the development of our own hemisphere, or we will find ourselves engaged in a long protracted struggle with the totalitarian powers for imperialistic mastery of the world.

During the special session, when the arms embargo was lifted, we still gave lip service to "neutrality"; now we have even abandoned that pretense and are definitely and simply "nonbelligerent." How long will the "non" remain? Do the American people want that precious "non" removed? To preserve that status, Congress must remain in session, and I, for one, will vote against any proposal for adjournment while the situation remains critical, and I warn my colleagues that only disastrous consequences can follow a refusal to heed the plainly expressed will of the people that Congress remain in session.

Misguided patriots assure us that the European democracies are our first line of defense. But what has happened to those first lines of defense?

Events of the past week have presented the grotesque spectacle of the two great nations who were supposedly fighting the battle for democracy exchanging salvos, bombing in reprisal, and severing diplomatic relations. And we were told that this was a different kind of a war. That argument has now been exploded; we know that it is the same age-old game of European power politics, as the late lamented Senator Borah so often described it. It is not our war.

These deluded patriots confuse foreign interests with our own, either through vain personal ambition, sheer stupidity, or corrupt motives.

And now, please pay particular heed to the following quotation:

"So, likewise, a passionate attachment of one nation for another produces a variety of evils. Sympathy for the favorite nation, facilitating the illusion of an imaginary common interest, in cases where no real common interest exists, and infusing into one the enmities of the other, betrays the former into a participation in the quarrels and wars of the latter, without adequate inducements or justifications. It leads also to concessions, to the favorite nation, or privileges denied to others, which is apt doubly to injure the nation making the concessions, by unnecessarily parting with what ought to have been retained, and by exciting jealousy, ill will, and a disposition to retaliate in the parties from whom equal privileges are withheld; and it gives to ambitious, corrupted, or deluded citizens who devote themselves to the favorite nation, facility to betray or sacrifice the interests of their own country, without odium, sometimes even with popularity; gilding with the appearances of a virtuous sense of obligation, a commendable deference for public opinion, or laudable zeal for public good, the base or foolish compliances of ambition, corruption, or infatuation."

This was not said on July 4, 1940, or even last year, but 144 years ago by one whose statements cannot be questioned, for his loyalty and patriotism have never been impugned. Similar statements have been stigmatized as worthy of "Trojan jackasses." But I refer to no "Trojan jackass." No, it is George Washington's Farewell Address, his legacy to the American people, his people, our people, which I have quoted. Old-fashioned perhaps, but it has weathered the acid test of time—true then and just as true now.

Common sense dictates that we follow Washington's advice. But how? By minding our own business and by not letting our sympathies run away with us at the expense of our own true interests and by adopting a constructive program of development in our own hemisphere.

Such a program is sure to be greeted by derisive cries of appeasement. Propagandists have found appeasement a new device against which I must warn, lest they pull a "blitzkrieg" on our firm desire for peace. There can be no appeasement unless a demand has been made. Who, besides interventionists, has made demands upon us? Of course, appeasement, since Chamberlain and Munich, has an unpleasant, or even ominous sound. But appeasement has nothing to do with us except as a convenient term for the interventionists who cannot otherwise circumvent American public opinion which insists on peace.

Our relations to South America in the past have generally been characterized by bungling ineptitude. Though we were the first to recognize the independence of our neighbors to the south, when a call was first issued for a pan-American conference to be held in Panama in 1825, under the sponsorship of the great liberator, Simon Bolivar, our Government was so slow in sending its two delegates that one died before he got there, and the other found that the Congress had adjourned before he arrived.

Some 60 years later pan-Americanism assumed real significance, but unfortunately our policy of Caribbean imperialism exemplified by our war with Spain, the Panama Canal and the landing of the Marines in Haiti, Santo Domingo, and Nicaragua, and our active hostility toward the ill-fated Central American Court of Justice, created doubt, suspicion, and even hatred in our sister republics.

We were described as the colossus of the north. The United States has intervened some 30 times in Latin America and the fear of Yankee imperialism is an active factor in the Latin American mind today. Our relations with Mexico, Colombia, and Panama are more familiar to the Latin American than parachutists from over seas.

Seven years ago the good-neighbor policy was inaugurated. This sincere effort by the Roosevelt administration to make the responsibility of the Monroe Doctrine a multilateral obligation of all the American Republics rather than a self-assumed obligation of this Nation alone has met favorable response in South America. But more than words are needed to correct the many mistakes of the past.

Now we are proposing a pan-American cartel whereby the United States can control all of the exports from Latin America and bargain with totalitarian Europe, if that is what Europe is to be. What advantage will accrue to Latin America from this arrangement? Perhaps, with their experience with us, that is what they too are wondering, and can we blame them? Now we realize we need them, but more than idle repetition of a desire to be good neighbors is necessary. Actions speak louder than words, and actions are essential.

Having decided to concentrate our efforts on this hemisphere, we must decide to practice what we preach and carry through a determination to appreciate and understand the temperaments of the Latin American peoples. This will require a complete change of attitude on the part of the people of the United States. The racial doctrines asserted by totalitarian philosophy are constantly decried in the United States, but nothing less has characterized our attitude toward the Latin American. We have been too prone to regard ourselves as superior to our neighbors in this hemisphere. Perhaps this is not done consciously, but nevertheless we will have to change that attitude if we desire their friendship.

I cite an example: In a recent motion picture we were treated to a spectacle of a sawed-off shrimp, portrayed by James Cagney, manhandling with ease 20 to 30 natives of a hypothetical Latin American country. No doubt this example of so-called superiority created a sense of satisfaction and pride, but it represents bad taste and creates ill will.

I mention the problem of our attitude because the success of our efforts in South America will depend upon our sincerity.

In New Mexico, which I represent in the Senate, over half of the people speak Spanish. Racial differences have been solved harmoniously. Public offices in the State are filled by both of the principal races and all are fully conscious, and thank God for it, that they are Americans first, last, and always.

Those of us of Spanish descent in New Mexico are proud of our ancestry. No recent comers to this land, our forefathers have lived in New Mexico in some cases as much as three generations before Plymouth Rock. In New Mexico we have no Sudeten problem. And we won't permit one. There we have mutual respect, tolerance, and understanding. The ideal that prevails in New Mexico must be adopted by the United States in its consideration of the Latin Americans. They must be treated as equals.

A concrete program so that pan-Americanism can become more than a mere catchword should include the development of close cultural ties, the facilitation of travel and intercourse, and, lastly, the erection of a powerful economic hegemony. The exchange of students by the thousands should be inaugurated immediately. Chairs for the teaching of Latin American history and ways of life should be established in our universities and colleges, this to be financed by the Federal Government, just as agricultural schools are sponsored now. Spanish and Portuguese should be required courses in our secondary schools, and a systematic program of educating our commercial and governmental representatives to South America in the language and culture of the country should be undertaken.

Recently Secretary of Agriculture Wallace addressed the delegates to the Eighth American Scientific Congress in Spanish. Secretary Wallace is an exception. It is doubtful if there is another public official in Washington who could make an address in Spanish. But in our Southwest, in the States of Texas, Colorado, Arizona, and New Mexico, we have thousands of educated young men and women of Latin extraction who speak Spanish and English. There are more in Puerto Rico. Their loyalty to this country is unquestioned. Sending our Spanish-speaking citizens as emissaries of good will to combat the "fifth columns" in South America would be more effective than Navy cruisers.

In order to facilitate travel and intercourse, airways and steamship lines should be subsidized with the object of lowering travel costs for the public. The pan-American highway and interlinking roads should be constructed to open the vast continent to our south. News service, cable, and radio facilities should be improved. Since private enterprise has not entered this field, public interest demands that the Government take the lead. It is appalling to think that Germany and Italy, occupied as they are, are still continuing to propagandize by radio in South America and we do nothing.

In the economic field we should concentrate on the development of sources of strategic raw materials, such as tin and rubber, to replace those now derived from Europe and Asia. The promotion of trade and commerce must be made with a view to raising the standard of living, rather than exploitation and economic oppression.

I am convinced that unless a program such as outlined is immediately inaugurated our efforts to promote pan-Americanism will be attended by dismal failure. Without it, the Habana conference, like those preceding it, will produce nothing more than high-sounding resolutions

On August 10, 1937, I advocated in the Senate that we direct our attention to South America, where our natural interests lie; that we cultivate the friendship of Latin America. On March 3, 1938, over a national radio hook-up I urged the construction of a Government short-wave broadcasting station for South America to counteract totalitarian propaganda. I asked then that we immunize ourselves from political destinies of Europe and confine our activities to the American scene. On May 9, 1939, I delivered over N. B. C. a speech entitled "Pan-Americanism Versus European Meddling." I urged political isolation from the border disputes and blood feuds of Europe.

We had time then to make a choice. We may still have time now. Let us decide now and choose the path that leads to peace. Let us build in our hemisphere a mighty stronghold of law and order and peace. Let us choose pan-Americanism.

Statement Concerning Book Written by James H. R. Cromwell

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM H. SMATHERS

OF NEW JERSEY

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Monday, July 8, 1940

STATEMENT FURNISHED BY HON. JOHN E. TOOLAN

Mr. SMATHERS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement explaining in full certain statements appearing in a book published under the authorship of James H. R. Cromwell.

I make this request at the instance of my good friend and former colleague in the New Jersey State Senate, the Honorable John E. Toolan, of Middlesex County, N. J.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

On June 5 last, the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] made a statement in the Senate grievously reflecting upon the loyalty and patriotism of James H. R. Cromwell, Democratic candidate for the United States Senate from the State of New Jersey, who will be the opponent of the junior Senator from New Jersey at the election November 5.

In the course of his remarks, the junior Senator from New Jersey made reference in support of his unusual charges to a few fragmentary extracts from a book written in 1932 by Mr. Cromwell. The title of the book is "The Voice of Young America," published by Charles Scribner's Sons. At the time the junior Senator from New Jersey referred to this book many of the statements and conclusions expressed by Mr. Cromwell had been amplified by Mr. Cromwell in speeches made before two sessions of the New Jersey State Democratic convention at Trenton, N. J., on May 28, 1940, and June 4, 1940.

Mr. Cromwell's book was written during the dark days of 1932 when many persons trembled for the fate of our country. Political and economic chaos threatened our most cherished institutions and Mr. Cromwell made an earnest and sincere effort to examine many of the problems pressing for solution. He studied a number of these problems in a scientific and businesslike way, frankly expressing his opinions and offering remedies for many of the ills that then beset the country.

It is worth noting that the Associated Press in an article published by a number of American newspapers on February 4, 1940, listed 10 suggestions for reform made in 1932 by Mr. Cromwell, which have since that time become wholly or partly accomplished. These as listed by the Associated Press were as follows:

1. Repeal of the eighteenth amendment.
2. A national police force.
3. Reduction of tariffs.
4. Separation of underwriting and deposit banking.
5. Guaranteed bank deposits.
6. An embargo on gold withdrawals and inflation of the currency until money averaged the buying power of the prior decade.
7. A system of national employment offices.
8. Compulsory unemployment insurance.
9. Federal-aided public works.
10. Government ownership of public utilities.

Without discussing any of the subjects treated in this book, the junior Senator from New Jersey told the Senate on June 5, 1940, that Mr. Cromwell's 1932 book "verges on the seditious, and gives comfort to 'fifth columnists' in the United States."

Without reading it to the Senate, the junior Senator from New Jersey had inserted in the RECORD the text of a statement which he (the junior Senator from New Jersey) had issued to the press on June 3, 1940.

Mr. Cromwell's public record and his frequent utterances, both as American Minister to Canada and upon the public platform in this country, are sufficient answer in themselves to such allegations, for if he has been criticized by the press and other observers for anything at all, it has been for his repeated and outspoken utterances during the last 6 months in support of democracy and the American system of government as opposed to the autocracies and dictators of Europe.

However, Mr. Cromwell himself had answered the June 3 statement of the junior Senator from New Jersey even before the junior Senator from New Jersey placed the statement in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. Speaking before the Democratic State Convention at Trenton, N. J., on June 4, Mr. Cromwell said:

"Senator BARBOUR, after diligent research, has discovered that 8 years ago I wrote and expressed my dissatisfaction with things as they were and hoped that more efficient government would succeed in remedying these conditions.

"If this is any satisfaction to the Senator, I would tell him, that unlike himself, I am still greatly dissatisfied with conditions that make for unemployment, want, and insecurity in our country, and that I still think that the remedy for such conditions in a democracy is more democracy.

"Senator BARBOUR has wrapped himself in the ample folds of the Constitution of the United States, hoping that thereby his record in the United States Senate will be obscured to the voters of New Jersey. He is wrong. It is not what he wrote 8 years ago, if ne wrote anything, but what he said and did in the United States Senate to the disservice of the people who elected him, that will mark him in this campaign.

"During the country's crisis in the last war, I, with many others, took the oath of allegiance to the Constitution, put on my country's uniform, and was ready to make whatever sacrifice I was called upon for the principles for which our democracy stood. Perhaps Mr. BARBOUR will explain what he did in the same circumstances.

"The Senator is a sadly confused man when he refers to me as of the 'fifth column.' Only recently he attacked me for attacking the interests of the 'fifth column,' in a speech I had made in Toronto, Canada.

"Senator BARBOUR has much less to fear from the 'fifth column,' because of his expressed attitude against anything that might possibly hurt the feeling of such people than he has from the 'first column,' who are the workers of our State, the 'second column,' our patriotic and independently minded businessmen, the 'third column,' the progressive youth of our State, and the 'fourth column,' our social-service workers and educators, who want courageous, efficient, and patriotic government."

In support of his amazing charge of sedition against his opponent for election to the United States Senate, the junior Senator from New Jersey inserted into the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD a number of excerpts from Mr. Cromwell's book of 8½ years ago. These excerpts, consisting for the most part of single sentences, and even only parts of sentences, from whole paragraphs, give an incomplete and inadequate view of Mr. Cromwell's view back in 1932.

I find nothing in this book to warrant the charge of the junior Senator from New Jersey that his Democratic opponent for the Senate is guilty now or at any other time of having entertained or expressed sentiments in any degree disloyal to the Constitution or to our system of government or that he is disqualified in any way to take the oath as a United States Senator. On the contrary, a study of his writings, speeches, and his record as American Minister to Canada has convinced me that his presence in this body would be of distinct benefit to this country and to the State of New Jersey.

The fragmentary parts of this book, consisting of nine brief references from a book of 190 pages which the junior Senator from New Jersey caused to be inserted in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD without even reading them to the Senate, naturally give a very incomplete and inadequate picture of the thesis of this book.

Its theme and purpose is very clearly indicated by a quotation from a poem by James Russell Lowell (who was certainly never accused of sedition) which is printed as a frontispiece in the book. This quotation is as follows:

"Now times demand new measures and new men;
The old advances and in time outgrows
The laws that in our forefathers' day were best,
And doubtless after us some purer scheme will be Shaped out by wiser men than we,
Made wiser by the steady growth of truth.
My soul is not a palace of the past,
Where outworn creeds like Rome's great Senate quake,
Hearing afar the vandals trumpet hearse
That shakes old systems with a thunder fit.
The time is ripe and rotten ripe for change,
Then let it come; I have no dread
Of what is called for by the instincts of mankind."

To state more adequately his purposes in writing the book, Mr. Cromwell wrote a preface to it and so that his purposes and arguments may be more fully understood I desire to read that preface:

PREFACE

"I do not mean to convey the impression that this book, because it is entitled the 'Voice of Young America,' represents the unanimous opinion of the young men and women of the country, nor do I anticipate that they will coincide with all my deductions or support all my contentions; that is not the point. To me, the voice of young America is a cry of need for knowledge and truth and for such facts and fundamentals as will pierce the dense fog of ignorance, tradition, hypocrisy, and evasion through which our elders are blindly stumbling toward chaos and destruction.

"The book might better be named 'the Economic Education of James Cromwell,' since it is the result of one young American's struggle, following the crash of 1929, to find out what caused this great economic crisis. It represents my apprehension at the selfish, stupid, and suicidal policies of our so-called leaders, and my desire to point out to my contemporaries, in brief and comprehensive form, certain alarming facts about our country and what we can do to save ourselves from ruin. If this book succeeds in dispelling some of the fallacies and some of the ignorance which prevail in America today, it will be because I can understand, thanks to my own former prejudices and misconceptions, what erroneous ideas may still be confusing other young Americans.

"In my endeavor to obtain authentic information I discovered that the authorities were exhaustive specialists upon their own subjects, but that no book existed which concisely described the most important of the many causes which have brought about America's sudden downfall. This book is, therefore, the attempt of an amateur to compile, in sequence, a synopsis of the outstanding evils and errors which afflict our country. It is meant to provoke thought and discussion and not to be a text book. A comprehensive bibliography of references, however, is included for those who wish to secure full information upon subjects which I have barely outlined. I dislike destructive criticism and consequently have avoided railing against those abuses which cannot be corrected by the exercise of ordinary human intelligence.

"This is America's crisis—commerce is at a standstill, the people are panic-stricken, more than 10,000,000 are out of work, the Government is helpless, we face a deficit, this year (1932) of $2,000,000,000, and we cannot continue indefinitely issuing bonds to support an ever-increasing army of unemployed. That is not the worst. These material things could be remedied if Congress would face facts and take action, but Congress will not face facts and will not take action. Our 'leaders,' with a few notable exceptions, are looking backward instead of forward; we must be philosophical, they say, for this is not the first period of depression America has endured—the ancient engine has stalled before, but it has always started up again, somehow, so we must suffer patiently until a kind Providence restores good times. They are blind to the vicious evils and errors of an obsolete form of government and go on hopefully waiting for a new cycle of prosperity which will obliterate the memory of the miseries of today. Will the holocaust of revolution overtake America before these reactionaries realize that the good old days have passed into history and that our psychology and our methods must be adjusted to a new era?

"When such an able and experienced leader as Col. E. M. House publicly states that our continued inability to grasp realities may result in revolution, it is time American citizens awoke to the probability of such a catastrophe. During similar conditions in England, Macaulay declared 'the only possible antidote to revolution is timely and drastic reform.' Revolution is an indictment of the ruling classes of any generation in which it occurs, so America's youth must face facts and adopt a program of drastic reform before it is too late. We have no time to waste discussing the mysteries of socialism, communism, technocracy, and other vague theories, but must at once put to use the possible and practical remedies which lie ready to our hands.

"Those of us who are between the ages of 18 and 45 are going to bear the brunt of future calamities, and this book has, in consequence, been written primarily for my contemporaries. If, through reading it, even a few young Americans are moved to a fuller comprehension of the evils and errors which menace our country's safety and gain a deeper understanding of the infinite possibilities of practical reform, my efforts will have been more than rewarded."

And now, so the fragmentary parts of this book printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD but not read to the Senate by the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] may be examined in connection with the context of which they are a part, I ask that excerpts placed in the RECORD by the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. BARBOUR] be reprinted in small type and that the complete text immediately preceding and following (or so much of it as may be necessary) be printed in larger type so that a clear picture of the views of Mr. Cromwell, as expressed 8½ years ago, may be presented.

"When, during the war, the American people were faced with a tangible and dangerous issue, there was no lack of courage, initiative, and coordination of effort on the part of the Nation as a whole, and Woodrow Wilson, irrespective of his other qualifications, proved a strong and fearless President. Today, facing an intangible issue which is far more dangerous than the plain and evident issue of 1917, America is a house divided against itself, and not one great leader has appeared who is courageous enough to tell the people of the United States that the antiquated Government of the Constitution has collapsed. A disorganized and purposeless Congress flounders helplessly in a sea of irresponsible minority 'blocs' and seeks to solve the problems of a gigantic machine age with the mental and legislative equipment of 1789. Now, at the eleventh hour, with over 10,000,000 workers unemployed, with mutterings of violence among starving and desperate people, the Nation, leaderless, bewildered, and sorely pressed, turns to its youth in the hope that they can save the country."

"The people of the United States are panic stricken and bewildered because depression seems intangible to them; and, being uninformed and misled, they do not know how to defend themselves. Depression is in fact intangible; it is the combination of a multitude of errors and, like an octopus, must be destroyed tentacle by tentacle. Americans of the old order were businessmen first, last, and always, and their primary desire in life was to be let alone and allowed to develop their commercial ventures independent of State or Federal interference. They were living in a fool's paradise—each intent on his own purpose, each without thought of the future, each selfishly avoiding his responsibilities as a citizen, and, at the same time, trying to load his just burdens upon other people's shoulders. This depression will prove, in the end, a blessing in disguise, and not a calamity, if it compels the youth and best brains of America to consider the common welfare, to tell the truth to the people of the United States, and to reorganize both an iniquitous system of government and an archaic theory of economics."

"A true democracy represents the will of the majority of the people; a political system which is based not upon the will of the majority but upon weird and fictitious boundary lines, cannot be termed a democracy; nor was the United States ever intended by the authors of the Constitution to be a democracy. Their political tradition was aristocratic, and a government truly responsive to the will of the people was unthinkable to them; they were distrustful of the very democracy which we ignorantly assume they created and left to us. They therefore devised a balanced and counterbalanced vehicle of government in which the Senate, judiciary, and executive branches were chosen, not by the people but by selected representatives of the people. In the words of John Adams, they wanted 'the well-born to rule.' An ingenious system was finally created which permitted citizens to vote every 2 years to replace the entire House of Representatives but allowed them to replace only one-third of the Senate, which body, therefore, was then, and is now, entirely free to ignore the will of the people. In answer to the need for some form of responsibility, party government, which had never been considered by the Constitution framers, soon appeared, and in the course of years direct election of Senators and a series of other amendments were enacted in vain efforts to dispel chaos and give to the educated and intelligent people of the United States a voice in the administration of their own Government.

"American politics are now based upon a two-party system. These parties are supposed to represent two different schools of thought and policy and to provide, in addition, a satisfactory method of guaranteeing the administrative efficiency and integrity of the party in power. Nobody knows what schools of thought and policy these two parties represent today. The Republican Party is a combination of certain wet industrial cities and dry western farmers, while the Democratic Party combines other wet industrial eastern cities and dry southern farmers. Nothing could be more absurd or illogical, and it is not surprising that the candidates of both parties are compelled to sit on the fence and emit an endless stream of empty platitudes to conceal their complete lack of constructive policies. The discovery that our Government is iniquitous and inefficient is inevitable when the foundations upon which it is built are admittedly illogical and absurd."

"Our system of government transforms masters into servants and servants into masters. Imagine, for instance, hiring a laborer, having him refuse to carry out our instructions, and saying to him: 'Very well, since you refuse to carry out our instructions we will discharge you in 6 years.' What an absurdity. And yet this is an exact simile of the relations which exist between the people of the United States and the Senators they hire to represent their rotten-borough districts. Substitute 2 years for 6 and Representatives for Senators, remember that the Senate can veto the wishes of the people's representatives, and it becomes evident that the intent of the constitutional fathers to deprive the people of any voice of their own Government has magnificently and disastrously succeeded.

"Our sacrosanct, outworn, and demoralizing Constitution is a millstone around the necks of the American people and it has delivered our Government into the hands of self-seeking demagogs and politicians. The use of the franchise in a republic is the guaranty of honest and efficient self-government, and the corruption and incapacity which exist in our machine political organizations result from the fact that great masses of citizens seldom vote because they have no compelling issue to vote for. Minorities, who directly or indirectly profit through the use of their franchise, therefore control Government, and the organizers of these minorities or political machines have been, and still are, subject to bribery by unscrupulous men seeking public monopolies or special privilege. The prevalence of political corruption has been, and is now, amply attested by the existence of enormous fortunes in America which have been accumulated, not by superior genius and hard work, but through suborned privilege and the acquisition and shameless exploitation of the sovereign powers of the American people."

"Our forefathers created for themselves a new form of self-government which included, and still includes, most of the evils which existed in the British system in 1789; a President was substituted for the King, a Senate for the House of Lords, and a House of Representatives for the House of Commons. In 1832 the British people forced through their famous reform bill; they reorganized their Governament and rectified its evils; they abolished their vicious, rotten boroughs and inaugurated the modern type of flexible and efficient parliamentary government which has made Great Britain a model of self-governing democracies. Since that time practically all civilized nations have evolved similar systems of self-government and have steadily improved and developed the art; while we, with egotistical self-satisfaction, have remained content with the eighteenth-century Constitution conceived by our distinguished forebears. We are not compelled to originate, today, a new and untried theory of Government, but can profit by the experience of our more progressive neighbors and can adopt for ourselves a system which, by trial and error, they have found to be satisfactory and efficient and which will meet our own twentieth-century requirements.

"We will be confronted, however, with determined and organized opposition, for the American people are victimized and held in bondage by a small and controlling group of demagogues and politicians whose power and privilege will be destroyed if the modern and universal system of parliamentary government is substituted for our corrupt and tottering constitutional government. The obstructive tactics of this oligarchy are unwittingly supported by reactionary 'patriots,' who cry 'treason' at the mere suggestion that our ancient and sacred institutions are not 100 percent perfect, but young America must not be diverted by such impediments in the path of progress; we must and will throw out this infamous oligarchy irrespective of Constitution, cults, or any other forms of ancestor worship. We propose to modernize our institutions and will not permit our country to sink into decadence—like China—by setting up as irrefutable religion the mistakes of our progenitors.

"It would be impossible to define more briefly and clearly the organization and operation of a parliamentary form of government than by quoting the words of Newton D. Baker: 'A majority in the British House of Commons elects a prime minister or chooses a prime minister. That prime minister appoints from the House of Commons the government, the executive associates, the Cabinet. They are all members of Parliament. They formulate a policy. As long as the people of England are satisfied with that policy they stay in power. The minute that policy ceases to satisfy the people of Great Britain they go out of power and somebody else comes in who is charged with responsibility for a new policy, and he stays in just so long as he can command a majority of the House of Commons. And the minute he ceases to be able to command a majority, out he goes.

" 'That prime minister appoints from the House of Commons the government, the executive associates, the Cabinet. They are all members of Parliament.' These words are significant. Not only is the life of the government directly dependent upon the approval of the people, but the government itself is composed of the elected representatives of the people. Not only are members of the Cabinet chosen because of their political experience and proved executive ability, but men who embark upon a political career and demonstrate individual fitness are given the opportunity to reach the heights of power and prominence.

"Americans are capable in business, yet we take no action to correct our glaring governmental defects, even when such defects are conspicuously indicated by comparison with competing and infinitely more efficient systems. Every 4 years we see politicians choose new and inexperienced Cabinet heads who, almost invariably, entirely lack any comprehension of political needs and problems. These 'administrators' are supposed to conduct their departments in accordance with the viewpoint of political-minded legislators who entirely lack any comprehension of executive needs and problems. Our Cabinet heads are appointed because they have 'supported the party.' They come from all sorts of occupations—we have had railroad presidents, college presidents, lawyers, doctors, bankers, civil engineers, dry-goods merchants, men of every type except statesmen. We have had very few of these because our system of government does not comprehend that training is essential to statesmanship and to the successful guidance of vast national affairs.

"Let us again quote Mr. Baker: 'They formulate a policy. As long as the people of England are satisfied with that policy they stay in power.' Assume that an American parliamentary administration should adopt a high-tariff policy and that many of the people should be opposed to such a policy. What would happen? Both the administration and the opposition representatives would at once appeal directly to the people to support their respective contentions. If the administration's policy should be objectionable to most of the people, the people would protest to their representatives; numerous representatives, therefore, would refuse to support the administration's policy; the administration would lose its majority, and a general election would become obligatory. The people themselves would then decide, after again hearing the subject thoroughly discussed by opposing factions, whether or not they wished a high tariff. There would be no confusion as to issues, because there would be only one issue at stake; do the voters wish a high tariff or do they not? In England, where the people govern themselves and decide each vital issue, a minimum of about 85 percent of eligible citizens vote. In America, where the voice of the people is rendered inaudible and where there is never any issue, a maximum of about 54 percent of eligible citizens vote."

"How can these imperative and drastic changes in our Government be brought about? The Constitution provides that amendments may be proposed by a two-thirds majority in both Houses, or by two-thirds of all State legislatures, and that such amendments must be ratified by three-fourths of all State legislatures or by a special convention convened in three-fourths of the States. Most of the authors of the Constitution were of the privileged, landowning, upper-class minority, and they took every precaution to guarantee the perpetuation of a system which would safeguard the privileges of a fractional minority at the expense of the vast majority. It is inconceivable that our parasite States will voluntarily deprive themselves of the graft and special privileges which they enjoy under our present scheme of government, and, therefore, some 'unconstitutional' plan of compelling reform must be found.

"A powerful and dangerous weapon is now being forged upon the anvil of tax oppression, and that weapon is the organization of taxpayers into associations which collectively refuse to meet the inordinate demands made upon them. Taxpayers' associations must be organized and amalgamated in the 10 States which represent 50 percent of the population and pay 80 percent of the Federal income tax. The purpose of such amalgamated associations would be to fight taxation without representation and to compel recalcitrant parasite States to forfeit their graft and special privileges and accept a parliamentary government which would be equitable, just, and fair to all the people. The instrument with which tax associations could accomplish this purpose would be a new 'liberal' or 'young American' political movement which would place one, and only one, issue before the voters of the country—parliamentary government for the United States. Liberal Representatives in Congress could refuse to vote for any Federal appropriations until essential governmental reforms had been agreed upon by over 36 States. It would be difficult to organize a third political party in America, and such a drastic step is probably unnecessary. Liberal candidates could run for office under the banners of our Republican-Democratic coterie, and thus the eggs of the new movement could be hatched in the nests of our two existing and discredited political parties.

"Timid antiquarians will oppose us with the statement that the Constitution has served the national needs for over 143 years, and that a vehicle of government which has endured so long must be meritorious. Our ancestors were satisfied with a horse and buggy, which is a meritorious means of transportation, but we have not, for this reason, hesitated to adopt the automobile or the airplane. A man may for years enjoy apparent health and prosperity while, unknown to him, a cancer is slowly spreading its poison through his system; then in some period of weakness he is struck down by this dread disease. No such man can hope to recover his health until this cancer has been removed, and the same thing is true in America today. We cannot hope to climb up the steep ladder to renewed contentment and prosperity until our fundamental cancer, an undemocratic and incompetent system of government, has been removed.

"The path of progress has never been smooth, and many obstacles, delays, and discouragements must be overcome before success can be achieved. Let us remember that Washington finally had to approve a Constitution which he described as 'the best that can be obtained at this time,' after he had risked his life in battles and had for years suffered extreme privations and anxieties to win for his country the right of self-government. Let us always find new inspiration in the words of Lincoln: 'This country, with its institutions, belongs to the people who inhabit it. Whenever they shall grow weary of the existing Government they can exercise their constitutional right of amending it, or their revolutionary right to dismember and overthrow it.'

"Young America will not sit supinely by and watch the ravages of needless depression; we have the courage and intelligence to reorganize our Government; we will develop leaders who can understand the problems of this new era and we can, and will, save our bewildered and sorely pressed country from the perils of unemployment, starvation, and violence.

"It takes more time and more grit to correct the abuses in a nation than to win a nation's wars, but youth has the time, and youth has the grit."

Independence Day Addresses at New York World's Fair

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WARREN R. AUSTIN

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 9 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

ADDRESSES BY HARVEY D. GIBSON; MESSMORE KENDALL; GENERAL NOLAN; LT. GEN. ROBERT LEE BULLARD; HON. WARREN R. AUSTIN, OF VERMONT; AND REAR ADMIRAL C. H. WOODWARD

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD certain patriotic speeches delivered at the New York World's Fair on Independence Day, by Mr. Harvey D. Gibson, chairman of the board, New York World's Fair, 1940; by Mr. Messmore Kendall, chairman, Committee on Patriotic Activities; by General Nolan, introducing Lt. Gen. Robert Lee Bullard, retired; by Lieutenant General Bullard, retired; by Rear Admiral C. H. Woodward, United States Navy; and by me.

There being no objection, the addresses were ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

ADDRESS OF HARVEY D. GIBSON, CHAIRMAN OF THE BOARD, NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR 1940, COURT OF PEACE, JULY 4, 1940

Ladies and gentlemen, 1 day out of every year is recognized the world over as a distinctly American day.

Every year for more than a century and a half, American citizens have gathered together on that day to remind themselves—and the rest of the world—of the principles for which our founding fathers stood.

This afternoon we are following in that tradition. We have met here in the Court of Peace to observe a time-honored custom. It is fitting that we should do this. It is right that as we engage in these ceremonies our minds should turn to the past, and we should think of those memorable days in 1776 when our Nation was born.

This may well be a day on which we pause and glance back over the years, proud to be inheritors of the Spirit of '76. We should cherish that pride. We should never forget for an instant that to be proud of our country means to be proud of the men who have shaped its course and of the words and achievements they have willed to us.

But we must take care that the honor and reverence we do them is a genuine part of our lives and not merely an observance we go through by habit on this 1 day of the year.

We must realize that this is not only the Fourth of July, but that it is the Fourth of July in the year 1940. What we celebrate here today should be something far more than a train of events and great deeds in our past.

We ourselves are not of the past but of today. Urgently as we need the example and wise counsel of those men of 1776, it is to our own effort we must look for a solution of the problems that lie about us today.

The spirit of liberty and human justice to which we pay tribute today is not an heirloom. It cannot be passed fondly from one generation of ancestor-worshipers to another.

Because we live under the laws and institutions founded by the men of the Revolution does not of itself make us the spiritual descendants of the men of the Revolution. That we meet here and commemorate a brilliant scene in our history is not enough to justify our claiming kinship with those who took part in that scene.

The freedom for which they fought is something no one of us can passively inherit. The sense of tolerance and human justice that has made for peace in our land must be reborn each generation if it is to remain alive.

So today, the deepest tribute we can pay to our Nation's past is to rededicate ourselves to that spirit of peace and freedom which (if we are worthy) we can hope to inherit from our past.

This cannot be done lightly and with words. It cannot be done in a day. It can be done only by a people determined (no matter what the rest of the world may do) to go forward steadily and unflinchingly on a course of genuine human advance.

May we in America today be such a people!

ADDRESS BY MESSMORE KENDALL, CHAIRMAN, COMMITTEE ON PATRIOTIC ACTIVITIES, NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR, COURT OF PEACE, NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR, JULY 4, 1940

"We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

This quotation, as you know, is from the Declaration of Independence, and was the first formal statement of truths eternal but long unspoken; truths that few had dared to utter, which Providence ordained should be revealed here in America to be the political creed of people all over the earth. Like a trumpet blast in the night, it pealed through the dark abodes of misery, and roused men to thought and hope and action.

It was John Adams, in seconding the motion for a Declaration of Independence in the Continental Congress, used these words:

"Sink or swim, live or die, survive or perish, I give my hand and heart to this vote. It is true, indeed, that, at the beginning, we aimed not at independence. But there's a divinity that shapes our ends. The injustice of England has driven us to arms; and, blinded to her own interest for our good, she has obstinately persisted, till independence is now within our grasp. We have but to reach forth to it, and it is ours. Why, then, should we defer the declaration? * * * Whatever may be our fate, be assured, that this declaration will stand. It may cost treasure and it may cost blood, but it will stand, and it will richly compensate for both. Through the thick gloom of the present I see the brightness of the future, as the sun in heaven. We shall make this a glorious, an immortal day. When we are in our graves, our children will honor it. They will celebrate it with thanksgiving, with festivity, with bonfires, and illuminations. On its annual return, they will shed tears, copious, gushing tears, not of subjection and slavery, not of agony and distress, but of exultation, of gratitude, and of joy. Sir, before God, I believe the hour has come. My judgment approves this measure, and my whole heart is in it. All that I have, and all that I am, and all that I hope in this life, I am now ready here to stake upon it; and I leave off as I began, that live or die, survive or perish, I am for the declaration. It is my living sentiment, and by the blessing of God, it shall be my dying sentiment; independence, now; and independence forever."

As we meet today, 164 years later in carrying out John Adams' prophesy, we congratulate ourselves that today the Government founded upon the principles of the Declaration of Independence remains the oldest existing form of government. During its existence Europe has had absolute monarchies, limited monarchies, imperialist governments, pure democracies, reigns of terror, Communistic governments, and now ruthless dictatorial governments whose bloody deeds Americans to a man abhor.

We have gone on serene and without change, an example to the world. Our flag has never been carried in conquest and it has never been humiliated by its Nation's surrender.

It is a comforting thought in surveying the history of other nations whose flags are now furled and whose governments have been preempted that whatever their immediate future, the physical, ethnical, and racial character of the countries and their love of freedom which have caused them to endure for decades is a guaranty of their restoration to entity among nations when the storm has passed. Centuries of oppression cannot quench the ideals of liberty when once implanted in a people. The Christian religion has survived its every outrage; its being thrown to the lions. Under oppression it has gained strength. The race and religion of the Jews have survived through centuries of persecution. So those who have tasted the sweets of liberty cannot long endure a master. A truth, a religion, a people of common interest are so much stronger than a mortal power of brief authority that they are certain to survive. So, as we reverently thank our Maker that our flag still flies over the land made free by our forebears, let us treasure the thought that conquerors for centuries have never been able to destroy the language, manners, and customs of peoples who have a will for independence. When these nations, now prostrate, struggle to their rightful place in the world let us see that we are prepared so that the torch of liberty will still be burning here and that the Star-Spangled Banner will be flying over us, the keepers of the faith, the custodians of the spirit of freedom. Should they see the torch flickering and dimming, if we give the slightest occasion for our own doubt or theirs of the stability and integrity of our democracy, it bodes ill for their ultimate peace and freedom or that of those other nations of the world not already under the iron hand of tyranny, dictatorship, and poverty.

GENERAL BULLARD INTRODUCED BY GENERAL NOLAN JULY 4, 1940

It affords me great pleasure to introduce Lt. Gen. Robert Lee Bullard, United States Army, retired.

General Bullard served with distinction in the Spanish War and the Philippine Insurrection. In the World War he commanded with great distinction in battle our First Division, our Third Army Corps, and our Second Army.

For the last 15 years since his retirement he has been president of the National Security League. As he has devoted 60 years of a very active career to military preparedness, he is one of the country's outstanding authorities on this question, which is the subject of his address today.

NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR FOURTH OF JULY SPEECH BY ROBERT LEE BULLARD, LIEUTENANT GENERAL, RETIRED

The Fourth of July 1776 this people declared themselves free and independent. They knew the significance of the declaration. To Mother England—then, mark you, ruled over by a German King, George III, who disregarded our people's rights as England's subjects—it said: "We brook no interference in our way of living; we are going to be independent." And then with eye and thought fixed on their purpose they followed their declaration with acts, made good their faith with works.

Today, 164 years later, by the conduct and acts of powers outside ourselves, this people is brought face to face with the necessity of having again to make clear "to whom it may concern" that we are and will still hold ourselves free and independent, with the same meaning as in 1776—no interference in our plan or way of living by any power outside ourselves.

This is the state of affairs in which we today now find ourselves. You know it. The whole country knows it. Then what is next for us? Just one thing, one first and foremost; yes; and for the present, exclusive of all others. About it world conditions permit us no shadow of doubt. The step that our Revolutionary fathers took under exactly like conditions, to arm and strengthen ourselves on land, on and under the sea, and in the air. By the best and all the means that we now have on hand and that we can in further time provide. By compulsory selective military training and service at once, so as to have troops so trained that they will make an enemy fear to attack us or if he does attack will not be defeated and lose to an enemy all our arms and equipment, as did some of the Allies recently in Norway, Holland, Belgium, and France. With all speed, without any of the least loss of time, prepare. Relying upon ourselves, not others. Nations that have taken their time or turned to others to save them—we see them being wiped out from one week end to another and enslaved to systems not their own.

My fellow countrymen and friends of my fellow countrymen, this, preparedness, excluding until it is accomplished, every other consideration of sympathy, friendship, or hate of other peoples, is the one, the sole thought that my spirit will this day permit me to offer you. You will, I am sure, pardon me, troubled as I am with our utter unpreparedness and driven by the knowledge that comes from 60 years, 19 to 80, devoted all to study and practice solely of arms and of war.

REVITALIZING THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE IN 1940—ADDRESS BY SENATOR WARREN R. AUSTIN FROM WORLD'S FAIR OF 1940, ON JULY 4, OVER COAST-TO-COAST NETWORK OF THE MUTUAL BROADCASTING CO.

"Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness," declared on the fourth day of July 1776 to be the object of those governments "deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed," demands today as high a price of sacrifice and service as it did a century and a half ago.

The slogan of this great exhibition, For Peace and Freedom, is a poignant ideal. But, if it is necessary to sacrifice our peace in order to maintain our freedom, superior strength is necessary to meet the foe. The mortality of pacifist nations, the raping of weak nations, are indisputable witnesses of this truth.

On this Fourth of July we envisage for tomorrow the Americas, and in particular the United States, trained, hardened, equipped for defense of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." Indeed, we know that "governments deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed" would be wiped off the earth by autocratic powers if we should fail to make the sacrifice necessary to adequate preparation on land, sea, and in the air.

Our lines of defense to be fortified are:

1. The moral line.
2. The industrial line.
3. The military line.

CONSIDER THE FIRST LINE—MORAL ARMAMENT

Relative unity of any self-governing people is a prerequisite of effective action. In the United States, Congress does not lead, it follows, public opinion.

National defense, in order to approximate invulnerability, will require the individual to relinquish the tranquillity of pacifism and habits of ease. It will cost him heavy taxes, long hours of work, sacrifice of luxuries, and surrender of the softening and enervating dependence upon Government for jobs, and the more abundant life.

Individuals arm themselves spiritually, and create a national morality, before Congress appropriates huge sums of money, and levies burdensome taxes for the Military Establishment. Here is an initial test of individual responsibility. Is it going to make the moral line impregnable? Will it overcome the subtle propaganda that creates popular distrust of government? Will it educate the deluded isolationist who pitifully insists that nothing menaces the Western Hemisphere, and vaguely inquires "Against whom do you arm?"

I will not identify isolationists and pacifists with Nazi sympathizers. To do so would confuse the issue. There is a bona fide conflict of conviction on principle which ought to be fully and tolerantly debated in order to reach the harmony necessary for speedy, smooth production, and for patriotic enlistment.

Distrust of our purpose to remain a nonbelligerent unless the Americas are endangered must be met.

Skepticism about the cause for which the democracies fight must be destroyed. The fallacy that Hitlerism is the reaction to conduct of France and England must be exposed. The necessity of aiding the Allies by means short of war to stop Hitler on the other side of the ocean must be made plain for those whose preconceived ideas and lack of vision of the unprecedented peril obstruct the giving of such aid.

The individual has the opportunity this year of directly expressing his determination to make invulnerable this moral line by encouraging public officials to place patriotic duty above popularity and higher than partisan objectives.

The ideal cannot be too high; the effort too great.

The men we choose to serve in public office and the men we enlist for leaders in the industrial plant of America shall be of unimpeachable character, of good record, men recognized as essentially honest and faithful, men of proven ability to execute trusts of the most important effect upon human life, and men of special knowledge, experience, and skill.

In this line of defense, national welfare must have supremacy over partisan evaluations.

Herein do we revitalize the Declaration of Independence in 1940.

In the world of today the independence of the United States of America has a new aspect—looking inward and looking outward.

Inwardly it is seen to be independent of "isms" and "fifth columns"; in the will to protect so much of liberty of conscience and freedom of worship as has been gained through the centuries at a tremendous cost of blood and treasure.

It is the will to strive for perfection spiritually, mentally, and industrially.

Looking outward, it is independence, though not isolation, and not intervention. It is the will to keep the Government of the United States of America free from permanent alliances, free from statutes which would cripple this Government in the event of unforeseeable dangers, free from all fixed commitments, so that this Government could take any action which, in the changing circumstances, would forestall, or prevent, aggression in this hemisphere.

This is the first line of defense.

CONSIDER THE SECOND LINE—INDUSTRIAL SOLIDARITY

Experience in the World War established the fact that the industrial line must be consolidated before war. For example, it was not until the last 2 months of 1917, 7 months after the war began, that rifle production began to mount in the United States in any appreciable degree. Thereafter, 3,000,000 rifiles were produced within a period of 15 months. At the end of 1917, only 8,000 American machine guns had been produced. In May of 1918 monthly production exceeded 10,000, and by August reached 35,000.

Consequently, this necessary line of defense for "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness" is being consolidated now.

This second line of industrial and economic development requires nonpartisan administration of production and procurement of the machinery of defense.

This second line of defense requires the organization of our economy and of our national production plant on a sound basis looking toward the long pull.

Taxes will be heavy. Both capital and labor will need readjustment. Cooperation, in which mutual concessions relating to profits, wages, and hours of service, will be necessary.

Loose talk of warmongering and intervention when vigorous men of vision and deeds are placed in command will be analyzed to determine whether it represents opposition for opposition's sake, or obstruction for obstruction's sake.

This Nation will tighten up its belt and consume less unnecessary food. It will resume its pioneer frugality and require fewer luxuries. It will pay as it goes. It will tune up its industrial plant and turn out in mass production the required machines and munitions for the defense of democracy.

America must not be caught, as England is today, in such unpreparedness that recruits must be armed with broomsticks.

Arming on the new plan and scale is a difficult and complex undertaking, which could not be done effectively if postponed until the United States should again be plunged into war.

Our third line of defense has been in the blueprint stage for years. The need is for well-informed public opinion to recognize that America has the resources, human and material, to secure peace in this hemisphere if only she keeps the weapons free from rust.

A revolution in warfare has occurred. The private soldier is almost helpless without the support of special offensive machines, vessels, planes, tanks, and new forms of armament, and devices related to chemical warfare.

Education of special kind, adapted to the new means of offense and defense, is required.

To borrow an illustration from my distinguished Democratic colleague, Senator CONNALLY, of Texas:

"Bob Toombs, a Georgia Congressman, speaking in an election campaign in Georgia, before the war between the States, said: 'We can lick the Yankees with cornstalks.'

"After the war, he was again on the hustings, when someone in the audience interrupted him: 'Say, Bob, didn't you tell us before the war that we could lick the Yankees with cornstalks?' To which he replied: 'I did. But the "Damyankees" wouldn't fight with cornstalks.'"

We need to realize that dodging the issue, or slow, inadequate, piecemeal rearmament, and postponing conscription, would have the same consequence of helplessness as they had in France and Britain.

For their own personal efficiency and safety the manpower of this country must be enlisted and trained—men for operation of the weapons, and men for maintenance of the basic support.

Justice and protection for all, rich and poor, dictate the application of the principle of compulsory enlistment—selective service conscription.

The main objection thereto springs from the premise that heretofore we have not compelled general military training and service until we have gone to war. Therefore, it has been regarded a war measure, not a peace measure. This is a fallacy of logic. Recent experience of the belligerents convinces that preparedness ought to be fully made in peace, if we are to avoid war. Conscription in actual wartime would not produce an army. It would only bring together an untrained, almost defenseless crowd, who might have to combat well trained, hardened troops.

Men must be trained before we need them; it will be too late after we need them.

A selective-service law is necessary to secure the required personnel for peacetime strength. It is necessary to raise an army for the larger program of emergency.

Passage of such a law would bring to the citizen the reality of his duty to country and the stimulus for speeding up rearmament.

The enemy will not fight with cornstalks.

The only way to have a standing army and an adequate reserve and a home defense strong enough to keep this hemisphere immune from attack is to start now with the organization of compulsory selective military training in time of peace for service in the event of war.

WE UNITE, WE ARM, WE ENLIST

As a free people, aware of certain danger, and aroused to our noblest effort to defend the vital spiritual, political, and economic principles which are the foundation of our civilization, we organize our "powers in such form as (to us) shall seem most likely to effect (our) safety and happiness."

On this anniversary the soul of America is animated by the determination to resist tyranny and to promote freedom—that freedom which the Declaration of Independence rang out to an oppressed world like a bell in the heavens.

ADDRESS BY REAR ADMIRAL C. H. WOODWARD, UNITED STATES NAVY, COMMANDANT, THIRD NAVAL DISTRICT, ON THE OCCASION OF NATIONAL PREPAREDNESS DAY CEREMONIES UNDER THE AUSPICES OF THE AMERICAN DEFENSE SOCIETY, COURT OF PEACE, NEW YORK WORLD'S FAIR, JULY 4, 1940

Today, throughout the length and breadth of our land, and wherever else our beloved Star-Spangled Banner flies, our fellow American citizens are celebrating the glorious Fourth with patriotic fervor. Thus once more are we and our children reminded of the wonderful achievements of our forefathers and of the great heritage they left for us to enjoy.

This is the one hundred and sixty-fourth anniversary of our independence—that day of days upon which our forbears cast off the tyrannical yoke that had borne so heavily upon them; when they established the democratic Union which has stood for upward of six generations and endured the acid test of its various wars, from Valley Forge to Chateau-Thierry, including a war between the States.

It is not my intention, at this time, to review the patiotic actions of those loyal Americans in the days of 1776 and subsequently, as glorious as they are. I shall speak more pertinently of the present and of the obligation of that great body of patriotic American citizens upon whom after all rests the final responsibility for national security.

Twenty-two years of peace is one of the multitude of blessings bestowed upon the United States since the World War. In fact, viewing what has happened and is now happening in many other countries in the same 22 years, we should count that peace our supreme blessing and attempt to make it permanent.

The average American citizen believes in peace and has a horror of war. I can truthfully say, however, that we, members of the armed forces of our country hate war even more than the average American citizen. And this for the very good reason that we are the first to suffer and to die in any conflict with a foreign power. From our personal experience in war we know its realities. The world knows its consequences. As a matter of fact, we belong to the greatest pacifistic organization in the country—the Army and Navy—our mission in life being to prevent war by preserving peace. To accomplish such a mission, however, requires a proper and efficient national defense, both on shore and on the high seas.

A study of our history shows that it was only through war that we became a free and independent people. It was only through the acid test of subsequent wars that we have endured as a nation and retained that freedom and independence so dearly bought. It was only through a long series of sacrifices and armed conflicts that we secured the peace we now enjoy.

To preserve government in any form—be it a radical dictatorship or a conservative democracy—requires a backing-up by sufficient force to maintain it against opposition from within or invasion from overseas. Today the world is in a most unbalanced and chaotic state. It is filled with increasing distrust and growing alarm for the future, and no one can predict how soon the United States may be called upon to defend itself. We have seen pacts broken, treaties violated, and territories of weaker neighbors attacked and annexed at will by certain powerful aggressive predatory nations.

These latter thrive on war or on threats of war which keep the world in a jittery state of fear for the future. Upon such nations sentimental ideas and soft diplomatic words are of no avail. In this world gone mad, where ever-mounting tension prevails, the cause of peace requires more positive assurance than mere "pieces of paper." It requires the additional safeguard of a proper armed preparedness.

During our 162 years of existence we have engaged in six major wars, including that of the Revolution. In each of these conflicts we entered in an utterly unprepared state, both on land and on sea, despite previous tragic experience. Our experience in the World War was no different. More than half of our soldiers were sent to France in borrowed ships to fight the war with munitions and equipment purchased from the Allies. During our entire participation (except for naval guns) we never fired an American cannon nor flew an American airplane. Further comment regarding our criminal lack of preparedness is superfluous.

Never before, in the history of the world has there been a more difficult period than that which we are now facing. Present conditions should give us a deep and anxious concern, for our enormous stake in the world must be protected at all costs.

Never before, in times of peace, have the American people had greater need for calm consideration of facts and cold precise reasoning regarding our national safety than exists today. The rapid marching events in Europe, particularly during the past few weeks, have been a terrible awakening to us and made us seriously realize that the country must be safeguarded against all potential aggressors, and that as quickly as possible.

Never before have our people been so fully impressed with the value of naval and military preparedness. The appalling sacrifice of blood and treasure, forced without warning upon small and peaceful nations, and their ruthless devastation and dismemberment—because of their inability to protect themselves—have been brought vividly to the consciousness of our citizens and made them take account of our own national security status.

Never before has it been so apparent that we no longer enjoy that splendid isolation once vouchsafed by the oceans to the east and to the west of us. The constantly increasing radius of submarines and the ever-extending range of airplanes have steadily reduced the defensive value of those previously considered formidable barriers.

An understanding of these facts—vital consideration of which has been brought to us by the present war in Europe, with its measureless horror and suffering—has resulted in a Nation-wide demand that our Government take such steps as will protect our coasts and frontiers against wanton assault.

This demand expressed in other words is that we build and equip a Navy—our first line of defense—powerful enough to defeat the naval force of any single potential enemy nation or combination of nations.

In addition, it means that we must buttress our second line by making our coast and harbor defenses impregnable and raising and training an Army strong enough to adequately defend the lives and property of our citizens in continental United States plus those in such overseas possessions as may be liable to attack.

Today, we are at peace with the world. Nevertheless, it would be mere rashness on our part to assume that the general world situation may not produce our embroilment with dramatic suddenness. It would be criminal negligence for us to close our ears to the warning cry of reason and not prepare for any eventuality.

The world faces militant ambitions of authoritarian states. The war-burdened Far East, in chronic turmoil, has been ablaze with the fury of a life and death struggle for nearly 3 years, while jittery Europe—since the so-called peace of Munich—has been the arena of several successive bloody conflicts for balance of power in the coveted place of desired power of balance. International hatreds and conflicting interests exist everywhere. Nations once more are welding alliances, here and there, and playing the dangerous game of jockeying for position just as they did prior to and after the beginning of World War No. 1. They show no signs of a sincere effort either to maintain or to prolong peace with their neighboring states. The roar of cannon drowns out the sound of peace bells. Wars and rumors of wars fill the earth and the world seems not to know the meaning of peace.

The present European war has indelibly impressed our people and made them think more concerning our future security. Its very rapidity of development has been astounding. Emotional reaction in the United States is one of fear for the future, that unless we be prepared against any eventuality, and on short notice, we might be drawn into the conflict. It is too late to start after war begins.

In this modern age where force is in the ascendancy, the god of battle is with the strong. Though we refuse to accept the dictum that "might makes right," nevertheless we must be prepared to challenge its truth. Therefore, while forces for war remain greater than forces for peace, as we find them today, prudence dictates that we, as a Nation, must continue to build up our national defense to such strength that no aggressor nation dare challenge us. The responsibility of the Army and Navy to the public requires it; our national safety demands it. Only thus can we expect to enforce the respect due us from other nations.

No domestic problem is now, or can ever be, more pressing than the enduring requirements of the country's security. That is why we have seen such a spontaneous, unified, and overwhelming country-wide approbation of the President's recent recommendations for increasing the numbers and efficiency of our armed forces. That is why we have gotten such quick action in Congress.

We cannot afford longer to gamble with fate and national safety through disgraceful unpreparedness, like that of previous decades, and thereby endanger the present generation in another costly and demoralizing war. Being the richest country on earth and with unlimited resources, we must be able to protect these riches and resources from covetous aggressive potential enemies.

As true today as when first uttered by the great Admiral Nelson: "A line of battleships is the best negotiator in the world." Experience, as recorded in history, shows that a strong navy is not only the best protection against the hazards of war, but also the greatest bulwark of peace. No nation having full command of the sea has ever yet lost a war.

Our late beloved Justice Oliver Wendell Holmes once said: "A page of history is worth a volume of logic." Therefore, before it is too late, let us profit from the knowledge gained in the past, and at such great cost.

The need for national preparedness is as acute and unquestionable today as ever in our history, perhaps even more so. It is the country's most tangible insurance policy, and the cheapest in the end. One must consider that wars resulting from lack of preparedness are infinitely more costly than the maintenance of a strong and efficient Army and Navy, not only in mere dollars, but more particularly in the needless and tragic loss of the flower of American manhood.

Our country has never been militaristic nor aggressive, and consequently, until recent years, has given little serious thought to maintaining either the sufficiency or the efficiency of our armed forces. This policy—or, more correctly said, inexcusable and criminal lack of policy—has certainly not kept us out of war, as our history shows. Rather, it has caused the needless sacrifice of hundreds of thousands of our menfolk because of their being sent into battle without proper training and without proper equipment.

The loss of battles, whether they be on land or sea, may have been previously effected in the National Congress, by the Cabinet, or in the Departments of the Army or Navy. But wherever lost, it is the people who suffer, and the soldiers and sailors who die with the knowledge and conviction that the national-defense policy of their Nation was a triple crime against life, property, and liberty. In all fairness to those who may be called upon in future national crises to answer the call of duty such policy must be changed.

As a matter of fact it has been materially improved during the past few years. Also, there has been a great change in the country in recent months regarding national preparedness due to awakened public interest. The fast-moving events in Europe, which have so startled, stunned, and bewildered us, have caused our people to think more soberly about our future security.

Anyone who reads the newspapers or listens to the radio today will agree that the United States has become more Navy-conscious, for example, in the last 10 months than in the previous 19 years—since the Washington Naval Conference of 1921—and considerably more so in the past 6 weeks than in the last 10 months.

It is difficult for the mind of the average citizen to realize the definite advantages of national preparedness, or to grasp the importance of his personal aid and cooperation in this momentous subject. Nevertheless, thoughtful citizens, generally, realize now that when guns are rumbling in Europe and Asia it is folly to remain unprepared and thus subject our nationals to the barbaric treatment meted out to the unfortunate peoples of other countries. In this connection every patriotic American must force himself to face facts, however unattractive these may be.

A Navy second to none is the greatest contribution our country can make as a stabilizing factor toward world peace. Undoubtedly, building and maintaining such a Navy will require large annual appropriations from Congress, but as a safety measure and insurance against war the money so spent would be a drop in the bucket in comparison to the cost of another war and its aftermath. Weakness invites aggression. It is a wise precaution to let the world know that we are able to protect ourselves.

In conclusion I desire to quote certain excerpts from the writings of that great American and former President, Theodore Roosevelt, who, by virtue of his studies and intimate knowledge regarding naval affairs, was especially competent to judge our naval needs. He said:

"The strong arm of the Government in enforcing respect for its rights in international matters is the Navy of the United States. * * * It is emphatically the peacemaker. Woe to the country if we permit that right arm to become palsied or even to become flabby and inefficient. * * * I most earnestly recommend that there be no halt in the work of upbuilding the American Navy. There is no more patriotic duty before us as a people than to keep the Navy adequate to the needs of the country's position."

Significance of the Monopoly Committee

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SHERIDAN DOWNEY

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 9 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JOSEPH C. O'MAHONEY, OF WYOMING

Mr. DOWNEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address delivered by the able and sincere Senator from Wyoming [Mr. O'MAHONEY] before the National Townsend Club Convention at St. Louis, Mo., on July 1, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

When your national secretary, Mr. R. C. Townsend, invited me to speak to this gathering on the work of the so-called monopoly committee, I was prompt to accept because the work of this committee and the movement you represent are both characteristic of the times in which we live. This organization of yours came into existence, because it was obvious to thousands of men and women all over the country that our economic system had completely broken down and that new remedies were clearly needed to restore and stabilize prosperity. The monopoly committee was created because Congress and the President felt that an inquiry of broad scope should be undertaken in a spirit of impartial research in the hope of discovering the causes of the break-down.

The Townsend movement is doubtless better known to a larger number of people than is the work of the committee, but both are manifestations of a new era which can no longer be satisfied by the empty political phrases of the old order. It is significant, I think, that both are national efforts to solve a national problem, and both are wholly independent of outworn political divisions.

Party lines mean little nowadays, because the problem with which we are dealing rises above mere partisan labels, and frankness compels the acknowledgment on the part of any person who pretends to look at conditions as they are that the old political formulae have not been at at all successful in meeting the needs of our time. If any proof of this were needed, it would be found in the fact that within 2 weeks a Democratic President has summoned two outstanding Republicans to his Cabinet, and a Republican Convention has nominated as its candidate for President a man who, until comparatively recently, was a registered Democrat.

The founder of your movement was "ahead of the trend," as the phrase goes, in realizing that there could be no hope of restoring and stabilizing prosperity without first restoring and stabilizing the ability of the masses of the people to purchase and use the products of commerce and industry. He was "ahead of the trend" in realizing that a broad system of old-age pensions would be a necessary and effective means of bringing about this stabilization. He was "ahead of the trend" in realizing and in preaching that society as a whole owes an obligation which it cannot avoid to those of its members who, by reason of the passage of time and the complexities of our industrial system, are no longer positively adjusted to our economic system as self-sufficient units.

OLD-AGE PENSION IDEA HERE TO STAY

The pioneer work has been done and every realistic observer of the present scene knows that the old-age pension idea is here to stay. New proposals are always resisted. Thirty years ago the fight was being waged for workmen's compensation. The suggestion that society owed an obligation to the worker who was injured in modern industry was denounced as a wholly outrageous and unwise extension of public power, as well as an unjustifiable invasion of individual independence and free enterprise. But no one can now be heard to question the wisdom of that social advance and it will not be long before no one will be heard to question the wisdom of a universal national system of old-age pensions.

Workmen's compensation paid by the State came about as a necessary result of the fact that personal contact between a worker and his employer was destroyed when industry became the activity of organized groups instead of the activity of individuals. Old-age pensions are necessary now because the continued expansion of industrial and commercial organizations has likewise destroyed the personal contact between the individual citizen and the organizations which carry on our economic life. Individual independence in the economic field has been greatly weakened by the conditions which have made organization necessary. In self-protection the people must step in through their Government to provide the universal system which will not only prevent unnecessary misery but which will maintain the whole group of older citizens as effective consuming units in the economic system, thus benefiting both the individual and the system.

SECURITY LAW INEFFECTIVE

The present old-age security law is clearly ineffective because it is unequal in its operation among the States and because it is based upon the principle of need instead of age. Gross injustices are unavoidable under a system which places upon persons who themselves are paid by the public the responsibility of determining the good faith and the need of the applicant.

Letters which come to me constantly from all parts of my State indicate that there is lack of uniformity even among counties in the administration of the law. Different welfare boards, though acting with the best of intent, have different standards by which they judge need, so that persons who are given aid in one county are denied it in another. In one State the beneficiaries receive only a few dollars and in another the meager maximum, although the cause of their distress is Nation-wide and the States as States are incapable of curing it.

The modern economic dislocation with which we have been struggling since 1929 is certainly not a local dislocation in any of its aspects. It is wholly national and that is why it is altogether necessary to apply a national remedy. The folly, therefore, of setting up an old-age assistance plan which is dependent upon the ability of the States to contribute to the pension fund is perfectly apparent. This is one principle which, it seems to me, has been clearly demonstrated by the studies of the Monopoly Committee.

During a period of more than 50 years modern business has been growing steadily more and more national in its scope. First, the railroads and the telegraph began to stretch across the continent abolishing State lines. Then came the telephone and the automobile and the good roads and, finally, the airplane and the radio. All of these instrumentalities had the inevitable effect of destroying the local character of much of the business upon which our economic life depends. Because modern industry is thus independent of geographical boundaries and because agriculture is necessarily still local and individual in character, the dislocation between agriculture and industry slowly began to become more and more important. As the agricultural problem grew, it naturally became more and more difficult for the older members of the rural population to maintain themselves in any degree of stability and self-sufficiency in their later years.

ADJUSTMENT OF AGE TO COMPLEX ECONOMY

In the city at the same time the same problem of the adjustment of age to complex industry began to be evident. The factory worker, having been moved from the land to the city, was no longer economically self-sufficient, but was dependent upon his job in industry. The steady advance of industry at the same time made his job more and more uncertain with the result that his ability to provide for his old age was undermined. Thus it is that the problem of old age is firmly tied to the problem of economic development and if we grant, as everyone does grant, that the economic problem must be studied and settled upon a national basis, so it follows that the problem of old-age pensions must likewise be settled upon a national basis.

The great obstacle to the establishment of a satisfactory system sooner than this has been the uncertainty which has been felt among members of Congress with respect to a method by which the payments are to be financed. Legislative bodies never like to levy taxes and except in a great national emergency like that which has been occasioned by the unanimous decision of the people of America to be rearmed for purposes of defense, it is always difficult to secure the enactment of tax bills.

One thing is certain, however, namely, that taxes are paid out of production. If we are to meet the challenge of our time and make possible not only the payment of old-age pensions, but also the reopening of opportunity to every citizen, young and old, we shall first have to discover how to increase production and open the door of opportunity to all.

We have fallen into the unfortunate habit of dividing into minority groups, each seeking what it believes to be its own welfare, without regard to the welfare of all. The consequence has been that in all lines production has been restricted in order to increase price. The practices of monopoly are not confined to the traditional monopolists, but have been adopted on too broad a scale by many other groups. Taxation, therefore, on restricted production cannot be expected to produce results, and even the payment of old-age pensions, like the payment of subsidies and other methods of Government spending, will not operate to restore prosperity. We must completely reverse our thinking, and, instead of trying to raise prices by controlled production, we must undertake to reduce prices and thereby stimulate production and reemployment.

It is for this reason that I have been preaching the adoption of the principle of what is called incentive taxation. I want to see a new tax law which, by the allowance of tax credits, will recognize the social service that is performed by the employer of labor. I want to extend a positive reward to every man and every corporation that creates new opportunities for work by creating new industries. When production and employment have been stimulated, and, I firmly believe, not before, will it be possible to make the universal national system of old-age pensions work.

WORK AND OPPORTUNITY FOR THE MASSES

Let no one imagine that the world crisis diminishes the necessity of solving this purely practical and homely problem of providing work and opportunity for the masses of our people. There can be no permanent profit in war or in preparation for war. Our people are ready to prepare to the utmost to defend themselves because they want to prevent war from coming to our shores in order that we may all engage in the productive enterprises of peace. While they are willing, therefore, to prepare for defense, they are not willing to forego the necessary organization for peace.

If I were to be asked to say, as a result of the work of the Temporary National Economic Committee, what the most essential factor is in organizing for peace, it would be the adoption of what may be called a national economic "constitution," that is to say, a national system which would adjust the privileges and responsibilities of economic organizations to the rights and needs of individuals. This country was founded by men who recognized the fact that people come first, that they have rights which rise above the rights of any organizations of people. The Declaration of Independence and the Constitution of the United States—indeed, the constitution of practically every State in the Union—makes clear our fundamental concept that governments are formed to preserve and retain the inalienable rights which men derive directly from their Creator. In other words, people set up their own governments, if they are self-governing, and governments are set up for them and are imposed upon them when they are not self-governing.

When we talk of political freedom, therefore, we are talking of the right of the people as individuals to participate in governing themselves and to determine the very form of their Government. The trouble in the modern world is that economic freedom has been undermined and, as a result, political liberty is being threatened. Economic freedom has been undermined because economic organizations have superseded individuals in dominating and controlling our economic liberty.

If the people have the right to dominate and control the form and the function of their political organization, surely they have the right to control the form and the powers of all economic organizations. This right is legally and technically recognized, but in practice it is not exercised. Economic organization has escaped regulation in the public interest and the result has been unwise and unworkable efforts at Government control or even the invasion of the field of business by Government.

The elderly citizen knows very well today that he is not a self-sustaining unit. The so-called little-business men and the farmers likewise recognize that they are not self-sustaining units. There was ample testimony before the monopoly committee to show that many economic organizations are self-sufficient. These organizations which display a high degree of efficiency and which make available, on a scale never before known, the benefits of science and invention are, in many instances, financially stronger than most cities and many States. In fact, and it is no criticism of them to make note of the fact, they are economic governments and neither the individual nor small organizations can successfully cope with them.

An economic organization, like a political organization, justifies itself only to the degree that it serves people. The function of a political organization is governmental. The function of an economic organization is economy and we shall not begin to solve the economic problem of our time until we recognize the fundamental fact that Government invades the function of business and free enterprise only when business and free enterprise fail to provide employment for the masses.

Everyone recognizes that in our time the powers of government have been steadily expanding, but we seem to fail to understand that this expansion of the powers of government has come about as a result of our failure so to adjust the modern world as to enable business to serve people without the intervention of government.

FUNDAMENTAL AMERICANISM

Two principles fundamental to all American thought have been constantly violated throughout the last generation, with the inevitable result that we are faced now with a world catastrophe. These two principles are:

First, that no economic organization and no group of economic organizations have the right or should be permitted to control the Government. The Government speaks for all and is designed to protect the rights of all. It cannot pass into the control of any group or faction or any man without loss to the fundamental democratic ideal.

Second, that the Government has no right and will not be permitted to control or direct the lives and the activities of the people. Its only power is to regulate those activities in the interest of all.

The reason why youth and age are both in a seemingly impossible economic dilemma is that in our time here and throughout the world big business has produced big government.

If I have learned one thing from the studies of the Temporary National Economic Committee, it is that the masses of our citizens, whatever their positions, whether executives in business or officials in public life or citizens in the ordinary walks of life, are all devoted to the fundamental principles of freedom upon which our country was founded. I am convinced that the overwhelming majority of these citizens are only seeking the way to revivify and expand our common America heritage. I am convinced that the fight against arbitrary power, whether exercised by business organizations or political organizations, has been won, and that our only task is to proceed at once to the reconstruction of free enterprise by the development of such an economic constitution as will clearly define the powers and responsibilities of all economic organizations and thus release for America and for the world the abundant energy of our people and the unlimited resources of our land.

The lamp of liberty seems to be going out in the Old World. We cannot be indifferent to its extinction because we know that freedom has been the basis of all the progress of civilization. The men and women who left the Old World and came to these shores during the past 300 years were moved by a desire to find a new home in which they would be free to live, to work, to pray, and to speak according to their own individual consciences. If America stands for anything, it stands for that freedom.

Freedom is individual; it is as individual as the human soul. It has been bequeathed to us by ancestors from the Old World whose political and religious concepts were based upon that fundamental doctrine of the responsibility of every man to his Creator and his freedom to meet that responsibility.

ECONOMIC FREEDOM ESSENTIAL

We have been completely blind to the significance of the events of our time if we do not realize that the present tragedy in Europe is the direct result of the failure of Europe to preserve economic freedom for the masses. Precisely the same forces which have abolished the significance of State lines in America have been at work in Europe. Statesmen of one country more concerned about preserving investments in other countries than in preserving liberty were content to endanger freedom in order to preserve what they thought was security. In the totalitarian states millions of unemployed, in the search for security, were content to surrender liberty to the dictators for all their pagan ideals, their dependence upon force and repudiation of every principle of democracy.

We can meet the challenge of the new despotism only by cooperation and sacrifice in the service of American ideals. Not by what we can wrest from others for ourselves but by what we shall share with one another shall we restore the soul of America.

Convention of Affiliated Young Democrats

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES E. MURRAY

OF MONTANA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 9 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES E. MURRAY, OF MONTANA

Mr. MURRAY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an address which I delivered before the Affiliated Young Democrats, Inc., of New York, on Thursday, June 27, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman and members of the Affiliated Young Democrats of New York, ladies, and gentlemen, it is a unique experience for a resident of far-away Montana to be invited to address the young Democrats of America's metropolis. Coming from the great wide spaces of the West I find myself deeply impressed by the fine, alert, well-informed, and loyal young Democrats I have met here today. I have the pleasure of knowing more intimately your energetic State president, Mr. Harold R. Moskovit, who is held in high regard in all democratic circles for his effective and able leadership of your splendid organization. The young folks of this and similar clubs throughout the country will be the leaders and molders of the future of our republic. I congratulate you on the early and active interest you are displaying in our national life.

I must confess that I accepted the invitation to come here tonight with some hesitation. The interests and problems of my Rocky Mountain region in the West and those of the industrial East are, in some respects, extremely divergent. Yet the fundamental issues and problems of our country as a whole affect and influence every section and every group in our population alike. I was urged to come to your convention by my very good friend and colleague in the Senate, your able and distinguished junior Senator, JAMES M. MEAD. He had hoped to be here himself but found it impossible to do so because of circumstances he could not control. He prevailed on me to be your guest tonight and occupy his seat at this session of the convention. In view of our most agreeable associations it is a real pleasure to attend your convention, and I appreciate this opportunity of expressing briefly my views on some of the serious questions affecting the welfare, the security, and the safety of our country.

At the outset, let me say to my young Democratic friends in New York, in this ominous hour, while hysteria runs rampant on every side: You are in a position to set an example to your fellow citizens by retaining your balance and remaining calm and loyal in your support of our great President, Franklin Roosevelt, and his liberal and progressive administration. Your Government needs your loyal support more than ever in its program of national defense and preparedness and in its courageous fight to retain the dearly won economic reforms and social advancements which have been made under the New Deal. The loyal and effective support of young Democratic organizations at this time throughout the Nation will encourage and inspire President Roosevelt in the difficult tasks that lie ahead.

The tragic events now transpiring across the Atlantic, where millions of lives have been blotted out by ruthless and bloody warfare; where age-old governments and democratic institutions are being toppled over almost daily, would seem to raise serious doubt as to the survival of freedom as we have known it in the past. History today seems to be repeating itself. It is recorded that in the fifth century of the Christian era European civilization experienced a long and devastating period of wars, finally resulting in widespread chaos and misery, described in history as the Dark Ages. This happened when the Imperial Roman Empire, through economic stagnation and decay, disintegrated. Confusion, famine, pestilence, and disease spread over the then known world, wrecking and destroying nearly every vestige of civilization and freedom. Today again contemporary conditions seem to indicate that there is a world-wide moral, intellectual, and economic recession intervening in the world. Confusion, bloodshed, and despair spread in every direction.

This brings up the thought in the minds of many that civilization may again be confronted with another period of dissolution and decay such as that memorable one which occurred 1,500 years ago when the Roman Empire declined, staggered, and fell because of its inability to solve its social and economic problems—problems which were strikingly similar to those confronting this country, and, in fact, every country today. History tells us that it was the failure of government—the inability of the rulers of that early period to solve its social and economic problems—which brought on the Dark Ages.

It behooves us in America not to contribute to this threatened world-wide chaos and confusion. Our country, blessed as it is with immeasurable resources and a morally and intellectually advanced citizenship, must preserve the great human progress which has been made on this side of the Atlantic. We in America must not be recorded in history as having supinely contributed to a new period of world-wide retrogression. But what, may I ask, are we attempting to do here to meet these dangerous conditions which confront us?

A few days ago I heard the keynote speech delivered at the Republican Convention at Philadelphia, and the ponderous efforts of an ex-President of our country to stampede the Nation against a liberal, progressive government. I was struck by the hollow ring, the willful insincerity, and the vagueness of their attacks on the splendid economic and social accomplishments of President Roosevelt's administration. These attacks and the pitiful platform they adopted, filled with contradictions and empty phrases, show a carefully planned effort to deceive and befuddle the minds of the American people.

Take, for example, this plank:

"We favor the extension of necessary old-age benefits on a pay-as-you-go basis to the extent that the revenues raised for this purpose will permit."

What do they mean by necessary old-age benefits? What revenue do they propose to raise? This plank offers only a deceptive insinuation. It is nothing but a snare and a delusion. The entire platform is just as vague and uncertain. It offers no consistent, definite, or intelligent program to guide the Nation on any issue. They evidently seek by subterfuge, misrepresentation, and evasion to wangle votes in the coming election to the end that they may destroy the real progress we have made. Their devices do not evidence the slightest semblance of statesmanship. At a time when most of the world has collapsed and the fate of our own country is at stake, they have little to offer except platitudes and generalities. Greed and lust for a return of control seem the impelling forces dictating their program.

They would seek to deceive the people of this country into the notion that the break-down of our economic system, and the mass unemployment, bankruptcy, and distress which we have experienced since 1929, are due exclusively to the necessary economic reforms effected by the present administration. They seek, with all the tricks of the demagog, to shift the responsibility for the economic collapse of 1929, and the destitution and distress which followed, onto the shoulders of President Roosevelt and the New Deal administration. It is the most brazen piece of political pettifoggery ever attempted in any Republican convention. Apparently the leaders of the Republican Party are laboring under the delusion that the American people are so densely ignorant of the facts of life that they may be completely confused and bamboozled. The American farmer or worker will get little encouragement out of this platform. If the Republicans can get away with such political deception and trickery before the American people, then God help the United States.

These so-called responsible leaders offer nothing but criticism, subterfuge, and abuse. They belittle every effort that has been made by President Roosevelt and a humane and progressive Congress to free the Nation from economic exploitation and deliver its citizens from destitution and starvation. They totally ignore the fact, known to every intelligent citizen, that it was the long period of economic manipulation and monopolistic practices of the Hoover and prior Republican administrations which brought our country to the verge of despair and bankruptcy. The history of that corrupt and dishonest period of American life has been indelibly written in the congressional hearings which followed the collapse of 1929. They are anxious now to forget that desperate period in our history; and, of course, not one honest word will they utter in regard to the great, humane record of the Roosevelt administration in rescuing the millions of homeless and jobless victims of the 1929 depression from the destitution and starvation they faced. It is only natural that the Republican Party leaders are bitter in their denunciation of a liberal government. That party, the party of special privilege, represents the substantial, prosperous classes; it represents the financial and industrial interests which dominate and control its national policies. They are, of course, opposed to every economic and social reform which in any manner interferes with their privileges or threatens their profits, regardless of how necessary or essential they may be for the preservation of our democratic system. They would prefer to risk ruin than to support progress and reform.

In his speech the other night, ex-President Hoover undertook to slur the efforts of President Roosevelt to reorganize and reform the Supreme Court of the United States. He described the new justices of the Supreme Court as totalitarian liberals. But all this vilification and abuse will not succeed in deceiving the American people. We realize that today we have a Supreme Court that will no longer arbitrarily block legitimate, constitutional legislation. The old reactionary-controlled Court, dominated by Republicans for half a century, blocked every effort of the people to bring about essential reforms. The Court, under that control, threw out such beneficent legislation as income taxation, child-labor regulation, agricultural adjustment measures, minimum-wage laws for women, measures for the protection of labor, and other like legislation essential to make our democratic system work, as it should, for the general welfare of the Nation as a whole.

The keynoter of the Republican convention the other night said: "The great productive processes of a free people under a system of individual enterprise have made this Nation the great power it is. It has given to our people the highest standard of living in the world." I challenge that statement as a fraud and a deception. The stark, unqualified truth is that the monopolistic practices of our economic system, fostered by Republican administrations, produced only an excessively high standard of living for the few and brought on in this country a low, miserable, wretched standard of living for the many. Uncontrolled, the system created the strange paradox of poverty amidst plenty—millions of free American citizens condemned to a life of destitution and want, while permitting excessive profits and fabulous wealth for the favored few. Every competent economist or student of American government understands this situation and has consistently pointed out its menace to our democratic system.

We all stand for and are anxious to preserve our American system of private enterprise, but we want to make it operate in the interest and welfare of the whole country. We regard it as the best system that has yet been evolved. We propose to correct it, to improve it and preserve it. President Roosevelt and the Democratic administration in Washington have done more to correct and preserve our economic system than all the Republican administrations in the last 40 years. It is not a question of promises or proposals. We have during the present administration produced a long list of actual, solid accomplishments, unmatched by any other administration in our history, for the welfare of the American people. If the keynoter of the Republican convention was sincere, he would confess that the Roosevelt administration has done more toward upholding democracy and improving the country materially, and toward the advancement of the social and economic welfare of the people, than in any half-dozen like periods in the history of our country.

Now let me say a word for national defense. This administration can well ignore all the misrepresentations now being circulated in the country designed to question our national defenses. A great hysteria is sought to be whipped up to frighten the American people into the notion that invasion is imminent and that we are incapable of defending our shores. The critics of the President's defense program aim only to frighten the people and discredit the sound efforts of the present administration to develop and expand our defenses. The people of this country stand solidly behind the President in his program of national defense which proposes to render this country impregnable against invasion or attack from any source in the world.

But let me warn you that the safety and security of the United States does not rest alone in a great mechanized Army or a super-Navy. Without a loyal, patriotic citizenry, armaments will prove to be a futile means of preserving the Nation. A nation, however highly armed, must also have a sound internal policy of economic and social justice. It must correct its economic and social evils or it will find itself at last in mortal peril. The great threat to the security and happiness of our country rests today in the battalions of our unemployed, created by the defective operation of our economic system. It rests in the millions of men, women, and children menaced by poverty and ill health. No powerful combination of warlike nations can threaten the United States half so seriously as these social and economic conditions of the country which are of our own making. Let us arm, therefore, against this dangerous enemy within our own gates which threatens to undermine our democracy.

The National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN K. GRIFFITH

OF LOUISIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1940

Mr. GRIFFITH. Mr. Speaker, I believe that the American people want their Congressmen to stay in Washington until the present European situation has been clarified; that they want the preparedness program rushed as fast as it is possible to do so; and that they want us to convert what we now have on paper into actual equipment without delay.

It is my belief that our people are willing to make every necessary sacrifice in order that we may be well prepared to defend this country which, in my opinion, will be the last bulwark of democracy that will remain at the end of the present conflict.

I am convinced that our people would prefer for the Congressmen who remain in Washington to do everything in their power to facilitate and urge the consummation of the preparedness program at the earliest possible moment; and also prefer that we refrain from indulging in partisan politics and the discussion of the merits and demerits of the different candidates for office in the coming November election. The Halls of Congress are no place for us to indulge in political discussions at the present time. Our constituents are more interested in the conflict that is raging in Europe, its outcome, and the effect that that outcome will have on the future of this country than they are in the merits and demerits of any of the candidates.

Our constituents, I am quite sure, are very anxious to have accurate information about how much equipment we have for our Army at the present time. It has been very hard for us to procure accurate information as to just what we had on hand and how much we will have on hand at the completion of our present program.

I will insert here, at this point, a table as of May 1, 1940, given by Gen. George C. Marshall, Chief of Staff, and Brig.

Gen. R. C. Moore, Assistant Chief of Staff for Supply, when they appeared before the Senate Military Affairs Committee.

Item	On hand May 1, 1940	Will be on hand upon completion of program
ANTIAIRCRAFT
3-inch guns	448	500
90-mm. guns		317
Directors	168	273
Height finders	142	276
Sound locators	194	801
37-mm. guns, antiaircraft	15	1,423
.50 caliber machine guns	1,014	1,682
SMALL ARMS
Semiautomatic rifles	38,000	240,559
37-mm. antitank guns	228	1,388
60-mm. mortars	3	3,756
81-mm. mortars	183	853
Machine guns, caliber .50 (pack)	83	962
FIELD ARTILLERY MATERIAL
75-mm. gun, modernized	141	1,432
75-mm. howitzer (field and pack)	90	319
105-mm. howitzer	0	120
155-mm. gun, long range	4	96
8-inch howitzer	0	48
COMBAT VEHICLES
Scout cars	485	1,346
Combat cars	114	208
Tanks, light M2A4	10	734
Tanks, medium M2	18	194
TRACTORS AND SPECIAL ORDNANCE VEHICLES
Tractors, light	93	120
Tractors, medium	261	550
Tractors, heavy	65	777
Trucks, small-arms repair	79	146
Trucks, instrument repair		53
RAILWAY ARTILLERY
8-inch railway gun and carriage		24

In the above table I especially want to call attention to several facts. General Marshall testified that we had only 10 medium tanks, light M2A4, and 18 tanks, medium M2. Of course, it has been stated by some that we had 114 combat cars which were confused with tanks; others confused tractors with tanks. In column 1 you will find listed everything that we have on hand at the present time, and in column 2 what we will have on hand upon completion of our present program. It will require at least 1 year or longer to complete the scheduled program.

I am satisfied that everyone who reads and studies the above table will realize how inadequately prepared we are at the present time, especially when we compare the amount of our equipment to that that the different warring powers of Europe possess.

A majority of the American people I know want us to complete this program, and possibly enlarge it, and to do so just as fast as it can be done.

Our people are looking to the Congressmen to stay on the job and to continue to urge the speeding up of the program, and do away with all unnecessary red tape.

I believe that all of our people should realize their own responsibility and not expect the Congressmen and the Army to do everything that is to be done. The people should cooperate in every possible way, especially by watching out for subversive groups such as "fifth columnists," and whenever they are found they should be immediately reported to the proper authorities.

It is my own opinion that the laws presently on the statute books should be enforced to prevent excessive profits being made by taking advantage of the emergency that exists. If we do this, we will have no so-called war millionaires created.

We should not tolerate strikes in Government munition plants that would hold up the manufacture of war materials, as I believe it will be very dangerous and might prove disastrous in the end.

I think that our people want and expect us to be frank and honest in our reports to them. They want and should have complete information about the condition and size of our Army and Navy; and I further believe it will be advantageous for all of the people to know that we are very inadequately prepared at the present time, both in manpower and equipment, and that it will require many months for us to build up the Army, Navy, and air forces to the point where we will be in good position to cope with a major power should we have war thrust upon us.

I am convinced that an overhelming majority of our people are opposed to our entering war unless it be in defense of our country or the enforcement of the Monroe Doctrine.

I have assured my people repeatedly that I will always vote against sending our men away from America to fight on foreign soil, but at the same time I have assured them that I would vote for whatever I thought was necessary to properly prepare us to defend our country.

Facing the Issue

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALONZO D. FOLGER

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1940

ADDRESS OF FRANK W. HANCOCK, JR.

Mr. FOLGER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Hon. Frank W. Hancock, Jr., before the Young Democrat rally of the Fifth Congressional District, Belvidere Hotel, Reidsville, N. C., Saturday, April 27, 1940:

FACING THE ISSUE

I don't have to tell you that I am glad to be back in the old Imperial Fifth again. I have been here many times before, and I have received many honors at your hands. Mostly I have been here in the role of supplicant, seeking your suffrage, in order that, in turn, I might prove worthy of being your Representative.

Now I seek nothing but your continued friendship and good will. That is not too much to ask, because I return both with ample interest and a full measure of genuine affection. I am able to come to you now, therefore, not as your agent who must report on the progress of a mission but rather as your neighbor and friend, whose sole interest is in the continued prosperity, contentment, and happiness of a favored community among the many communities of the Nation.

In 2½ months this Nation of ours will be facing the strain of a Presidential campaign. It will be a campaign in which the effect of the war in Europe will be straining our democracy. It will be a campaign in which men who think they are clever will try to confuse the big issues with a swarm of petty issues.

Those clever men are already at work. But they are going to learn something about our people that they haven't known before.

They are going to learn that our people have become wise to the methods of politics in the last 8 years. They are going to find that today one issue and one alone matters.

That is whether this Government by the people and for the people is under a type of leadership which can give immovable security to that form of government.

If the reactionary and selfish interests which own the Republican Party recapture power, there is nothing in the record to assure us that they would not wreck our national unity and security by refighting all of our domestic accomplishments of the last 8 years. But if the liberal democracy of the Democratic Party retains power, we can advance from where we are in unity and security to even better and finer things.

In 2½ months' time a few decisive days are going to determine the future of our country.

In times like these the nominating conventions that for all practical purposes determine the limits within which the people may choose a President of the United States are just as important as the election itself. For in these days when we desperately need a sense of national unity the candidates of the great parties for the Presidency of the United States must be men for whom the rank and file of the parties and of the country cast their votes willingly and gladly, and with full confidence and acceptance of the personal leadership of whoever is elected.

In the decisive days of the Democratic Convention the men and women from North Carolina who are here tonight are going to play their part.

Will we always be proud of what they do, or will we come to bitterly regret their action? It is for us to determine now.

Great and significant events will take place before and after July 15. There will be a Republican Convention in June, and a campaign will rage through this country in the summer and autumn, but the Republican Convention will be insignificant and the campaign will be won or lost according to what we do in Chicago.

Never before will a Presidential campaign have been fought under such critical and difficult conditions.

Never before will the man sent to the White House have been faced with tasks demanding such mastery of thought and action. Our people know this.

Now everybody is a liberal. Everybody is a liberal because everybody says he is a liberal. If you judged by words alone there would be little to choose from. But we know we cannot judge by words alone. There is a much sounder way to judge—a way which the Republicans do not like. It is better to judge by actions. Actions stand as specific monuments to the way people or a political party thought on a particular question. The actions of the Republican Party, when it was long in power, in defeating social security, the elimination of child labor, the guaranty of bank deposits, and the protection of the home—those were actions which stamped the temper and philosophy of the reactionary element.

They cannot wipe away those monuments to greed by mere words, no matter how smooth and silken their words may be. They are not convincing when they tell us that now, after all their years of obstruction, they have suddenly come to love all the reforms which the New Deal has given to the Nation. They are less convincing when they tell us that they not only intend to keep these reforms but propose to administer them better and with greater justice than Roosevelt has administered them. We know better. We know that social progress is better off in the hands of its friends than in the hands of its enemies.

In the last month those who know our people and have an ear for their voice have heard a great cry rising throughout this country. From the farmers of Wisconsin and Nebraska, from the workers of Pennsylvania and Illinois, this cry has come.

The people who gave Roosevelt a first term, with a mandate to rebuild a social order from the waste land of the country he inherited; the people who gave Roosevelt a second term, with a mandate to carry on his program for reemployment and progress—these people are now part of the great cry rising every day for 4 more years of Roosevelt to carry their program through to national security.

You have seen this movement rising. You know what it is. You know that it is not the sales talk given to you by the agents of a candidacy, or the result of a bargain in a smoke-filled room. It is the demand of a people deeply afraid that they may lose something desperately precious to them. Precious because to them Roosevelt is not merely a name in the papers. Almost every American has by this time actually seen him. Every American has heard his own desires expressed by him. To these people Roosevelt is something of themselves; he is the farmer, the worker, the small-business man. He speaks as they would like to speak because he feels as they feel.

These people want Roosevelt. They're not concerned with the abstract issue of any third term—the issue of whether or not someone said something or other fifty, or a hundred, or a hundred and fifty years ago. This is today. They are very much concerned with today's concrete issue of consolidating the security of 4 more years under the guidance of a man in whom they have confidence.

There may have been times in our history when it made little difference who sat in the White House or whether anyone at all sat in the White House, when the country could bungle along by itself without leadership, except that supplied by the barons of financial selfishness. There are many former Presidents of the United States whose names the average man does not even remember, because they made no difference and in the times in which they served it was not necessary that they should make a difference.

But our times are not and will not be such times. These are times when a second-best President is like a second-best Navy—only an illusion of false security. These are times when the only President we can afford to have is the best President we can possibly get. And that best—and no one denies it—is Franklin D. Roosevelt. That goes for Republicans as well as Democrats. For I am not afraid to prophesy that if we Democrats succeed in drafting Franklin Roosevelt to run for President in November, many of our Republican friends will go to the polls and secretly vote for him.

I am not saying nor even intimating that the Democratic Party does not possess many men able enough and experienced enough to serve in the White House. I believe that our party possesses many men at the moment more able and more experienced than the average of all our Presidents. If we did not possess such leaders, we should be unfit to be a democracy and we, as the Democratic Party, should not be in power today.

But we should also be unfit to be a democracy if we are sufficiently unrealistic to be unable to recognize the perils of the time in which we live. Realistically speaking, we have got to recognize that this is far too dangerous a situation at home and abroad to take any chances which might imperil us during the time that would be required to develop anyone else to do the amazingly skilled and intricate job that the President is doing. We cannot be sure that anyone else, however capable and trusted he may have been in lesser positions, can step into that job overnight and be prepared for any emergency which may arise. And this is a time when we have to be sure; when we cannot take any chance of failure.

Our people know the dangers of this war situation. They know that Roosevelt is the only man they can be sure will carry this country safely through the next 4 years. They know that only ignorance of the true situation would prompt a belief that one man can keep us out of war as well as another.

Our people want Roosevelt because for them the real issue of 1940, the issue of security—of jobs, of profits, of peace—are expressed in him.

They want Roosevelt because he alone has proved his concern for them.

They want Roosevelt because at the time of failure of other leaders they trust him as they trust no one else in our economic and political life.

They know of no other man who has his knowledge of other nations. They know of no other man who has his knowledge of themselves.

They know of no other man who possesses the two vital qualities of leadership which other democracies have lacked—the quality of thinking like a man of action, and the quality of acting like a man of thought.

The lesson of the last 5 years is the lesson of the catastrophes caused by shortsightedness in the leadership of other democracies. And our people have not been blind to that lesson.

They know, too, the lesson of the last 4 weeks. They have seen how, in one swift overnight stroke, great peace-loving nations can be overwhelmed by force of arms and turned into battlefields, because their leaders were paralyzed with doubts. And our people have not missed that lesson either. They know that in a world of democratic statesmen without nerve, they need a man who has nerve.

We don't want to see this country turned into a battlefield. We don't want to see our peace destroyed overnight because we were not awake. We need a President who can see as far ahead and act as fast on the spot as any man in any country in all the world.

We have only one man we are sure can do that. Maybe others might develop. But we are only sure now of this one.

Our people know that, and so they want Roosevelt back.

And I, for one, believe that they are going to get what they want. Surely that would be democracy.

But remember this: For 8 years now, the President has been burdened with a tremendous responsibility. In the next 4 years, his responsibility will be even greater. It will not be easy for him, and I am certain that if he accepts the candidacy at all, it will be only if he is convinced that it is his duty and that his party is united behind him.

This is no time for us to be divided. In crucial times like these, the security of a great nation admits of no dilly-dallying. It is too late now to be setting up rival candidates and quarreling among ourselves, setting up stalking horses on the national scene to serve as chess moves in local politics. If we love our country we have got to admit that the time for political trading is over. The people of this country are watching us and waiting for us; and any deal that we make at their expense, we are going to suffer for for the rest of our days.

In the long run, it pays men in the art of politics to understand what the people want and to give it to them. If we fail to understand that and if we fail to raise our voices in one great unanimous cry so loud that the President cannot refuse, then we alone shall be responsible for the outcome.

There are many candidates in this country and many campaign managers. There is only one man whose real campaign manager today is the people, and the people alone.

Ever since the days of the Constitution it has taken a long time for us in North Carolina to make up our minds. But once our minds are made up, we never turn back.

All that his enemies can say against the President's return is that it has never been done before. That's right. But we never had all the banks closed before. We never had such a challenge to democracy before. We never faced such a dangerous and destructive world war before. And we never had a Franklin Roosevelt for President before.

Subversive and Un-American Groups

EDITORIAL FROM SOCIAL JUSTICE MAGAZINE

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, in regard to the action of the University of Michigan, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD by including therein a short editorial from Social Justice magazine, published by Father Coughlin, of Royal Oak, Mich., my home city, relative to the action of the University of Michigan in notifying several young men of communistic opinions not to return to the university the coming year and other related subjects.

Every thoughtful and loyal American will concur in the action taken in regard to that element in our Nation, which would overthrow this Government by force and violence and even bloodshed if necessary, and undoubtedly the great masses of the American people are of the opinion that drastic action toward these subversive groups is long overdue.

AMERICAN YOUTH CONGRESS

The University of Michigan has notified six young "reds" not to return to classes next year.

The American Student Union, a Communist-dominated youth organization, is already circulating petitions to demand the students' reinstatement and create a cause celebre for the young martyrs.

A lot of words will be used in speech and print without saying bluntly that the Communist Party is paying the tuition of young Jewish radicals in many Midwestern colleges, in order to recruit young Marxists, through the American Students Union and similar fronts.

Social Justice a year ago disclosed this scandal at the University of Wisconsin. Now, no doubt, Michigan, too has discovered it.

Gene Tunney, exfighter and an activist in Catholic youth groups, is reported plotting to "Trojan horse" the Lake Geneva convention of the American Student Union and convert it away from communism by the fine Christian zeal of his young Trojan horsemen.

The Tunney group is a little late. The American Student Union has been "red" a long time; it was born "red." And Mother Roosevelt has been coddling young Communists in the philosophy that their generation has a "constitutional right" to change a government that doesn't suit them.

We note that the Christian Endeavor Society, a Protestant group, has refused to have anything to do with the American Student Union. They report that observations at a number of conventions has convinced them that "Communist and subversive alien influences were of such a character and so powerful that the conference itself—though the majority of the members were thoroughly fine and representative young people—would be misunderstood, compromised, and its influence for worthy projects destroyed."

The Christian Endeavorers are to be commended for clear-sightedness.

Should a known "red" group be shunned or joined?

The Tunneyites, no doubt, believe that you can cure Communists by joining them. Whether this is courage or misdirected sentimentalism might depend on the result.

The same sort of adventuring in the radical labor movement did not turn out at all well.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HOMER D. ANGELL
OF OREGON
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE OREGONIAN, PORTLAND, OREG.

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Oregonian, of Portland, Oreg., published on July 3, 1940:

[From the Oregonian, Portland, Oreg., of July 3, 1940]

STATESMAN, LAWYER, FARMER

Senator MCNARY says that he wants to come home to his farm in Oregon to receive formal notification of his nomination by the Republican Party as its Vice-Presidential candidate. That is what everybody in Oregon wants, too. This State has not had a Vice-Presidential candidate since Joe Lane ran with Breckinridge, and that goes beyond the personal recollection of anybody hereabouts. We know of it only from reading history and biography. Not only do Oregonians wish to be in on the celebration, but they are aware that no setting for the event could be more appropriate than a farm home.

Senator MCNARY is a lawmaker by occupation, a lawyer by profession, and a farmer by avocation. There is nothing political in his interest in agriculture. It is an interest that awoke in him ere he ever thought of politics. His grandfather knew the vicissitudes of pioneering on an Oregon donation claim. His father was a farmer. He himself was born on a farm. He is a farmer by avocation out of love of the soil.

When he went to Washington 23 years ago as the newly named Senator from this State, he carried with him out of personal observation and personal experience a knowledge of the economic injustice that is endured by the tillers of the soil. He recognized the existence of a farm problem and set out to do something practical about it before Henry Wallace became coherent on the subject. He was up and acting about it long before the New Deal was shuffled. His sponsorship of the farm problem taught him his first lesson in congressional strategy. And he won through with a farm bill that bore his name, twice to encounter Executive veto. And it is a fairly common opinion among unprejudiced farm leaders that if the New Deal had, with blushing acknowledgment to Republican authors, accepted the principles of the McNary-Haugen bill and the equalization fee, farming would be better off than it is today under the substitutes that the New Deal contrived.

So it is fitting that the formal notification of his choice by the Republican Party for Vice President should be given down on the farm. It is a goodly farm, the McNary acres. It lies off a secondary paved road 5 miles from Salem. There are no proud portals to announce its presence. The passerby would not notice it unless he were scanning the names on every rural delivery mail box. Over a rise and not in view of the highway stands the attractive low-roofed residence, under tall shade trees, and graced by wide lawns and flower beds. Beyond the dwelling is the well-groomed orchard, and in between there runs a creek confined to pools whereon wild geese rear their young, and make constant conversation—perhaps of adventure in the far north or south and of daring leadership they have known.

It is a spot that invites retirement, and retirement thereto has been an ambition of Oregon's senior Senator. Two years hence that might have come true had he so willed it. It would not be asked of him or wanted of him by his constituents.

But Senator MCNARY is not a one-idea man. What he learned in his fight for better farming conditions he had put to use in a hundred ways. His affability, his poise, his shrewdness, his wisdom, made him a national leader in Congress. In addition to the respect in which he is held, his popularity among his fellows is said to be excelled by that of no other Member.

So when the leaders of the Republican Party told him in all sincerity that he was the perfect balance for the ticket whose head had been named he yielded whatever aspirations he may have had to remain as Republican Senate leader or retire to placid, uneventful, independent life on his Oregon farm when came the end of his term as Senator.

"Oregon is a great State," a revered Governor used to say over and over. It is great in length and in breadth, and many other ways, and far and near within it live the friends of CHARLES L. MCNARY. On that day that the farm calls him home to receive the formal word of his nomination they, too, will find their way to the broad lawn that embellishes the low-roofed residence among the trees, to join in the national acclaim that has come to a native son of Oregon.

The Hatch Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. C. ARTHUR ANDERSON
OF MISSOURI
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1940

Mr. ANDERSON of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, this House, under our form of government and under our Constitution, is the one direct representative agency of the people and in that capacity wields a tremendous influence upon the belief or disbelief of the American people in the efficacy of democracy.

Almost from the first days of the Republic the House of Representatives has come in for criticism, which at times has been most bitter and unjust. Yet criticism of public officials and those who hold the public trust is one of the ingredients of democracy. It lies within the power of the Congress to mitigate public criticism of its conduct by speedy recognition of the people's mandate and direction.

From all sides and through every medium of public information—the press, over the radio, and by mail—a storm of protest and condemnation has raged over the heads of this honorable body for many weeks because, until this hour, we have ignored the overwhelming sentiment of the people in refusing consideration of the Hatch bill. Now, however, we are about to employ one of the cherished first principles of democracy, namely, to heed public will by bringing this highly important measure out onto the floor for full and free discussion. By our action today we are doing much to restore and to strengthen the confidence of those we represent.

Many weeks have passed since this legislation was approved in the other body by an overwhelming majority. During the time the Hatch bill was being fully and freely debated in the Senate the President of the United States let it be known that he believed this to be proper legislation, particularly in view of the original Hatch law which he advocated and approved as highly desirable. The American people stood squarely behind their President in calling for passage of this legislation, which is so necessary and so desirable to rekindle faith in democracy which is now challenged on many fronts.

The public, Mr. Chairman, is fully aware of the identity of those forces which are opposed to this legislation and are seeking at every step to hamper and discredit its program.

The public knows that those same forces have in the past selfishly disregarded the rights of the thousands who earn their livelihood as employees of the Federal Government, the various States of the Union, and the political subdivisions thereof.

The public is fully aware that the foes of this legislation are those who have created and fostered an extreme and reprehensible application of political patronage methods until it can be justly termed the loot-and-spoils system. The public is not deluded into the belief that the foes of this legislation are sincere in their contention that it will deprive anyone of his or her rights as a citizen, because the public knows that those who offer this contention are the very ones who have demanded and received financial tribute from protesting and helpless thousands and have cracked the lash of bossism over the heads of those whom this legislation seeks to free from political peonage.

In these days no believer in democracy hesitates to condemn the ruthlessness of the foreign dictators. Are we to be balked when we attempt to eliminate their sordid methods from our own political picture? In these days when the tide of democracy seems to lower with each succeeding sunrise we seek, by this legislation, to reassure the people of this Nation of the inherent integrity of their political parties and in the sincerity and honesty of their leaders. In passing the original Hatch law by a very substantial majority this House clearly indicates that it will not permit this necessary extension of that law to sink into oblivion.

I am confident that the membership of this House will rise, as it has many times, above anything that savors of political bossism or expediency and pass this legislation, not only because of its vast importance but because we will then prove that the criticism thus far voiced against us for failure to pass this legislation is unfounded and that we are seeking to serve rather than to rule the Nation.

One-Man Head Is Urged for United Services

ARTICLE BY GEN. WILLIAM C. RIVERS

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, one of the country's outstanding military authorities, Maj. Gen. William C. Rivers, United States Army, retired, again appeals for a Department of National Defense as the best means of providing the American people with the security to which they are entitled.

Under date of June 23 the following article by Gen. William C. Rivers appeared in the New York Times:

[From the New York Times, June 23, 1940]

DEFENSE CONTROL—ONE-MAN HEAD IS URGED FOR UNITED SERVICES

To the EDITOR OF THE NEW YORK TIMES:

I am anxious to discuss some features of your several editorials on a defense program. You make it clear that defense is a problem of the Nation and not merely of the Army, Navy, or Air Force.

You state, "At present we do not have any agency whose business it is to study the problem of the national defense as a whole." And, "The heads of the Navy and the Army each makes his separate report and his separate request for appropriations." We can add that each evaluates from his own viewpoint the lessons from the war in Europe.

Some further remarks in your discussions are, "The jealousies and frictions existing between our Army and Navy, and between air and ground officers, must be eradicated." And, "Within the War and Navy Departments there is still a clear need for reorganization in the interest of unity, and the elimination of overlapping functions." Also, "We should do well to follow the example of France and create a war college at which officers of the Army, Navy, and Air Corps and related civilian officials, could study the problems of unified high command."

COORDINATION A FACTOR

Your suggestion for a war college does not go far enough. Many observers have said that "the secret of Germany's successes is coordination." Among the other lessons from the fighting are the increased power of air bombers over war vessels and ground troops. Also, Britain's great need for a cabinet minister of defense to control the operations of her three services.

I am convinced that no halfway measure can be effective. The dominant task for those responsible for our defense is to establish effective coordination between our three armed services. We need an agency to control the three branches, not merely to coordinate them. Coordination involves—or at least invites—suggestion, advice, compromise, which spell delay.

This control must be by a civilian and not by an Army or a Navy officer at the head of a war college. Also, a civilian must be the principal adviser of the President as to policy making, rather than the military director of the war college. A small national-defense college might well be a part of the staff of the cabinet minister of defense. It is interesting to recall that General Goethals, who built the Panama Canal, said he made use of his assistants to aid him, but that he felt a board or committee was not effective as an executive agency.

ONE CONTROLLING HEAD

Why not allow the President one additional Cabinet officer, a secretary of defense, to aid him in supervising the three armed branches? This controlling minister would not only inspect the relative progress of the three branches but he would be in actual command of them. The three heads of the Army, air force, and Navy would be civilians—assistant secretaries. These ought to be permanent.

Unity of command for the President would be increased, with but one Cabinet member to consult on defense matters. Unity of command of the heads of the Army and Navy would result from having the parts of the Air Corps which go to war with those branches train all the time in peace under Army and Navy command, respectively. Graduates of West Point and Annapolis would enter the Air Corps as at present and be assigned to serve respectively with the Army or with the Navy portion of the Air Corps. The Chief of the Air Corps would control the air force reserve, subject to orders of the secretary of defense, to reinforce either branch. The Chief of the Air Corps would have charge of the research, procurement, and supply services, and of the land schools for preliminary aviation training.

Vicksburg, Pickens, Santiago, Gallipoli, and many other places illustrate the confusion which could have been avoided by coordination of the Army and Navy forces engaged.

John W. Weeks was well trained to be Secretary of War. He was a graduate of Annapolis and had extensive business experience on resigning from the Navy. He was earnestly in favor of a department of national defense. From his own experiences Secretary Weeks said there was at Washington administrative overlapping and administrative conflict, as well as departmental antagonism. Gen. Robert L. Bullard, the late John J. McSwain, chairman of the House Military Affairs Committee, the late Speaker Byrns, and others have written in favor of a department of defense.

SERVICE OPPOSITION

A natural question is frequently asked, Is it proper to recommend such a department when we know that most of the higher officers of the Army and the Navy are opposed to it? I understand that attitude. However, we are aware that most of the able higher officers are enthusiasts. We know that enthusiasts are likely to make errors in judgment from an excess of zeal. In a major crisis and in a matter of vital importance to our 130,000,000 people we are obliged to examine critically and weigh the views of all—of experts and all others.

Nineteen countries have adopted some form of the single department of national defense. Some gentleman in Congress or the Cabinet will rise up some day and master this subject of the national defense. He will become famous, as did Elihu Root.

Root did not originate the idea of adopting the General Staff for our Army or of creating a War College. However, he had the sagacity to see the value of these ideas and the political skill to get the Congress to pass the necessary laws. Quite a number of our highest Army officers were bitterly in opposition to Secretary Root's plan as to both the above projects.

Major General, United States Army, Retired.

Advantages of Living in a Small Town

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ROBERT K. GOODWIN
OF IOWA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 9, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY PAUL A. OLSON, EDITOR, STORY CITY (IOWA) HERALD

Mr. GOODWIN. Mr. Speaker, there recently came to my attention a radio address given by Mr. Paul A. Olson, editor of the Story City Herald, Story City, Iowa. This address is one of the finest expositions that I have ever seen on the advantages of living in a small town. Therefore I ask that this be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD:

My theme may be said to be cities—big and small.

Man early congregated in cities. The sacred page tells us that Cain built the first city and named it Enoch in honor of his son. It must have been a very modest city, but for that early time sufficed as a center for the development of the arts of a crude civilization. You recall that a grandson of Enoch was the "father of all such as handle the harp and organ." Another grandson was "the instructor of every artificer in brass and iron." Thus we note that the first city on record starts out by giving expression to man's dual nature—the artistic (or spiritual) and the practical (or physical).

In our day, as down through successive generations of peoples in all lands, we have builded cities that are glamorous in size and beauty, filled with great wealth and dire poverty, illuminated by the geniuses of commerce and art, and degraded by graft and racketeering; ennobled by sacrificial living and debased by the lowest forms of sensualism; with high and mighty spires pointing heavenward, and the very portals of the deep pit thronged by thoughtless feet—such are our cities; and no wonder people who give heed to the signs of the times are asking for a way out.

THE SMALLER TOWNS

Now, the making of a smally town such as Story City—and I use this place as typical of many towns in Iowa and other States—actually requires more thought and effort on the part of a greater percentage of its individual citizens than is usually the case in larger centers. This is naturally true. Large cities owe their bigness to certain outstanding industries, managed by comparatively few people, and the common run of citizen paddles his own little canoe without much thought of whether or no he is contributing to the welfare of his community. The case is radically different in the smaller towns. What any one individual—certainly what any one family—does affects the whole community.

We rub shoulders pretty close in a small town. We have our competitions, sometimes leading to unkind words and rash actions, but in the long run the sober sense of the people produces a fellowship of feeling, and a realization of the need of standing together for the best interests of the community as a whole. It is this feeling of individual importance that breeds such slogans as "Trade at home," "Try your home town first," etc. There are, of course, people who have the notion that "the grass is greener" in the next town or city; but people who count in the long run are quick to see that their own interests are intimately bound up with the well-being of the town in which they live—and act accordingly. If they don't they are soon classified as "undesirable citizens." And "undesirable citizens" in this sense simply means folks who are not willing to scratch someone else's back in order that they may have their own back scratched in return.

WE KNOW EACH OTHER

All this leads to the thought that the small town is to be preferred to the big city as a place of residence. Our coming into such close contacts may lead us to see each others' faults, but it also enables us to take note of each others' virtues. Knowing that we are so well known keeps us humble. Each man and woman does his or her little bit in the upbuilding of the community without undue inflation and in the spirit of being glad to do it. When Grady, who later became the great editor of the Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution, was a young married man he got a job in New York City. One day he noticed there was crepe on the door of the house next to where he lived. He asked his wife who had died. She replied she did not know, as she was not acquainted with the people next door. "That finishes it," exclaimed Grady. "We're going back to Georgia where we know the folks next door!" And that is the difference between the big city and the small; in the former they not only don't know their next door neighbors, and seemingly they don't care to know them; out here, where there is room for grass and trees in every yard and sunshine lights all the windows of the home, there are no barriers of creed or race or station to keep us from being on friendly and neighborly terms with everybody.

KEEP GROWING

Someone asked Lyman Abbott, over 80 years old, yet fresh and vigorous in mind and body, how he managed to keep up his interest in so many things. Mr. Abbott's reply holds a secret not only for individuals but also for communities. He said: "Each year I try to grow a little new wood."

The community that does not frequently "grow some new wood" will infallibly stagnate. New wood is grown by the individual when he broadens his interests in life either by study or work or living contact with his fellow men. A church grows new wood when it "lengthens its cords and strengthens its stakes," in other words, when it aggressively performs its great mission in the world. A school grows new wood when it enlists and holds the attention of the rising generation in matters of the mind, the heart, and the body. Social organizations grow new wood when they persistently hold to the fine ideals that gave them birth.

And thus the community grows—perhaps not so much in population or wealth; but in better homes, better churches, better schools, better social surroundings, and a finer sense of community obligation and privilege.

In closing permit me to express our deep appreciation of his fine evening's program, several numbers of which are yet to come, and then, here's a ditty which expresses a thought I have been trying to put across, though I regret to say that I do not know who wrote it:

I like to live in a little town
  Where the trees meet over the street,
And you wave your hand and say hello
  To everyone you meet.
I like to stop for a minute
  Outside a grocery store
And hear the kindly gossip
  Of the folks moving in next door.

For life is interwoven
  With the friends you learn to know,
And you feel their joys and sorrows
  As they daily come and go.
So I'm glad to live in a little town,
  And I care no more to roam,
For every house in a little town
  Is more than a house—it's home.

Is United States a British Protectorate?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 9, 1940

ARTICLE FROM THE GAELIC AMERICAN

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a recent article from The Gaelic American, New York, July 6, 1940, on the subject, Is United States a British Protectorate?

[From the New York Gaelic American of July 6, 1940]

IS UNITED STATES A BRITISH PROTECTORATE?

At a luncheon, given on June 27, by the Military Training Camps Association in the Broad Street Club, New York, Governor Lehman, speaking in support of the compulsory-service bill, now before Congress, sounded a note of alarm. He is afraid that America may be deprived of the protection of the British Navy. He said with great solemnity:

"Let us face facts honestly. The only reason we have been safe in the past has been because we always have had the protection of the great fleet of a friendly sister democracy—Great Britain.

"Now France has been destroyed and England is called upon to carry on alone. I pray God that she may be victorious. I hope with all my heart that we will give England all possible material help and that our help will still be in time to strengthen her hands. She represents the last outpost of democracy in Europe.

"Obviously, we must do everything possible to protect ourselves."

It will be news to most Americans to hear that we now or at any time in the past have been protected by England's fleet. All Americans, irrespective of party lines, are agreed that we should have an adequate army, navy, and air force for safeguarding our country and protecting it against any hostile nation or combination of invaders from the east or the west.

With our population, resources, and wealth we can maintain a military establishment superior to that of any hostile combination of Old World powers. Fortunately Americans are united in the effort to make our forces and equipment so strong that no king or dictator will harbor, even in his wildest dreams, an invasion of the Western Hemisphere. Even at present, in the event of an unexpected emergency, our fleet could dispose of any expedition that would attempt an invasion of any part of the Americas. There is no need for hysteria, haste, or excitement.

What Governor Lehman failed to reveal is the enemy or enemies from whom we have been protected by the English Fleet. It is something new to American ears to hear that the United States is a mere British protectorate.

As far back as 1837, when the population was 17,500,000, Abraham Lincoln, in a speech at Springfield, Ill., said:

"Shall we expect some trans-Atlantic military giant to step the ocean and crush us at a blow? Never! All the armies of Europe, Asia, and Africa combined, with all the treasure of the earth (our own excepted) in their military chest, with a Bonaparte for a commander, could not by force take a drink from the Ohio or make a track on the Blue Ridge in a trial of a thousand years."

The great Lincoln never thought for a moment that his country was protected by any foreign nation or that it was in need of protection. Today our population is over 130,000,000, with resources that are the envy of all the Old World countries. The American who believes that his country's freedom is safeguarded by the English Fleet cannot be envied for his patriotism.

Let it not be forgotten that the Atlantic and the Pacific are almost insuperable barriers to the invasion of America. Also let it not be ignored that in new inventions we are well ahead of any military nation. The airplane and the submarine, the newest engines of warfare, are American inventions, and in mass production we are ahead of the world

Far from being a protection the English Fleet had at many times been a menace to the United States. In the War of 1812 that fleet attacked Washington and burned the National Capitol. The attack on Fort McHenry, Baltimore, inspired Francis Scott Key's immortal national anthem, the Star-Spangled Banner. In boundary and lake disputes between the United States and Canada the English Fleet was always at hand to back her Dominion. During the Civil War the same fleet was unfriendly, and the then Czar sent two fleets to America, one to New York and the other to San Francisco. This was a warning to any hostile powers that it would have to reckon with the Russian Fleets. It was fear of an American Fleet that prevented England from violating the Monroe Doctrine in the Venezuela dispute in which President Cleveland protected the independence of a South American republic.

Governor Lehman's statement may mislead those who are not versed in American history or world affairs. He should withdraw or clarify his remarks. At least he should specify when and where and from whom England protected the United States. Does he believe that America is one of the small nations, like Denmark, Holland, and Belgium, whose independence was guaranteed, but not safeguarded, by Great Britain? When did the United States become a British protectorate?

It is erroneous to link democracy with an imperialist nation like England, which has not extended representative institutions to India, where 350,000,000 people are ruled by a system of bureaucracy having its headquarters in London. The only stronghold of democracy in a world dominated by imperialism and totalitarianism is the United States of America.

The Monroe Doctrine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY HON. JOHN C. KUNKEL, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. KUNKEL. Mr. Speaker, recent events have clearly proven the folly of the recent partial definition of the Monroe Doctrine by legislative enactment. I ask leave to include as part of my remarks a radio address delivered over station WHP, Harrisburg, on June 22, 1940, on this subject. This speech points out some of the dangers and difficulties inherent in a partial, rigid definition of a well-known elastic doctrine, which had been tacitly agreed to by all foreign nations for years previously and which had been hallowed by age.

The maneuvers which are occurring around the French island of Martinique today suggest further serious problems which this enactment may create.

A number of people have asked me why I voted against the so-called and miscalled Monroe Doctrine resolution. I have yet to talk to anyone who did not feel, upon analysis of my reasoning, that my vote was correct, and anyone who takes the time to read the debate on the question on the floor of the House will find that a great many of the Members publicly expressed their disapproval of the measure and others who did not have the time and opportunity to speak on the question also felt that the United States was very probably making a grave mistake by enacting this legislation, despite their vote in favor of it.

Naturally, most people believe in the Monroe Doctrine, and I can assure them that I do so also, and that my vote against the resolution was so cast because I deeply respect, honor, and believe in the Monroe Doctrine and do not want to see it crippled and hamstrung by a partial legislative definition. The Monroe Doctrine has been a formal and integral part of the foreign policy of this Nation since 1823 when James Monroe first enunciated it in a message to Congress. In brief, it is a great "No trespassing" sign posted about the entire area. As the years have passed we have made it clear that the warning contained in it is addressed to all foreign powers, no matter where situated. Every President and every Secretary of State—no matter of what political faith—has adopted it and used it when, as, and if necessary and to the extent necessary. It has never been hampered by legislative definition but has been construed by our able Secretaries of State as each occasion arose, having in mind the particular facts and necessities of the specific occasion before them. It has always received the unanimous support of American people and there has never been during the past 117 years any question of our adherence to it. Consequently, the idea of reaffirming the Monroe Doctrine is ridiculous on its face and this resolution did not affirm it. If there is one element of our foreign policy whose general terms are understood by every nation in Europe and in the Orient, and by every member of every foreign state department, it is the Monroe Doctrine. Why should we attempt to state now in strait-jacket terms, useful for the moment perhaps but very probably harmful many times in the future, a fact which foreign powers have agreed to and tacitly admitted for many, many years? It seems to me to be a definite indication of weakness to even suggest that such a statement is necessary when the continued respect of this doctrine during the past decades has been an admission of its validity by every foreign nation. We take it from the class of things agreed to and admitted and indicate it is something new and not agreed to.

As far as transfer of territory to a foreign power is concerned this particular principle was clearly incorporated in the Monroe Doctrine on May 28, 1870, by a statement by President Grant relating to proposed transfer of Santo Domingo.

The growth and successful application of this policy, in my opinion, has been in great part due to the fact that it has never been specifically defined, that it has never been restricted or made rigid. Its greatest strength has been the very fact that ours at all times was the right and privilege of defining it as necessity directed and applying it as the occasion demanded. The fact that the policy has had a vague and gradual growth through the years has served, time after time, as the means of protecting and extending our sphere of influence peacefully. For with our growth into the greatest power in the world foreign nations carefully refrained from any interference of any nature in any country which might even possibly be construed as an infringement of this somewhat vague but well-established policy.

It is obvious that having defined our course of action so specifically we obligate ourselves to either enforce that course of action or else to lose national prestige by failing to do so.

Even more unfortunate, in my opinion, than the fact that the resolution attempted to define is the fact that it made only a partial definition. The resolution had two parts, the first of which provided that the United States "would not recognize any transfer, and would not acquiesce in, any attempt to transfer any geographical area from one non-American power to another non-American power." We can all agree that this is clearly within the scope of the Monroe Doctrine if it becomes necessary to apply it. It is much better stated and much more effectively stated in part of that half page of President Monroe's message of 1823 which gives the Monroe Doctrine. There President Monroe said: "We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers (this refers to the group of European countries with autocratic governments) to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system (the word 'system' here refers back to the political systems of that group of nations) to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety." It is generally admitted today that the real danger of extension of totalitarian doctrines into South America lies in their securing the political control of the government of some sovereign South American state. By this I mean that a group who embrace the ideas of the totalitarian powers may gain effective control of the machinery of the government in some specific South American nation or nations; and then later proceed to put into effect totalitarian political ideas and policies and proceed to grant concessions such as air bases and commercial concessions to various totalitarian powers. When we announce merely and only that we object to transfer from one non-American power to another of geographic areas, do we imply that we will acquiesce in such a situation? Here we have an actual danger to which President Monroe's original statement as to political systems would apply with force, yet which lie outside the scope of the present legislative definition. The present head of the Brazilian Government, President Vargas, recently publicly stated that he preferred the totalitarian ideas to those which we love and adhere to. Reports confirm that this was a concession to the "fifth column" now in Brazil.

Yet in the second proviso of the resolution we bind ourselves to consult with the other South American republics as to what action to take in order to prevent transfer of territory. This second proviso, in my opinion, clearly cuts into and limits our power to use the Monroe Doctrine for our national purposes and as the basis of our national defense and national safety. The Monroe Doctrine rests, in the last analysis, it is agreed by all American statesmen and historians, upon the twin principles of self-protection and self-defense. This being so it is obvious that this country must retain its complete freedom of action and decide what to do in order to uphold the Monroe Doctrine. Nothing could be more clear than that a consultation between this country and the Southern American countries which would not result in a unanimous agreement upon the course of action to be pursued would destroy the very purposes which it was seeking to accomplish—a united action by all. To have held such a consultation and then have failed to reach a unanimous agreement would be a very definite weakening in the eyes of the world of the position which it might well be necessary for us to take. The second proviso of this resolution must be placed in the resolution on the assumption that a unanimous agreement would result from such a consultation. But in view of the known situation in certain South American republics today I cannot agree that such an assumption is a reasonable one even today, let alone in the future. This proviso is very crippling to the whole doctrine. The Monroe Doctrine rests upon the principle of self-protection and is based upon the idea that we won't let anyone get into a position where they may become dangerous to our national safety. Where self-protection and self-defense are involved we can and should consult whomever we please and whomever it is necessary to consult at the time as provocative situations arise, but we must not be obligated to consult with anyone or to permit them to determine our course of action when our national safety is at issue. Our hands must be free. We must not give to others a veto power over matters affecting our vital interest.

Personally I believe that the Monroe Doctrine is one of the greatest and most unique foreign policies that any nation possesses. It has gradually and naturally grown within the years and is cloaked with the authority of age. It has never been rigid. It has always been applied by the Executive as the occasion required. We have never had to consult any other nation as to what it means and as to what it implied when it came to the question of actually applying it. The essence of the doctrine was that the doctrine was vague. I believe that my feelings in regard to the Monroe Doctrine were expressed best by Daniel Webster in a statement he made in the United States Senate some 100 years ago on this subject. He said: "I look on the message of December 1823 as forming a bright page in our history. I will neither help to erase it or tear it out; nor shall it be by any act of mine blurred or blotted."

It is always a very dangerous thing to legislate on foreign policy or on subjects which affect foreign policy. We have just had some very striking examples of this danger. Some of you were undoubtedly in favor of repeal of the arms embargo, and others were against it. But everyone will admit that it was most unfortunate to have this situation and this change of policy occur during a critical period such as we have been experiencing. When the arms embargo was passed it was passed because it signified to the American people the idea of neutrality, something which they at the time were highly in favor of. It passed by the same almost unanimous vote by which the recent so-called Monroe Doctrine legislation was passed. As time passed and it became apparent that this country was not neutral, in thought at least, a large body of opinion began to favor its repeal on the grounds of sympathy with the Allies and the growing opinion in the minds of many that a victory by the Allies was necessary to our national interests and well being. So it was repealed.

During the debate on the arms embargo I sat in the House and listened to the arguments advanced by Member after Member, who favored repeal of this act, on the point that we should never have crippled our foreign policy and tied our hands when we could not foresee future events. And yet, even before we have forgotten all about this debate and this experience, we see enacted a similar piece of legislation which attempts to set in a strait jacket our foreign policy in a different respect, but in the same manner. This limits our action in the future when conditions as they then exist and which certainly cannot now be predicted may be entirely different from what we now anticipate. We have just had another illustration of this in the agreement between the 21 American Republics setting a 300-mile neutrality zone around North and South America. Hardly was the zone established before the principles of that agreement were broken to pieces by all the belligerent powers in the Graf Spee incident. Here was another case of where we had established a definite policy and later ignored its violation. Under the peculiar circumstances under which the violation of that policy had occurred, it was no doubt the part of wisdom to disregard its infringement. Yet to publicly announce a definite policy and then ignore it cannot consistently be done without a loss of national prestige. Why should we take a chance on repeating this process again at this time?

The Monroe Doctrine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN F. JENSEN

OF IOWA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1940

ADDRESS BY KENNETH COOK, OF GLENWOOD, IOWA

Mr. JENSEN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include herewith a speech delivered at Malvern, Iowa, recently by my good friend, Mr. Kenneth Cook, of Glenwood, Iowa, relative to a subject that is now so vital to the American people, the Monroe Doctrine.

Mr. Cook has long been a student of history, and the pertinent points he observes in his speech are so worth while that I thought it only proper that they should be made available to the thousands of readers of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD.

THE MONROE DOCTRINE

(By Kenneth Cook, Glenwood, Iowa)

I am very glad to be here. It is always a pleasure to come home, especially on a peaceful errand.

I chose as a subject something which, although very much submerged in our past history, nevertheless something which now has become very vital to our fortunes and to our future because of the sudden happening of affairs in Europe—the Monroe Doctrine.

We all know that for over a hundred years we have had what is called the Monroe Doctrine, but I doubt if very many of us have given it much thought, or considered how, when, and where it might very vitally affect our peace with Europe.

It is said that history repeats itself, and it would seem that that is more true today than ever before. Prior to 1823 for several years people in South and North America had been demanding their independence, and numerous republics had been established in South America following their escape from the rule of Spain. This was not to the liking of the European powers, and these European powers feared that this urge for independence might spread to Europe. So Russia, France, Austria, and Prussia established what was called the Holy Alliance. This alliance pledged these European powers to maintain the monarchical system of government in Europe.

In 1823, when James Monroe was serving his second term as the fifth President of the United States, a bill was introduced in Congress to formally recognize the South American republics. In his annual message to Congress in 1823 President Monroe announced the policy of the United States with respect to the South American republics. It is this policy that has been called the Monroe Doctrine. It was never accepted by Congress, and until recently (the last few days) no action has ever been taken to make it a law, either nationally or internationally—no treaty supports it. The message contained a statement of three principles, which collectively make up the so-called doctrine. They are as follows:

"We owe it, therefore, to candor and to the amicable relations existing between the United States and those powers (France, Russia, Prussia, and Austria) to declare that we should consider any attempt on their part to extend their system to any portion of this hemisphere as dangerous to our peace and safety. With the existing colonies or dependencies of any European power we have not interfered and shall not interfere—but with the governments who have declared their independence we have, on great consideration and just principles, acknowledged we do not view any interposition for the purpose of oppressing them or in any other manner controlling their destiny by any European power in any other light than as the manifestation of an unfriendly disposition toward the United States. It has always been our policy not to interfere in any of the internal concerns of the European powers, but to cultivate friendly relations with them. It is impossible that the allied powers should extend their political system to any portion of either continent without endangering our peace and happiness, nor could anyone believe that our southern brethren, if left to themselves, would adopt it of their own accord. It is equally impossible, therefore, that we should behold such interposition in any form with indifference. The occasion has been judged proper for asserting, as a principle in which the rights and interests of the United States are involved, that the American Continents, by the free and independent position which they have assumed and maintained, are henceforth not to be considered as subjects for future colonization by any European power."

This policy so commended itself to the people as a wise and proper course—as so absolutely vital to the existence of the United States—that it has been cherished and enforced by all political parties and by all subsequent statesmen of this Republic.

Many times in our history occasions have arisen for the assertion of the principles of this doctrine, and in each instance our Government has firmly adhered to this traditional policy.

Of this policy Thomas Jefferson said:

"Our first and fundamental maxim should be never to entangle ourselves in the broils of Europe. Our second, never to suffer Europe to intermeddle with affairs this side of the Atlantic."

Daniel Webster, in a speech of April 11, 1826, in defense of the Doctrine, said:

"I look upon the declaration as a part of this country's honor, and for one I intend to guard it; it is a bright page in our history. I will neither help to erase it nor tear it out; nor shall it be by any act of mine blurred or blotted. It did honor to the sagacity of the Government and I will not diminish that honor."

There are 21 Latin and South American republics—8 of which are in South America. Brazil is the largest, with a population of about 43,000,000.

Our undertaking under the Monroe Doctrine is that we will protect these 21 countries from any intereference by any of the European powers.

In the last few days, in order to make our stand in that respect more definite, there has been introduced in Congress a bill making the policy announced by James Monroe a part of the law of this country. It has passed one of the Houses of Congress. The only other time in recent history that the Monroe Doctrine has entered into our international affairs was in 1919 when, in approving the covenant to the League of Nations, the Senate of the United States specifically provided that the Doctrine should not be abrogated.

So we are, through policy and perhaps law, definitely pledged to the protection of our Pan American neighbors from any interference from Europe. It is about time that we recognized this tremendous responsibility. If for no other reason than for the protection of our own interests, this must necessarily be the case, because we cannot permit the dictators of Europe to gain a foothold on this continent. Now, as in 1823, it would be equally as dangerous to our peace and safety.

So history repeats itself. In 1823 democracies in Europe were banned by the monarchs, as they are today to be banned by the dictators. Then, as now, the question was the danger of interference from the totalitarian forces in Europe—England and France threw out a protectorate around the other democracies of Europe, the same as we have done by the Monroe Doctrine as applied to the small nations of this continent. To protect them they were involved in the present war. To protect the small countries of this continent, we may have to go to war.

France and England have known for years of this present menace in Europe—so have we. They, as we, have trifled with time and are not ready—they, as we, guaranteed to protect the other democracies—yet they, as we, have been unable to forego our customary ways of life, and have been unable to forget internal disputes, and they, as we, have been incapable of bringing their lives, their power and intelligence under discipline of a single grim purpose, as we and they saw Germany doing.

It is not a question of helping England or France. We could not have helped them had we wanted to—our state of unpreparedness, both military and industrial being in the shameful condition in which we now find it.

Another thing—we ourselves are continually violating the policy declared by the Monroe Doctrine. We are continually sending insulting messages to Europe and continually meddling in the internal affairs of Europe, at a time when there is no law except the law of force, and at a time when we, the richest nation in the world, find ourselves disgracefully unprepared. I think that before we invite trouble, we should be prepared. Compared to Germany, we are in the same position as one man with a toy pistol challenging to a duel a man armed with a machine gun.

Perhaps, under the circumstances, we are too generous with our promises. We know that Brazil and other of our pan-American neighbors are overrun with Communists and people who favor the dictators of Europe. It occurs to me that before we stick our necks out too far that we should secure from our pan-American neighbors a promise of faithful cooperation and a united front against the threats of the dictators. Why make the matter such a one-sided affair? It is one thing to idealistically declare that we will protect all of this continent, when we have no written and definite assurances that our protection is wanted. Perhaps they will do as Belgium did and refuse to stand against the power of Hitler.

I, for one, love the United States more than I do France or England. Whether that emotion is universal in this country I sometimes doubt. I notice by the newspapers today that the policy announced by the Monroe Doctrine has now become the written law of this land. If such is the case, it will contain this provision:

"It has always been our policy not to interfere in any of the internal affairs of the European powers."

Of course, this statement is not true today, as it was when James Monroe sent his message to Congress in 1823. We all remember that in 1917 we meddled in the internal concerns of Europe. Such meddling brought us only sorrow and trouble. We are today, and have been for some time past, meddling with internal European affairs. It will again bring us only sorrow and trouble if we don't quit. It seems to me a mockery to declare on the one hand that we want no interference in this continent by any European power, and at the same time keep actively meddling in the affairs in Europe.

The people of this country want peace. They are willing to defend any aggression—but that is all.

Let us be guided by the true letter and spirit of the Monroe Doctrine. We want it to be observed by the European powers; then let us live up to it on our part before we ask the European countries not to violate it. If we follow it, our neutrality will not be questioned, and we will then be in a sound position to demand of Europe that they abide by it.

The Appointment of Henry L. Stimson as Secretary of War Means War for the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WALL STREET JOURNAL

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article from the Wall Street Journal for June 21, 1940:

[From the Wall Street Journal of June 21, 1940]

MR. STIMSON SHOULD NOT BE SECRETARY OF WAR

On Tuesday, June 18, 2 days before his nomination to be Secretary of War, Henry L. Stimson made a radio address entitled "America's Interest in the British Fleet." Here follows the text of the conclusion of Mr. Stimson's address as transcribed by the National Broadcasting Co., over which the speech was transmitted:

"To put the matter concretely, my recommendation would be that the following steps should immediately be taken:

"First, we should repeal the provisions of our ill-starred so-called neutrality venture which has acted as a shackle to our true interests for over 5 years.

"Second, we should throw open all of our ports to the British and French naval and merchant marine for all repairs and refueling and other services.

"Third, we should accelerate by every means in our power the sending of planes and other munitions to Britain and France on a scale which would be effective, sending them if necessary in our own ships and under convoy.

"Fourth, we should refrain from being fooled by the evident bluff of Hitler's so-called 'fifth column' movements in South America. They are, on the face of them, attempts to frighten us from sending help where it will be most effective.

"Fifth, in order to assist the home front of Britain's defense we should open our lands as a refuge for the children and old people of Britain whose liability to suffering from air raids in Great Britain is a constant inducement to surrender to terms which she would otherwise resist.

"Sixth, we should, everyone of us, combat the defeatist arguments which are being made in this country as to the unconquerable power of Germany. I believe that if we use our brains and curb our prejudices we can, by keeping command of the sea, beat her again as we did in 1918.

"Finally, we should at once adopt a system of universal compulsory training and service which would not only be the most potent evidence that we are in earnest but which is at the present moment imperative if we are to have men ready to operate the planes and other munitions, the creation of which Congress has just authorized by a practically unanimous vote.

"In these ways, and with the old American spirit of courage and leadership behind them, I believe we should find our people ready to take their proper part in this threatened world and carry through to victory, freedom, and reconstruction."

What Mr. Stimson advocates amounts to United States entrance into the war; the assumption of an active role as a belligerent.

We stoutly affirm Mr. Stimson's right to speak for any policy in which he believes. He is an experienced and able statesman and his views deserve respect.

However, we believe that Mr. Stimson's views, insofar as they would lead us to war, are far out of line with what the majority of the American people want.

On that ground we hold that the Senate of the United States should refuse to confirm the nomination of Mr. Stimson as Secretary of War.

We believe that it would be a calamity to put Mr. Stimson in the position where he could open this country to the danger of participation in the war which the American people oppose.

We say this with full recognition of Mr. Stimson's unquestioned integrity and fine ability.

Independence Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. M. MICHAEL EDELSTEIN

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1940

ADDRESS BY REAR ADMIRAL CLARK H. WOODWARD

Mr. EDELSTEIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I wish to include therein an address delivered by Rear Admiral Clark H. Woodward, United States Navy, commandant, Third Naval District, at the Society of Tammany or Columbian Order at the Independence Day ceremonies in commemoration of the one hundred and sixty-fourth anniversary of American independence at the Great Wigwam, New York City, on Thursday, June 27, 1940. The address is as follows:

Worthy Grand Sachem, honored guests, friends, once more I have the high honor and great privilege to participate in your annual Independence Day ceremonies. This year, particularly, when European, African, and Asiatic peoples are being ground under the heels of ruthless marching legions and then punished with death or slavery, our celebration of American Independence should have a special significance for us.

We of the armed forces join our civilian friends in the sincere hope that the rapidly spreading holocaust abroad will not reach the Western Hemisphere. This for a twofold reason: In the first place, our principal mission is to preserve peace by preventing war; secondly, having had experience in war we know its horrors and want no more of it.

Nevertheless, looking facts in the face, it was only through war that we became a free and independent people; it was only through war that we continued as a united nation; and—though God forbid that it ever be necessary—it may yet be only through war that we are able to retain that freedom and independence so dearly bought and the peace we now enjoy.

General Washington, our first Commander in Chief, learned from experience, gained at frightful cost, that "To be prepared for war is one of the most effectual means of preserving peace." Yet throughout the decades following the Revolutionary War, which gave us our liberty and freedom, history shows that we entered each of the five subsequent major conflicts in an utterly unprepared state, despite previous tragic experiences. The World War was no exception and proved again that in our case, at least, the surest road to war lies in being unprepared for war.

President Andrew Jackson, a man of great vision, had clearly foreseen the error of such a course 80 years previously when, on March 4, 1837, he said: "We shall more certainly preserve peace when it is well understood that we are prepared for war." Nevertheless, prior to the World War, because of our ill-founded fear of militarism and false economy in whittling down our Army and Navy, the leaders of our Government had refused to read the signs of the times. In consequence our country was caught napping and totally unprepared as in each previous conflict.

Our penalty for this unpreparedness has been the sacrifice of many thousands of the flower of American manhood—now buried in God's acres on foreign battlefields and in military cemeteries scattered throughout our land. Many of their lives would have been spared had the necessary training and equipment of our forces been provided at the proper time. Furthermore, the Government spent many billions of dollars more in extravagant and hasty forced preparations than would have been expended had the proper systematic planning been done in advance. We criminally wasted both blood and treasure.

Pensions and bonuses which have been paid in the past are in large part due to the "Follies of 1917"—our unwise neglect to learn, from past experience, that continuous preparedness is the price of peace. The evils of that fearful struggle are yet with us to vex and plague our Nation, and will be for generations to come until we liquidate the additional billions which will have to be paid out in the future because of our preposterous unpreparedness.

For 12 years following the World War this Nation, though the greatest and richest on the earth, was the self-elected and voluntary dupe of European politics, alien enemies within our own household, disloyal professional pacifists and their allies the "red" subverters. It was they who, by widespread cunning and treacherous campaigns of lies, deliberate distortion of facts, subtle insinuation, foreign-sponsored peace movements and emotional propaganda, successfully exerted maximum pressure on our Government to cut down military and naval appropriations, thus reducing our Navy from first to third rank among the leading maritime nations of the world and dropping our Army to nineteenth place.

Meanwhile, any effort to increase or improve our national defense produced a spontaneous outburst of antipreparedness oratory and pacifistic machinations, the intensity of which increased as Congress began seriously to consider the matter.

Fortunately, the present administration, realizing the woeful inadequacy of our defense forces, very wisely began in 1933 to correct past mistakes and a preparedness-conscious Congress, under the personal leadership of President Roosevelt, has continued systematically to build up the Army and Navy toward their proper strength. Existing international conditions have made the matter more urgent. Consequently, through recent congressional authorizations and appropriations (and those now under consideration, when finally passed), the efficiency of our armed forces will be greatly increased and to such extent that no nation or combination of nations will dare to challenge us.

Our enormous wealth, unlimited resources, and great freedom are sufficient reasons to engender and promote jealousy among certain covetous, militarily strong, and ruthless predatory nations, whose lust for power and territory is unsatiable. Undoubtedly they would like to see our people, like those of other nations unable to protect themselves, subjugated to totalitarian domination.

But Americans are not suited, either by temperament or tradition, for life under such a regime. It is very important, therefore, for us to consider how best we may defend and preserve our hard-fought-for liberties and independence.

We can no longer depend upon promises, pacts, or treaties, as they have proven to be worthless except as sleeping potions to allay suspicion while getting ready for the kill. Worldly experience has taught us that nothing will stop any gangster, whether of local or international character, from pursuing his nefarious plans except superior force. We should profit by lessons thus learned.

Not since the Civil War has the liberty and independence of these United States been jeopardized as now. The swiftly marching events across the seas, particularly during the past few weeks, have shocked and stunned the American people. Though predicted for several years and with its approach definitely seen, nevertheless it was not until recent months that Europe finally was drawn into the enveloping conflagration of actual war, since when the very rapidity and fury of its progress has been shocking beyond words.

Yet none of this happened by accident. It was the result of long, careful, and efficient planning by experts with an implacable purpose. It was the inevitable result of weakness pitted against might, of unpreparedness against savage force.

The present conflict is really a war between two completely antipathetic and contrary philosophies of government. One, autocratic, based on the worship of force and the will to fight, considers that the dictator is supreme and individuals mere pawns to be used at his desire. The other, democratic, based on moral force and the inalienable and God-given rights of the individual, considers the state is subordinate and to be governed by the will of its people.

Though we may not become embroiled in the present war, nevertheless we must be prepared for a future conflict along the same lines, if and when it comes. Should the challenge be made we must face the struggle without faltering in our faith and with the firm determination to fight for our liberties and independence, backing up our moral force with a superior force of arms. Only thus can we survive and progress.

We of the regular armed forces know, as did General Washington, that to be prepared is one of the most effectual means of preventing war. I wish this truth could be brought home to every citizen. Upon this basis is predicated the present efforts of the Army General Staff and the Navy high command.

Proper preparedness is a colossal job, but an absolutely necessary one. It is also costly, but the cost is infinitely cheaper than the cost of war. It is much easier and saner to prepare in advance and thus keep out of war than to prosecute one successfully if forced upon us, or, in case of defeat, to satisfy the excessive demands of a victorious enemy.

The reaction of Americans to national preparedness during the past 10 months has had an amazing turn. Previously, considerable indifference was displayed by the majority. This was due, in large measure, to lack of knowledge of military and naval affairs and a generally comfortable, though fancied, feeling of security. Since the outbreak of war, however, the people have awakened to the real extent and significance of our unpreparedness. In consequence of the unimaginable progress of the European conflict some have even shown signs of alarm. There is no occasion to become jittery, however, and the greatest service our citizens can render our country at this time is to remain calm and unafraid, and lend every effort—personal, moral, industrial, and political, as needed—to help in the proper arming of our military and naval forces.

We must do this immediately and as a united people. National security is not a political question, but one with which every American is personally concerned. There is no escape from the responsibility which now rests on each individual citizen.

During the past several weeks our Congress has given the right-of-way to national-defense legislation, including appropriations and authorizations for the enlargement and modernization of our Army and for considerable increase in our naval tonnage. Yet appropriations and authorizations as such are not sufficient. They alone cannot win wars.

The funds and authority thus provided must be transformed into actual ships, tanks, planes, guns, and trained personnel. For these it takes a lot of time. Neither an army nor a navy can be improvised. From 1 to 2 years are necessary to produce equipment necessary to approximate the requirements of reasonable national defense, while from 2 to 4 years are required to build major-caliber guns and naval vessels. Prompt and proper arming of our forces, therefore, calls for the utmost cooperation between the Government, industry, labor, and the public.

"A strong man armed keepeth his house in safety" until there comes one stronger than he. Although it is our fondest hope never again to be engaged in a foreign war, the only way to assure ourselves of future safety and peace is through proper preparedness. This means providing an adequate Army, well equipped and trained, and a Navy second to none. There is no cheap road to either security or peace, and the price of liberty is paid in blood.

As has been truly said, "to stop short of a completely efficient defense is to rest content with an inefficient defense." I would like to add that an inefficient defense spells disaster when put to the test. It is the duty of our Government to insure, beyond question, the safety of our country, and in the present calamitous state of world affairs no policy would prove more disastrous to this Nation than failure in this duty.

We must seriously bear in mind also that our duty is to uphold our great fundamental and traditional foreign policies—one in particular, the preservation of the Western Hemisphere—and by war if necessary. The idea of invasion of the Western Hemisphere by foreign nations is not a new one; one flagrant instance being when Louis Napoleon set up a puppet kingdom in Mexico during our Civil War. Other lesser attempts have been made in more recent times.

Our Monroe Doctrine—in the support of which we have never wavered—assures America for Americans, and views any attempt of foreign powers to colonize or extend their political system to this hemisphere as being dangerous to the peace and safety of the United States.

Nevertheless, covetous eyes have been cast by certain European nations on the rich territories of our sister republics to the south. Furthermore, systematic and purposeful propaganda has been spread by these same nations in their aggressive commercial and political activities which are a growing challenge to the trade and influence of the United States and a menace to the preservation of peace.

We cannot trust nations whose word is as poor as their bond. Lawless nations plotting foul mischief can be stopped only by superior force.

The one thing that the people of this country ought to fear more than getting into war is that of going into war unprepared and not coming out victorious. From recent cataclysmic events we have learned that the risk of war is too great not to have done the utmost in preparation for every eventuality.

Only in preparedness is there protection; only in protection is there peace.

HON. JOHN W. McCORMACK

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1940

POEM BY J. FRANK MULLEN

Mr. McCORMACK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following poem written by J. Frank Mullen, of 1127 Hyde Park Avenue, Hyde Park, Mass.:

I AM AN AMERICAN

I am an American and I'm proud to say,
" 'Tis the greatest blessing in the world today."
To man, it gives freedom and an equal right,
Since the date of its birth, in the Concord fight.

I am an American, and forever will be Against all influences, from o'er the sea.
Where justice is bared, by dictators' skill,
Who dream only of slaughter, and new ways to kill.

To be an American, I'm sure it's safe to say,
'Tis an appealing wish of all, in the world today.
Here, in peace we live with our neighbors and God,
And the envy of the world is the American sod.

As a Nation we're ready and willing to fight
For justice and freedom and democracy's right.
The flag of our Nation will always be true,
To the ideals that gave us the red, white, and blue.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ESTES KEFAUVER

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1940

ARTICLE BY JOHN T. MOUTOUX

Mr. KEFAUVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks and include a concise and very fair analysis of the true attitude of Mr. Willkie, and the Republican Party, toward T. V. A. This splendid article was written by John Moutoux, of the Scripps-Howard organization, and published in the Knoxville News-Sentinel, Sunday, July 7, 1940:

[From the Knoxville (Tenn.) News-Sentinel of July 7, 1940]

WILLKIE CANDIDACY ALREADY LAUNCHING "SMEARING" OF T. V. A.

(By John T. Moutoux)

WASHINGTON, July 6.—It looks very much as if T. V. A. is going to be made the goat of this Presidential campaign.

In order to throw a favorable light on Wendell L. Willkie's fight on the T. V. A., the Willkie supporters seem bent upon painting the Authority's activities in pitch black. And so, even though Mr. Willkie has said he favors giving T. V. A. a fair chance to make good, there is every indication even at this early date that the T. V. A. is in for another smearing.

LAWRENCE SPEAKS

For instance, David Lawrence had a column this week in which he said, in part:

"If the New Deal wants to go to bat on the utility issue it will doubtless find Wendell ready and eager to debate it. Nothing probably would please him more than to go up and down the country telling the people of the millions of dollars that have been wasted on the T. V. A., and of the financial juggling in the T. V. A. which brought criticism from the office of the Comptroller General of the United States."

Those who have followed T. V. A. closely since it began can at once spot the misstatements in the paragraph just quoted.

T. V. A. has not wasted millions of dollars. On the contrary, through its adoption of multiple-purpose dams as well as the timing and manner of their construction, the Authority has saved millions of dollars. No one has ever charged T. V. A. personnel with being incompetent or inefficient; as a matter of fact, even the minority members of the T. V. A. investigating committee were impressed with the high degree of efficiency of the T. V. A.'s engineering department, which spends the bulk of the T. V. A. appropriations.

Nor has there been any financial juggling. That is the time-worn charge that was shown up by the congressional investigating committee but which continues to be used, because those who make the charge are aware of the difficulty of refuting so vague a charge as financial juggling.

The criticisms of former Comptroller General McCarl also were proved baseless by the investigating committee.

TAX LOSS QUESTION

Mr. Lawrence continued:

"Then there is the question of the loss of taxes to the States and municipalities in the T. V. A. area and the vast subsidies paid by taxpayers in the North for the benefit of persons and interests in the South—all of this has never been really opened up on the stump because the American people have never before been ready to listen, and there has been nobody on the anti-T. V. A. side who could get a hearing."

Again the misstatements are apparent.

There has been no loss of taxes to States and municipalities in the T. V. A. area. Knoxville, Memphis, and the other cities serving T. V. A. power are receiving as much in taxes now as they did when the private companies operated in those cities. Under the amendment to the T. V. A. Act just passed by Congress, the States will be reimbursed almost in full for their tax losses. Thus far there have been no losses by States or municipalities.

Mr. Lawrence overlooked the counties, which are the only taxing agencies in the valley that have lost through the flooding of land by T. V. A. reservoirs. But even the counties will be reimbursed up to 40 percent for the loss from the flooding of land, the 40 percent representing the part allocable to power, and they will be reimbursed in full for taxes formerly paid by the private power companies.

Nor have there been any "vast subsidies paid by the taxpayers in the North for the benefit of persons and interests in the South." Even now, with T. V. A. only half completed, the T. V. A. power operations are on a paying basis—that is, they are returning a profit to the taxpayers. The navigation, flood-control, and national-defense parts of the T. V. A. program, of course, are not on a paying basis, nor are these same activities on a paying basis anywhere else in the country. Mr. Lawrence and other critics of the T. V. A. raised no cry about vast subsidies when, through the years, the Government spent billions on navigation alone—rivers, harbors, and flood control.

The only difference is, this time the South is getting a little of the money that formerly went largely to the eastern seaboard.

The point should also be made that the tax-replacement money is coming from the rate payers of the Tennessee Valley, whose rates include 15 percent as a tax equivalent, and not from the taxpayers of the North, who seem to be Mr. Lawrence's special concern.

MR. DIRKSEN AGAIN

Our friend, Congressman EVERETT M. DIRKSEN (Republican, Illinois), was back at his old game this week attacking the T. V. A. He referred in a speech on the House floor to a "fictitious yardstick that has been contrived down in the Tennessee Valley Authority, where about 30 percent of the $505,000,000 cost of that public project will be allocated to power and the rest of it to navigation and flood control."

Mr. DIRKSEN's figures are not quite correct. In fact, they are far from accurate. The figures, as submitted to the T. V. A. investigating committee, show 56.5 percent of the total cost of T. V. A. allocated to power and the remainder to navigation and flood control. The amount chargeable to power is $279,141,208 out of a total of $494,092,864. The figures for the other two items are $115,801,848 for navigation and $99,149,808 for flood control.

Since the allocation of costs was made, T. V. A. has bought electric properties of Tennessee Electric Power Co., Alabama Power Co., Mississippi Power Co., and several smaller systems, all of which will be chargeable 100 percent to power. Of course, the allocation figure is constantly changing with the addition of new property and the construction of dams.

PRAISING WILLKIE

Representative DIRKSEN gave Mr. Willkie credit for reducing electric rates in the valley by 50 percent, and when Representative PIERCE, of Oregon, broke in to say, "The rates came down when the T. V. A. came in, and never before," then Mr. DIRKSEN made a statement that no doubt will be of interest to the electric users of the valley, especially those in the rural areas who never knew the blessings of electricity before T. V. A. brought it to them. Mr. DIRKSEN said:

"Let me say to my good friend from Oregon that it is because of Wendell Willkie that the humble folks of Tennessee can use curling irons today. It is because of him that electric toasters and electric ice boxes and electric facilities of all kinds have been brought into the most humble and obscure homes in Tennessee. Yes; take off your hat and salute a great American who has brought the use of electricity into the homes and to the firesides of humble people by the hundreds of thousands. Salute a great servant of the people who has steadily sought to enrich their lives by bringing to them the comforts of electricity."

World's Fair Japan Day Banquet

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 9 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. KENSUKE HORINOUCHI, JAPANESE AMBASSADOR

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD the address delivered by the Japanese Ambassador, Hon. Kensuke Horinouchi, at the World's Fair Japan Day banquet in the Hotel Astor, New York City, on June 28, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Wakasugi, distinguished guests, ladies, and gentlemen, once more we are gathered here on the eve of Japan Day at the New York World's Fair. As always, it is a great pleasure for me to come to New York. In this city I spent several years as consul general, a position now held by our genial and able host of this evening, Mr. Wakasugi. I am grateful to him for giving me this opportunity to see so many old friends and to meet so many distinguished New Yorkers.

When I was here with you a year ago, I expressed my admiration for your city's achievement in creating its magnificent exposition under rather unfavorable circumstances. The decision to continue the fair for another season evokes even greater respect in view of the events of the past year.

Encouraged by this example, Japan has wholeheartedly continued her participation in the fair. Not only has the Japanese Pavilion been reopened, but an attempt has been made, by a general renewal of its contents, to live up to the fair's new 1940 model. I am confident that this year's fair will be even more successful than that of 1939.

No doubt you know that we Japanese are celebrating this year the 2,600th anniversary of the founding of our empire. We are justly proud of the great age of our nation and of the unique position which it holds in world history. Compared with our national life-span of 26 centuries, the period of our association with the western nations has been very short. Yet in all our long history, there is no period which we regard as more auspicious than the 86 years in which we have been the friend of America. It is our earnest hope that American-Japanese amity will continue unbroken until it, too, is measured not by years but by centuries.

The world-shaking events of recent months have greatly increased the importance of strengthening the ties which have held us together since 1854. At a time when all nations are gripped by anxiety and apprehension, the traditionally peaceful relations between America and Japan take on a new significance.

At the end of the first World War, the League of Nations was founded in the hope that it would insure a stable peace based on international justice. The League did not succeed. It failed largely because its membership was never complete, and because it was dominated by European considerations rather than by the interests of the world as a whole.

The present trend of world affairs is toward a new type of international coordination. Apparently there are to be a number of great regional confederations of nations based on geographic and economic mutuality of interests. The nations of this Western Hemisphere are moving toward a stronger kind of Pan American Union. In the Far East, Japan, China, and Manchoukuo are laying the foundation for cooperation and unity among the peoples of East Asia. There will probably be some similar developments in Europe, regardless of the military outcome of the war.

Close cooperation among regional groups of nations can be of great value in securing order and in promoting common interests. But it is vitally necessary that steps should be taken to preserve and to increase the free flow of world trade. If attempts should be made to turn the regional spheres into watertight compartments, each trying to be self-sufficient, the irritations and animosities which now trouble the world would merely be aggravated, and no real progress could be made toward world peace.

America and Japan should meet this problem by doing everything possible to keep the trade channels of the Pacific free and open. We should leave nothing undone which may serve in any measure to dispel such suspicion or misapprehension as may exist between us. We must try to recognize the realities of our situation and to solve our problems in that spirit of mutual confidence which has served us so well in the past.

It is encouraging to see that, despite the expiration of our commercial treaty, American-Japanese trade is going on unhampered. There could be no better proof than this of the fundamental soundness and complementary value of our trade. Last year Japan was again the third best customer of the United States, paying out $230,000,000 for American goods. In exports to the United States, Japan held second position, with a balance of $70,000,000 in your favor.

The relative importance of American-Japanese trade has been greatly increased by the situation in Europe. Many of the world's most important trade routes have been disrupted or completely blocked by the spread of the war. Normal commerce is now possible only with Latin America and the Far East. The United States seems intent on preventing the trade dislocation from spreading to North and South America. Japan has the same desire for her part of the world.

Japan's policy toward the European situation is to keep out of the war, and to keep the war out of East Asia. Her policy of noninvolvement is aimed at securing stability and the peaceful continuation of trade in east Asia. Japan's new treaty of friendship with Thailand is a tangible evidence of our peaceful intentions. So also is Japan's announcement of her keen interest in maintaining the status quo in the Dutch East Indies. The Japanese Foreign Minister's statement to this effect was followed by a similar statement from Secretary of State Hull. America and Japan have thus declared a common policy toward the Dutch East Indies.

It is not too much to say that the United States and Japan have such a common policy with respect to the whole of the Pacific area; that is, to keep the Pacific peaceful and free from the effects of the war in Europe. If each of our two nations works toward that end, it is certain that peace and trade of the Pacific can be preserved.

At last year's Japan Day banquet, I stressed the fact that there was still an "open door" in China. I reaffirm that statement tonight, for it is even more valid now than it was a year ago. Fighting is still going on in China, but the field of military operations is now far in the interior. The new Chinese Government under Wang Ching-wei has begun reconstruction in a large area, which includes all of China's important ports and the great bulk of her resources. The Wang government has announced a policy of friendship for all nations and welcomes a commercial and industrial cooperation. Under these circumstances, the "open door" in China has a new meaning. American trade with both China and Japan is in a position to increase soundly and steadily.

At this critical stage in world history, America and Japan share a great opportunity and an equally great responsibility. Clear thinking and wise statesmanship on both sides of the Pacific will develop that opportunity and meet that responsibility.

Before I close, I want to tell you again how pleasant it is, in a time like the present, to share in a celebration of the New York World's Fair. In a world of shadows this great fair is a beacon light of courage and hope. It lights the path to a world of tomorrow where the sword shall be sheathed and all men will live as friends.

This is a goal to which all can aspire. It cannot be reached overnight, but let us march together on the road toward it.

Participation in the War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Tuesday, July 9 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

LETTER FROM JOSEPH L. CARLTON, OF WINSTON-SALEM, N. C.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be published in the Appendix of the RECORD a letter which I have before me, which was addressed to me on May 16, 1940, by one of my constituents, Mr. Joseph L. Carlton, an attorney at law of Winston-Salem, N. C., in which he expresses his views in reference to the war now raging in Europe in so far as our interests are concerned. In the concluding paragraph of the letter he says:

> If you can see any possible need for us to fight in Europe, I hope you will write to me why. As a citizen and voter of North Carolina, I want to urge that you do everything in your power to keep America from taking, for the second time, the awful steps she took during the last war.

I replied to Mr. Carlton that I saw no earthly reason for our mixing up in Europe's wars, and that, insofar as I was concerned, I would never vote to send a single son of an American mother to Europe to settle the differences existing between nations over there.

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

JOSEPH L. CARLTON, ATTORNEY AT LAW,
Winston-Salem, N. C., May 16, 1940.

Hon. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR REYNOLDS: It seems incredible that this country, for a second time, is beginning to take those almost imperceptible little steps which finally resulted, during the last World War, in America's fighting in Europe. Yesterday I was amazed to hear a radio announcer from Washington make the statement that many high officials and even Members of Congress were beginning to say that even now we ought to be in Europe helping the Allies.

Why? Not to make the world safe for democracy, nor to end war, nor to make money—the last war proved that war can do none of those things.

But this radio announcer stated—and I hope he is mistaken—that high officials and Congressmen are saying that we ought to be fighting in Europe because, if we wait until Hitler wins, we will then have to fight him alone, and without the help of the Allies. In other words, if Hitler wins, he will then attack South America or North America.

Is that true?

(1) What would Hitler or Germany want from the Western Hemisphere? Someone will say, two things: raw materials and room for colonization. But if Germany wins from England and France, Hitler would have parts of Africa, Asia, India, and Australia, not to mention the Dutch East Indies for such purposes. From the English and French Empires he could get more raw materials and room than he could possibly use.

(2) Would Hitler be able to attack the Western Hemisphere? Having won from England and France, he would have to keep the people of the British and French Empires in subjection. The British Empire alone has over 500,000,000 people. Germany has approximately 70,000,000 people. If Hitler properly polices the British and French Empires, he will not have ships or men enough with which to attack the Western Hemisphere.

(3) When would Germany attack the Western Hemisphere? Not immediately after conquering England and France, because she would have lost too many men and too much equipment in the European war. In 4 days Holland lost 100,000 men. It is inevitable that Germany also will lose many men before the European war is over. If Germany waits a few years to recover before attacking us, it is likely that her beaten European enemies will also have recovered sufficiently by that time to keep Germany fully occupied at home.

At any rate, after every previous European war the world powers which were defeated have always recovered. It is not unlikely the same thing will happen after this war.

In the face of a perfect balance of power in Europe, the securing of a sufficiency of room and raw materials from the conquered French and British Empires, the presence of two oceans, one each side of us, and most of all our potential strength, it is extremely unlikely that Germany will attack us even if Germany is victorious in the present European war.

As American citizens, we should ask ourselves why we should send our men to fight in Europe when the British Empire itself is not fighting with all its might. The British Empire has approximately 500,000,000 people. If England needs more men with which to fight for her very life, let her get them from the British Empire. England could easily put in the field 10 times as many men as she now has ready to fight. She has more men than she could possibly use. Why should we send more?

Suppose the situation were reversed, and the United States occupied the British Isles and England occupied North America. Would England go to Europe to fight for us? Let Warsaw and Poland, Finland, and Norway answer that question. Even British statesmen admit that England has broken her treaties in which she promised to fight to help her next-door neighbors. No; this question answers itself; in such a situation England would not fight for us.

We are told that the Germans are naturally a warlike people and Hitler insane and that if they win in Europe they will come over here to get us. But when it comes to imperialism, surely the Germans cannot compare to the British; it is the English, and not the German Empire, upon which the sun never sets. If we may judge from history, the German people are no worse than anybody else; Hitlerism is but the scab of a sore on Germany; and it is logical to believe that when the sore is cured the scab will disappear. The venom of revenge which produced the sore was injected at Versailles, because Versailles resulted in the economic want and frustration that defeated democracy and made Hitler possible in Germany.

From these facts, we can draw at least two conclusions. We should have no part in Europe in reaping this whirlwind which the Allies themselves sowed at the end of the last war. It is inconceivable to think that in the event Germany defeats England and France, and thereby gets more room and more raw materials than she can use, that she will then risk fighting the strongest nation on earth in order to get even more.

The young men of America are willing to fight or die, if need be, to defend America in this hemisphere, but not abroad.

If the conclusions I have drawn in this letter are false, I would appreciate very much your pointing out to me wherein I am wrong. If you can see any possible need for us to fight in Europe, I hope you will write to me why. As a citizen and voter of North Carolina, I want to urge that you do everything in your power to keep America from taking, for the second time, the awful steps she took during the last war.

Very truly yours,

JOE L. CARLTON.

ARTICLE FROM PORTLAND OREGONIAN

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an article from the Portland Oregonian, which is entitled "Finland's Candle."

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

MIRROR OF WORLD OPINION

FINLAND'S CANDLE

How far that little candle throws his beams!
So shines a good deed in a naughty world.

Honor still has its advocates, decency its practitioners, and gratitude its testimony. The urgent need of the times is to make the world safe for morality once more. Somehow the brave little country of Finland steadies and fixes our faith in the certainty that it shall be. The way will be hard and not easy, but the way has been hard before and mankind was equal to its tribulations. There is a false light and a true. The false sometimes seems to dwarf the true, yet always it is the one that is extinguished. But the truth, the little candle, shines on.

Nominating Senator Styles Bridges for President

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES HAWKS, JR.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. FOSTER STEARNS, OF NEW HAMPSHIRE

Mr. HAWKS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of Representative FOSTER STEARNS, Republican of New Hampshire, nominating Senator STYLES BRIDGES, of New Hampshire, for President of the United States, at the Republican National Convention in Philadelphia:

Ladies and gentlemen of the convention, America is a bewildered Nation today. Bewildered at what is happening abroad, bewildered at what has been happening at home, bewildered at the confusion that exists in Washington, and bewildered at her own impotency—her own defenselessness—her own inadequacy in a moment of supreme test.

It is not the first time that we have come to a cross road where a momentous decision is necessary. But there has never been a time when more hung on that fateful decision. Those who come after us in the years ahead will see us as we face it, with this country brought by its present national leadership to such a weakened state that its once mighty voice in international affairs has been reduced to an uncertain whisper. Have our centuries of achievement, the lives and sacrifices of our resolute forefathers, brought us finally to this?

The task for us gathered here today, therefore, is plain.

We must provide a leader who is strong, who will inspire America to a recovery of faith in herself, a recovery of confidence in her destiny, a recovery of her will to advance fearlessly and erect along the only right road.

We know that there are still the energy and the ability in America to steer her civilization onward. We have the youth and the strength to respond. But they must be reawakened, the spirit and the will must be rekindled. We must have a rallying point.

I submit to you a man whose very life symbolizes the qualities that have been this Nation's inspiration for 300 years, qualities to which we must rededicate ourselves if we are not to be a people conquered by a more aggressive race, or sinking into a devitalized mental state at home, and there is little choice between the two evils.

I submit a man whose knowledge of life is not confined to the imaginative tales of fiction, but which was gained at first hand from the time he was 9 years old; a man who was his own National Youth Administration before he was out of his teens. And I ask you to focus your minds for a moment on a little farmhouse up in Maine of 30 years ago.

In it lived a family—the mother, a son aged 9, a daughter of 7, and a year-old baby boy, left alone by the death of the father, in whose veins ran the blood of 12 generations of hardy New England stock. He left his family only a small and unproductive farm, and the accumulated, nonnegotiable debts of the village's general store. The sole manpower of this farm, a 9-year-old boy.

If ever there was a civilization threatened, here was one—a New England mother and her brood of three, with the deep snow of a northern winter on the ground and clouds of despair hanging low overhead. "Brain trusters" were manifestly needed; there had to be as intense thinking as any intellectual ever did, even if on a smaller scale. And it took, besides brains, a special quality which we up in New England call spunk.

Out of this evolved a plan—not a national planning, but a planning for the particular part of the world enclosed there in that little New England home. It was a plan that has sustained man down through the centuries, a plan that has given strength to the body and comfort to the soul—simple, too, such as could come only from people of simplicity. It was the plan of hard work.

It was so simple and direct in its conception that it could never possibly have emanated from the brain of a Tommy Corcoran, a Benny Cohen, or a Harold Ickes. It was a plan for a day at a time, and a day which began before dawn. I am giving you this picture in full, and in simple language, because America needs to come out from under its silken puffs and recall the patchwork quilts of yesteryear. It needs to rub the cold cream from its face and dabble in the axle grease if need be. Here was a boy getting up in the dark to water and feed the stock, milk the cows, and deliver the milk to the neighbors before trudging 3 miles to school—because, in spite of all, he didn't propose to go without an education.

There are no vacations on a farm. He had little time to play baseball or go swimming, but he developed a steady competence as he went 4 miles over rocky New England pastures to chop down trees, sledding them back to the house for firewood. He acquired some of his knowledge of commercial values at this time, too, by trapping for muskrats en route and selling their skins.

This man of the family at 9 found that determination and spunk developed as he needed them. He worked his way through college by getting up at 4 o'clock in the morning and milking cows in the university's dairy barn, winning a raise from 15 to 20 cents an hour. As a larger place and opportunity showed itself, he grew in stature to fill it.

A boy of New England's thrifty soil, a man of it, the product of a stock that knew the hardships and uncertainties of life long before a New Deal came to confuse our direction, he was the type of man who made our country. New work took him over the New England States, teaching agriculture, seeking to share his experience with farmers who knew the hard work involved in making a living out of the soil. Probably his teachings of that period were amateurish, but they were classics of wisdom compared with today's theories of scarcity. He had reached the point where he could give help out of the experience he had earned by hard work and his own self-reliance.

This son of New England, coming up the hard way, became secretary of a farmers' insurance organization, then the executive secretary of a State farm bureau federation. Men said he was easy to work with and to work for. He was named to the public service commission of his adopted State.

And then, at the age of 36, his neighbors who admired his pluck, energy, and ability, made him Governor of their State. It had been charged that he was too young. Some said that he was too radical. Others said he was too poor to aspire to the office. But the people of his State are not given to acting blindly or to hasty judgments. They had confidence that he would do the job. He was the youngest Governor the State ever had; at that time he was the youngest Governor in the country. And again, as the larger place was open to him, he grew to fill it. He responded to the opportunity.

In his 2 years as Governor, he balanced the budget—without a sales tax, a direct-inheritance tax, or an income tax. New Hampshire's may be only a small budget, but his record in balancing it puts him at least that far ahead of those who have never come within shouting distance of balancing any budget. He left the State with a new Agricultural Standards Act, a new State Planning and Development Board which rescued tottering old industries and encouraged new industries; strengthened mothers'-aid legislation, and increased old-age benefits.

He brought about the enactment of unemployment-compensation insurance. Under him, New Hampshire was the first State to qualify under the Federal Social Security Act; with the Governor of Massachusetts he put into effect the first interstate compact in the country, establishing minimum wages and maximum hours, and prescribing working conditions in industry. Subsequently, several other States came into the compact. After the disastrous flood of 1936, he set up a citizens' committee, and the stricken areas were rehabilitated, he himself working from 16 to 20 hours a day on the job. At the end of his administration, there was not a family or a home that had not felt, in some measure, the effects of his cooperation. And in America, we are a Nation built up of home units. Out of that rugged little Maine farm had come something constructive, something built on experience—not a tissue woven out of theories.

I submit that this is a record of intelligent liberalism. It reflects a philosophy which recognizes that there are less fortunate people among us, and accepts the obligation to assist them. But, it is also a philosophy that permits the free flow of the energies of the able, the development of initiative and self-reliance—a philosophy as durable and as elemental as the rocks of the Granite State.

Ladies and gentlemen, this man of whom I speak met with you at Cleveland 4 years ago. He was one of seven Republican Governors in the United States at that time. Those of you who were there remember the consideration he was given for the Vice Presidency. He himself caused his name to be withdrawn, and instead placed in nomination the man who was selected as our Vice Presidential candidate.

He went back home, and notwithstanding that the New Deal swept the State, he was elected to the United States Senate.

Then, with the experience learned in a hard school but still with the energy and vision of youth, he moved on to the wider forum of Washington. You know his record there. In January 1937 he joined the group of Republicans who were fighting a disheartening rear-guard action against the onrushing forces of the New Deal. It took courage to lift his voice against them in those days; it took a man of intense convictions and a disregard of personal interest.

There were two courses open to him. The easier way was to keep quiet, keep his head down and hope that in time something would happen to stem the tide. The other way was to set up an incessant counterattack, to lift even one indignant voice against the New Deal chorus, in the hope that in some way, somewhere, it would be heard. This was the hard way—the politically dangerous way. And this is the way he took.

He was the first to make a break in the New Deal armor through an investigation of one of its major agencies. It was his fearlessness in exposing the liberties which strikers were taking with the United States mails which brought about the beginning of the end of the sit-down strikes. I believe I am justified in saying that he gave new spirit to the little group of Republicans in the Senate.

But he did more than this. He gave unselfishly of time, health, and tremendous energy to going over the country, giving a new vitality to Republican organizations; because he saw that only through a revival of the Republican Party and its principles can the soundness of this country's way of living be preserved. I have known him to leave the Senate after a full day of exacting work, and travel by plane to instill the spirit of fight into some distant group of beleaguered Republicans. And this was not merely to attend great gatherings in metropolitan centers. He gave of his time and strength gladly to small party meetings, from one end of the country to the other, bringing them in contact with Washington, and a realization that Republican leaders were interested in their problems. His own interests were at all times subordinated to the party's welfare, and, therefore, to the interests of his country.

Undoubtedly most of you here on this floor today have seen and heard him and felt his driving power. Some may have disagreed with him, but all must acknowledge his sincerity, and his hope for and confidence in the American people, whom he has come to know and understand so widely.

The country at this moment is in desperate need of leadership. We feel that this son of New England is the embodiment of those American virtues of which we are proudest, and which we feel can combat the flabbiness and cynicism which has been weakening our national stamina. It needs the experience of a man who has had to struggle for everything he got; a man who has served as the Governor of his State, and as a Member of the United States Senate. It needs his sincerity and energy, his youth, and fire.

He is the personification of self-reliance, in strong contrast to dependence on the Government such as we see on all sides. His past record gives him authoritative judgment. He thinks of war in terms of his three sons, one of whom is of military age.

In these times when we hear so much about the workingman, his problems and his needs, there is need for a man in the White House who is, and all his life has been, a working man. He knows how to call out the best in his fellow workers.

It is said that this Nation, along with the other democracies, has become soft. I submit, as the Nation's new leader, and nominate for President of the United States, a man who has hardened himself—and who asks you, in this time of danger, to do the same—to rise to the need for disciplined thought and resolute spirit: STYLES BRIDGES.

"Our Country, Right or Wrong"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALBERT E. AUSTIN

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1940

ADDRESS BY THOMAS RAYMOND BALL

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address of the gentleman from Connecticut, THOMAS RAYMOND BALL, at Natchaug Grange, Chaplin, Conn., July 5, 1940:

"OUR COUNTRY! RIGHT OR WRONG"

Fellow Americans, this month of July is full of meaning to us all. Yesterday we celebrated Independence Day. Throughout the length and breadth of this country people put aside their work, groups assembled, bands played, and small boys experimented with explosives. In the evening the eyes of young and old turned upward intent on the path of the rockets, and we captured for a moment the wondrous beauty of the fiery gold in the deepening twilight. The commemoration of the signing of the historic document that is our charter of liberty may well be the occasion for us to pause, take stock of ourselves, and call to mind the stalwart statesmen, brave men and true, that gave us this Nation. Are we worthy of them? Are we alert to our country's needs? Are we ready and willing to do our duty as Americans? Can it be said that we too are patriots?

Later in the month will come to another nation an anniversary that recalls to the world the fall of the Bastille, and has symbolized to millions of French people the spirit of a great republic. It was my privilege to be in Paris 9 years ago this month, and to stand with other veterans of the World War on the terrace overlooking the Place de la Concorde as a great army passed in review. First came the garrison of Paris in their uniforms of horizon blue, then the colonial troops from the far corners of a vast empire, then a pause—and soldiers equipped with the uniforms and accoutrements of the armies of the past moved slowly into the great square to the solemn strains of the ancient music of the march of Maréchal de Saxe—men representing those who fought the wars of a bygone day, like ghosts from another battlefield. The tragic retreat from Moscow—the victory at Yorktown—the military history of a valiant nation was re-enacted for us. And now, less than a decade from that day, that nation is prostrate, her army defeated, her navy destroyed, her people bowed in shame as they feed the heel of the conqueror. Men who only a few months ago harvested their crops, milked their cows, and enjoyed a simple supper after a hard day's work, as their children played, and laughed, and sang, are now lying dead beneath the sod of the battlefield.

Events have moved so swiftly that we find it hard to believe the news we hear over the air or read in our newspapers. But there has been no fiction. It is no dream. We cannot wake up tomorrow morning and find the same pleasant world that was. We are confronted with a new world that is mad, a world that is in imminent danger of domination by those who, crazed with the lust for power, and drunk with conquest, are determined to destroy all who stand in their way. Although we are 3,000 miles from Europe, we cannot through our isolation achieve any immunity from the deadly contagion that is abroad. We cannot run away and hide. We must face the future, and face it bravely. Whatever the outcome of the war across the water this country is bound to be affected by it, and we must make up our minds that it will be a long time before we "being defended from the fear of our enemies may pass our time in rest and quietness."

This part of Connecticut is rich in its traditions. Its hardy pioneers came from good stock in the old country, and they wrought well in the new. Undaunted and unafraid, they fought the battles of their day. The name of Israel Putnam is known from coast to coast, and the dying words of our soldier martyr, Nathan Hale, ring out through the ages their message of patriotism.

Perhaps it is because we, in these hills of Windham County, have held firm to the old traditions that I do not fear for our men and women of today and tomorrow. Here we meet on a common level, discuss our problems in town meeting, work hard, worship God, and hold fast to the things that count.

It is not so elsewhere. The ancient landmarks are no longer cherished. Young people dash madly about at excessive speed in an unworthy attempt to imitate the night life of great cities. They ape the affectations of the moving pictures, and, though physically soft, through contact, though perhaps vicarious, with crime they have become spiritually hardened. They are disdainful of their fathers' way, and unless they get some sense knocked into their heads they will not make good citizens and will never know the essence of patriotism. There is little room for the finer things of life where the mean, the cheap, and the gaudy abound.

Patriotism is the spiritual thing that is symbolized by the Fourth of July. It is a quality that is deep down in the hearts of Americans and, once awakened, it permeates our every thought and deed. It is that intense love of country that admits of no compromise. There can be no "Munich" to an American. We are a people slow to anger but mighty in our wrath.

We are a peaceloving people. We do not want war. We don't hold with war as an instrument of national policy. We don't like being regulated. We don't want to be drilled. We are independent. We like to do things our own way, make our own decisions, settle our own troubles. We hate all forms of that regimentation that is part and parcel of totalitarianism, but for that very reason we will submit to authority when we know that by that submission we shall insure our permanent freedom.

This Nation has reached a point in its history when it must arm to the teeth. Its citizens would prefer not to do it, but, confronted with a war-torn world where might rather than right seems to rule, the American people are determined to meet force with force if necessary. Our national-defense program is stupendous. It calls for billions of dollars for warships, war planes, and war training. It brings with it new and heavy taxes. It very likely will make mandatory restrictions on those luxuries that we have come to consider as necessities. It may possibly mean that our present military system will need to be materially changed. This whole program must be considered by the Congress on its merits, and no partisanship or thought of political gain should influence anyone in his attitude. I respect my colleagues in Congress, and I can assure you that mighty few of them will play politics at your expense. However we may differ about domestic issues, we are one where the safety and security of the Nation is at stake.

You have heard much in the last few months of the sinister activities of certain alien groups in this country, and the remarkable work of the Dies committee—has done much to focus public attention on this problem of a "fifth column." We have seen what happened in Norway and Holland. We are determined to permit no enemy agents to undermine the morale of our people or defeat us from within. May I, however, utter a word of caution in this connection? There are many foreigners in this country. They came here for many different reasons. Some of them can't understand our language and are baffled by our customs. They are our guests, and we should treat them with all courtesy. If we have any reason to suspect that any individual is up to mischief, we should report him promptly to the proper authority, but we should be careful to bridle our tongues and refrain from idle gossip. Undoubtedly there are men who must be dealt with severely to protect the country at this crucial time, but there are also thousands of innocent people who have sought the protection of our flag, who are eager to learn more of our way of life, and who should be reassured of our desire to help them. With the rare exception of those who have American Indian blood, we are all newcomers in this land. Our fathers crossed the seas to help build a new and better civilization, and as we see the older culture of Europe and the east destroyed we must mark well our own situation. The sacred principles that were enunciated in the Declaration of Independence and the liberties guaranteed under the Constitution must be preserved at all costs; and though they be assailed from within and without, they must ever stand.

When our thoughts dwell on patriotism we are apt to picture the gallant soldier in the heat of battle. We should remember that true patriotism is a peacetime virtue as well. The man who tills the soil, the woman who makes a home a better place, the teacher who gives freely of the accumulated wisdom of the ages, the worker who watches a great machine amidst the noise and clatter of the factory, the doctor in his daily battle with death and disease, and the minister of God in his endeavor to start us right and keep us straight as we make our perilous progress through life—all are patriots.

And we must remember, too, those many men to whom we have entrusted our Government. In every community there are men who have been chosen to handle the common business of their fellow Americans. They serve on the board of selectmen, the school board, the board of assessors, or the city council. They represent their constituencies in the legislature. They may even have the high honor and tremendous responsibility that goes with membership in the greatest legislative assembly in the world. We must remember always that these men are those whom we have chosen, and that they are trying hard to do their best for town, State, and Nation. They, too, are patriots.

True devotion to our country means that her welfare is our own. In the past few years many people have come to look upon their Government with greedy eyes. They seem to assume that because they live within its territorial limits they are entitled to a blank check on its treasury. I want to make it quite plain that I am not talking politics, but patriotism. I am referring to those who seek special privileges, immunities, or benefits, who are intent on getting rather than giving, who have forgotten the lesson of Nathan Hale.

While we may question certain policies of our Government, and it is healthy that we should do so, we must never forget that in time of national need our love for America must supersede all else. We must not think of what we may get, or what we may suffer, we must not hesitate. We must demand of ourselves unstinted devotion. We must keep ever in mind as our watchword the inspiring toast of Commodore Decatur:

"Our Country! In her intercourse with foreign nations may she always be in the right, but 'our country' right or wrong."

EDITORIAL FROM THE UMATILLA COUNTY (OREG.) RECORD

Mr. PIERCE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Umatilla County (Oreg.) Record for June 27, 1940:

[From the Umatilla County (Oreg.) Record of June 27, 1940]

TOMORROW'S WORLD NO MATTER WHO WINS THIS WAR

The surrender of Paris, which was followed almost at once by the collapse of French military resistance, was more than a disaster for the French Republic, more than a great victory for Hitler's incredible war machine. It was a symbol of the cataclysmic changes that are taking place at a bewildering speed in the world we live in. For Paris, with London, has long been associated in men's minds with freedom—with all that democracy means. And democracy is what Hitler, as he said and wrote time and again, is out to destroy. Paris is—or used to be—a living example of all that nazi-ism abhors.

Little by little we are coming to realize that this is not a war in the traditional sense. It is, instead, a revolution with the most far-reaching purposes imaginable. There have always been victors and vanquished in war. But, once the peace treaties were drawn, the world went on much as it did before. The victorious powers did not attempt to force a government, a philosophy of life of their own choosing, on the conquered. Few are able to believe that if Hitler wins he will be satisfied with such rewards as financial reparations, the restoration of the pre-war German colonies and similar material gains. For Hitler, as Mein Kampf vividly indicates, is consumed by two ambitions. One is to make the German race master of all Europe and perhaps, in the fullness of time, the world. The other is to destroy the capitalistic system, liberalism in government, and the democratic process.

We have many an object lesson in the countries he has so far taken. In every instance, freedom of press and speech and all rights of protest have been abrogated 100 percent. While the forms of local government are permitted to exist, all important decisions and policies are made in Berlin. Revolt of any kind against Nazi orders is punished with the utmost severity, and racial minorities, especially the Jews, are ruthlessly oppressed.

Men who have had contact with high German circles have lately been describing what they believe a Hitler victory would mean to Europe, and to the balance of the world. They say that the Fuehrer envisions a Germanic Europe in which only the German, the master race, would be permitted to bear arms. A European customs union, completely German controlled, would be established. The smaller nations would disappear, or would exist as mere geographical entities, without power or real meaning. All currencies would be dominated by Germany, and Germany would establish the terms on which trade between peoples could be carried on. The gold standard, of course, would cease to exist. It would be replaced by some sort of a barter system. The superior peoples of Europe—the British, the French, the Scandinavians, etc.—would command a high standard of living, while the inferior peoples, such as the Slavs, would be much in the position of slaves, performing the hard labor and receiving in return just enough food and clothing and lodging and medical attention to keep them alive and able to work.

So far as this hemisphere is concerned, there are two theories. One is that, after Hitler had consolidated Europe, he would attack the Americas with military force. The other is that he has no such plans—which is what he said in his recent interview with an American news correspondent. The second theory has many authoritative adherents. Hitler, they say, feels that the Americas would have to come to terms with him whether they wished to or not, in order to dispose of their surplus commodities and manufactures abroad. The Americas, he reasons, must have foreign trade—and that necessity would drive them to join in whatever system of commerce he establishes. Our gold—and at the moment we have some 60 percent of all the world's monetary gold—would be useful only for filling teeth and manufacturing jewelry.

One note of optimism is occasionally sounded. Even if Hitler wins an overwhelming victory in Europe, some hopefuls say, he will not be able to put his plans into effect. This is based on the fact that all the empires won by conquest in the past have invariably collapsed sooner or later of their own weight. Conquered peoples are not cooperative—a tremendous part of the conqueror's energies and resources and manpower must be given to policing them. And, in time, the conqueror grows rich and soft.

So much for speculation. This seems sure—tomorrow's world no matter who wins this war, will be a vastly different place than the world of today. There will, say the authorities, be famines, depressions, constant social and economic upheavals. The future for all nations is far from bright.

Congress Should Remain in Session During Emergency

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. HARRY McGREGOR
OF OHIO
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 9, 1940

RESOLUTION OF FACULTY OF OHIO WESLEYAN UNIVERSITY

Mr. McGREGOR. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution:

It was moved, seconded, and voted that we, the undersigned members of the faculty of Ohio Wesleyan University, believe that Congress should remain in session during the present emergency and that we communicate this opinion to our Congressmen.

Although deprecating the need of military preparation, we wish to express it as our conviction that, in view of the international situation, nothing short of an adequate-defense program should be developed. Immediate action must be employed in developing this program and we pledge our cooperation to such a program.

Furthermore, recognizing the desperate situation of men and women of high idealism in Europe, as well as the plight of children who must escape persecution, and remembering our tradition as the home of all lovers of freedom, we do hereby petition our Government to offer refuge to such persons through the temporary readjustment of our immigration legislation.

We believe that this present struggle involves an attack upon the ideal of democracy to which this country has been deeply committed, and we therefore reaffirm our faith in the democratic way of life. We recognize that democracy involves both obligations and rights, and that in such a time as this we must not make thoughtless statements which will weaken our stand, but we also remember that involved in democracy is a genuine respect for the conviction of many Americans with whom we may not agree.

In time of national crisis there is grave danger of public hysteria. The state of public opinion is already showing serious symptoms of this. It would be unrealistic and naive to deny the existence of danger from spies and disloyal persons in our midst. But the very fact that this is widely recognized is itself contributing to increase the present state of emotionalism in our own country. This has led to a second danger—the danger of abuse of sincere persons whose opinions vary perceptibly from the pattern of the community. It is possible that this abuse may reach such proportions as to imperil those values on which democracy itself rests. If so, our reaction to a real danger to our institutions will have produced a second and different danger which likewise threatens them. Enemies of democracy must not be confused with sincere believers in our institutions who merely differ on the policies these institutions should adopt. Differences do not indicate disloyalty, and the sooner this fact gains general acceptance the sooner shall we regain our stability of judgment and be able to proceed once more to meet the many genuine dangers that are ahead.

Wendell Willkie's Position on Foreign Trade

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROY O. WOODRUFF

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 8, 1940

Mr. WOODRUFF of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, we have presented to us a remarkable situation and one which may be considered very significant for the United States of America in view of the developments abroad which are resulting inevitably in an overturning of all the economies as we have been accustomed to them in the past.

The Republican Party is fortunate in that its position on the tariff and with regard to foreign trade in general was very ably and clearly set forth by Wendell L. Willkie, its candidate for President, in an article written by him appearing in the Saturday Evening Post, issue of June 22. The views presented in that article by our candidate are especially significant in that they not only accord with the foreign-trade plank of the platform adopted at Philadelphia but those views most effectively disclose the fallacies of the Roosevelt-Hull technique for foreign trade—a technique which has contributed so greatly to our continuing business depression.

It has come almost to be accepted in the public mind that the Republican Party is opposed to reciprocity and foreign trade. This is distinctly not true, because the Republican Party historically has been the party of reciprocity. It is the disagreement by the Republicans with the technique—the modus operandi—of the Roosevelt-Hull philosophy that has brought about the wide disagreement between the two doctrines.

I say that we are presented here with a remarkable and fortunate situation, because Mr. Willkie's views were written more than a month before the opening of the Republican National Convention which nominated him for the high office of Chief Executive of our Nation. His views can be found in the third column on page 75 of the Saturday Evening Post of June 22.

Let us examine these views somewhat in detail:

Mr. Willkie begins his views on foreign trade with the statement that "Foreign policy includes foreign trade. We want to promote our trade with the rest of the world."

Probably everyone in our Nation, Mr. Speaker, agrees with Mr. Willkie's position. Certainly we produce numerous products which we desire to sell abroad and there are many commodities not grown or fabricated in the United States that we need to maintain or to increase our standard of living.

But Mr. Willkie then makes this significant observation,

We have millions of men looking for jobs.

In times such as these, Mr. Speaker, it is obviously our first duty to look out for our own people. In fact, the Republicans believe there is never an hour when it is not our duty to look out for our own people first. We expect the peoples of other nations to look out for themselves first—and they do. There is no reason in philosophy or economics why we should not do likewise. It cannot be denied that the New Deal administration has been all too careless in opening the doors of our great, rich market to a flood of cheap competitive goods from abroad.

What we need, Mr. Speaker, to apply to this situation is some of the skillful Yankee horse trading of which Wendell Willkie has proved himself past master in the exchange of commodities with other nations. And that is exactly the plan Mr. Willkie discusses in his Saturday Evening Post article.

We have vast quantities of agricultural and industrial products looking for a market.

He says—

We can help the farmer as well as the worker by promoting our trade with other countries.

International trade agreements should be helpful to this objective. In a world where tariffs are so high as to prevent the exchange of goods, and in a world where some tariffs are obviously necessary to protect different wages and price levels, the reciprocal-trade treaty is simply a means whereby two nations sit at a table and say:

"We will agree to reduce the tariff on this product, which does not compete particularly with us, if you will agree to reduce the tariff on our products, which do not compete particularly with you."

Now, please note, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Willkie says in his article "two nations." His philosophy is sound. His philosophy is the philosophy of Abraham Lincoln. His philosophy is the philosophy of William McKinley. His philosophy is the philosophy of the Republican Party today. "The reciprocal-trade treaty is simply a means whereby two nations sit at a table and say that they will agree to reduce tariff on the products of each which are not competitive with the other," says Mr. Willkie. This is a realistic approach. Mr. Willkie's feet are on the sound earth when he discusses trade treaties in this fashion, just as his feet were on the sound earth when he was sweating on the wheat farms of Kansas and among the fruit trees of California orchards. We do not find here any of this Roosevelt-Hull most favored-nation sell-out which has resulted merely in giving away, broadcast, the advantages of our home market to producers in other lands in the very hour when they were not only giving us nothing in return but when many, if not most of them, actually were discriminating against us. I say we find none of this give-away attitude in Wendell Willkie's philosophy of foreign trade. Instead, he believes in direct action and in the capacity of America to get things done. In fact, he says as much in the next paragraph of his article, which I quote:

Americans have demonstrated that they are as good businessmen as the people in other countries. They can bargain efficiently in their domestic trade, and they can bargain with equal efficiency in their foreign trade. We had a foreign market worth billions of dollars to us once. To be exact, it was worth $5,240,000,000 in 1929—enough to provide thousands of jobs which the unemployed are now looking for. We may never get all of this trade back, but we certainly can get part of it back. Trade treaties are a step in that direction.

I said a while ago, Mr. Speaker, that Mr. Willkie's views on tariff and foreign trade were exactly in line with those of Abraham Lincoln and William McKinley. Let me quote a line or two from Lincoln:

I was an old Henry Clay-Tariff Whig. In the old days I made more speeches on that subject than any other.

I have not since changed my views. I believe yet, if we could have a moderate, carefully adjusted, protective tariff, so far acquiesced in as not to be a perpetual subject of political strife, squabbles, changes, and uncertainties, it would be better for us.

Let us see, Mr. Speaker, how closely Mr. Willkie's views on reciprocal trade agree with those laid down by President William McKinley, our greatest exponent of such agreements. In his first inaugural address President McKinley said:

The end in view is always to be the opening up of new markets for the products of our country by granting concessions to the products of other lands that we need and cannot produce ourselves, and which do not involve any loss of labor to our own people but tend rather to increase their employment.

Mr. Willkie's position is of course in line with the foreign-trade plank adopted last month by the Republican National Convention at Philadelphia. That plank is short, and I will quote it:

We are threatened by unfair competition in world markets and by the invasion of our home market, especially by the products of State-controlled foreign economies.

We believe in tariff protection for agriculture, labor, and industry as essential to our American standard of living. The measure of the protection shall be determined by a scientific method with due regard to the interest of the consumer.

We shall explore every possibility of reopening the channels of international trade through negotiation so conducted as to produce genuine reciprocity and expand our markets.

We condemn the manner in which the so-called reciprocal trade agreements of the New Deal have been put into effect without adequate hearings, with undue haste, without proper consideration of our domestic producers and without congressional approval. These defects we shall correct.

There is no question, Mr. Speaker, but what America will be heartened and infused with new courage when the people consider that next November, when our country shall have registered its approval of the tariff views expressed by Wendell Willkie and in our platform, the United States will be in position to start the return trip to our traditional prosperity and security.

By the Purge, New Deal and the Communists Attempting Defeat of O'Connor and McNaboe

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1940

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, many recall how, over a period of time, the President received the aid and support of Browder, Communist candidate for President, and his organization. Some have not forgotten the President's opposition to the Dies committee investigation nor how he characterized their proceedings as "sordid."

In the last campaign, the President came to the aid of the Communists in New York and, with their aid, succeeded in defeating a distinguished and valuable Democratic Member of Congress, John O'Connor. O'Connor occupied a high position in Congress. He was chairman of the Committee on Rules. He was honored, respected, and admired by all Members of Congress, regardless of party.

We remember, too, that when certain Communists or Communist sympathizers were called before the Dies committee, Mrs. Roosevelt attended the hearings with them and so gave them encouragement. Nor have we forgotten that she entertained them at her home in Hyde Park and, although she was the First Lady of the Land and the people have a right to have her respect that position, she told us that her entertainment of the Communists was her private affair.

We realize, too, that on many occasions she has, by her presence and her words, given the Communist organization, which teaches the overthrow of our Government by force and adopts a doctrine that there is no God, that religion is a fraud, encouragement and aid.

But, apparently, Franklin Delano Roosevelt has not ceased in his efforts to stab fellow Democrats in the back. Note this editorial from the New York Journal-American of June 28, 1940:

A PERIL TO LOCAL GOVERNMENT

When George Washington was President of the United States an attempt was made in Maryland to use his name and prestige to influence a congressional election.

General Washington would not countenance the effort.

Instead, that pure-minded patriot indited an indignant rebuke, affirming the democratic principle that the people should choose their own legislative representatives, without any kind of Executive interference.

New York City can bear witness that the principle which President Washington asserted nearly a century and a half ago is banefully disregarded nowadays.

Such a thing occurred here in the Sixteenth Congressional District when the New Deal—with the help of the Communists—succeeded in purging Representative John O'Connor out of Congress because he had opposed two New Deal measures which he deemed to be inimical to representative and responsive government.

That foray from Washington into New York deprived this entire State of its most influential Congressman, for Representative O'Connor was at the time, by virtue of seniority, chairman of the powerful House Rules Committee.

An even more flagrant invasion of State's rights, of State sovereignty, and of the people's suffrage has now been disclosed within the same congressional district, where the New Deal—in alliance with Tammany Hall—is said to have undertaken to prevent the reelection of John J. McNaboe in the sixteenth State senatorial district.

In Mr. O'Connor's case, the New Deal told the voters whom the New Deal wanted them to send to Congress.

In Mr. McNaboe's, the New Deal is attempting to tell the voters whom the New Deal wants them to send to their State legislature.

As in Mr. O'Connor's case, the New Deal and Tammany will have the hearty aid of the Communists, since Senator McNaboe was among the pioneers in exposing communism as a poisonous corrosive of Americanism.

The Democratic New Deal wants Senator McNaboe's political scalp, however, because he exercised, as a legislator, his democratic right of upholding the no-third-term tradition.

This is extraordinary, because Senator McNaboe—like Mr. O'Connor—is himself a Democrat, and Thomas Jefferson, the father of the Democratic Party, was—with George Washington—the actual author of the no-third-term tradition.

The voters in the Sixteenth District should think this situation over.

They should realize that whom they want to represent them in their State legislature is certainly none of the New Deal's business, and is certainly their business very much more than it is Tammany Hall's.

In sum, if the voters want John J. McNaboe to continue to represent them at Albany, they have both the right and the power to keep him there.

And let them remember that State and local government will be inevitably weakened, and eventually destroyed, if Federal administrations can use the overwhelming weight of Federal patronage to dominate State and local elections.

Who is Franklin D. Roosevelt that he should characterize the action of anyone as a stab in the back, as he charged was the recent action of Italy? From the beginning of his administration down to the present moment, the President has himself been stabbing in the back, not only his political friends, but our form of Government.

According to this recent editorial, the President is not satisfied in his efforts to defeat prominent Democrats, who might share the honors of his party, but he joins with the Communists in an effort to keep good Democrats who happen to disagree with him, who believe in constitutional government, from serving in a State legislature and in Congress.

John O'Connor is again a candidate for Congress in the Sixteenth New York District, which he so ably represented for 16 years. He deserves the support of every true American.

War or Peace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. VITO MARCANTONIO

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS OF HON. VITO MARCANTONIO, OF NEW YORK

Mr. MARCANTONIO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following radio speech delivered by me over the Mutual broadcasting network Saturday, June 22, 1940:

Americans today are faced with making the most fundamental and far-reaching decision in the history of our country—war or peace. This sounds simple, for even the worst warmonger will tell you that he is against war. The American people are overwhelmingly opposed to war. Hence, the real "fifth columnists" in our midst, those who are seeking to get us into war, will not at this time dare openly advocate war. Forcing America into war is a step-by-step process. In 1917 we were forced in at trolley-car pace. In 1940 our war makers attempt to force us in with "blitzkrieg" swiftness. If we acquiesce to these swift movements which are pushing the American people in the direction of war, we shall find ourselves plunged over the precipice into war by the momentum and speed of these very steps toward war. Therefore, unless the American people halt these movements and steps toward war at the very beginning we shall have no say over the final decision as to our actual entry into war.

At this point let me say, that there is no moral, economic, or social justification for our entry into the war in Europe. It is an imperialist war. While there may be a difference between the contending imperialist powers, that difference is one of degree and the degree is not big enough to warrant the loss of one American life. Our entry into it will bring no gain to the American people but only the loss of the lives of American youth and of our free institutions. The problems that will arise from a victorious Hitler cannot be solved by the grinding of the flower of American manhood on the battlefield.

If this war were a war of ideologies, if it were truly a war on which the outcome of our American way of living depended, if it were truly a war in which the interests of the American farmer, worker, the small-business man were involved, I would unhesitatingly advocate our immediate entry into it, resign my position in Congress, and march with the young men of my district. I am not a pacifist, I am willing to fight for the defense of my country, and in any war in which the interests of our American people are involved. The present war is no such war, and I am therefore resolved not only to oppose our entry into it, but to warn my fellow countrymen against that scheme of things which will make our entry unavoidable.

Let me therefore present in their true character the steps that we have been taking which are hurling us into this war. On May 16, the President addressed a joint session of Congress. We received a geography lesson from Tampico to St. Louis. Tremendous armaments were requested. An onslaught was launched simultaneously against the liberties of the American people. In the name of national defense, we were set forth on a program of preparedness, not for defense of our shores but for participation in this war. In the name of national defense, and under the guise of combating "fifth columnists," we became at once engaged in the hounding and persecuting of all those who dared raise their voices for peace. Since that day those who demanded peace were labeled "fifth columnists" and Trojan horses. The voices of the genuine antiwar forces in America had to be stifled, even though it meant the tearing up of the Bill of Rights of the Constitution of the United States. I characterized that address as tragically reminiscent of 1916 and 1917, a war hysteria "blitzkrieg" on the peace of the American people. Armaments and hysteria became the order of the day. What followed is history and a black page at that. Suppression of minority groups throughout the country, anti-noncitizen legislation in Congress, Congress for the first time in the history of the country legislating against one individual and passing a bill of attainder and banishment, depriving labor of its economic and social rights by the ripping up of labor's Magna Carta, the National Labor Relations law and a hue and cry raised by reactionary forces throughout America that the social and economic gains of the American people be destroyed. All in the name of national defense defined for us on May 16.

Then came the legislation for armaments. By the time we recess tonight we shall have by authorization and appropriation taken over $10,000,000,000 from the Treasury of the United States for war purposes, and at the same time, we have refused to grant the unemployed of this country more than $975,650,000 for W. P. A. workers. W. P. A. workers are being dismissed all over the country. With over 11,000,000 unemployed, and it being admitted that the armaments program will not make any dent in the number of unemployed, the program for America becomes uniforms, not overalls. I have cast the sole vote against this war-armaments program. I am ready to vote not $10,000,000,000 but $100,000,000,000 for the defense of our shores and our homes. I, however, refuse to vote one cent for an armament program which has become a vehicle for involvement and intervention in the war, for the destruction of the antiwar ideologies which have been built up over the last 23 years, for the abolition of our freedom and for the repeal of the progress that America has made during the last 7 years. Time and events since I registered my sole protest in Congress against this program have demonstrated, I submit, the correctness of my contention.

Witness the pledge at Charlottesville, of full aid short of war to the Allies. Aid short of war only shortens the distance between the peace of the American people and war. A neutral nation cannot remain out of war for long when it permits itself to become a military reservoir for one side of the belligerents.

Witness the turning over of the best dive bombers to the Allies, the attempt to turn over the mosquito fleet to them, and the turning over of the so-called obsolete firearms and munitions. These warlike steps are conducive to war and not peace for America.

At the beginning of this week Americans learned of the shocking proposal of universal compulsory training. According to the United Press, it is contemplated to conscript boys and girls of this country for a period of 1 year to train them for combat service, for duties in uniforms behind fighting lines, such as communication technicians and air-field mechanics, nonuniform technical training for work in industrial production units necessary for the support of a fighting army, and for conservation units trained to conserve natural resources of the Nation in time of war to prevent waste caused by plowing up the prairies or denuding of the forests. There is no difference between this plan and that of the forced military and labor camps of Nazi Germany. It is a page lifted out of the philosophy of Mein Kampf.

I seriously question the constitutionality of this plan. We are not at war. We are still at peace. It definitely constitutes the deprivation of the liberties of the American youth without due process of law.

If Congress were to accept this plan it would bar young people from the opportunity to secure training for permanent peacetime jobs; it would undermine trade-union standards by creating a reservoir of forced labor, thus reducing the American standard of living; it would destroy the vitality and initiative of free young people; and it would create a totalitarian domination over the bodies, minds, and lives of American youth.

Don't you see how this brings war right into your homes? We take the young men and the young women of this country from their homes and we place them in forced military and labor camps. This is the first step. The next step is to throw them into war. It was the first step that Hitler took against the youth in Germany. It is the first step that we take against the youth of America. The second step is war and the third step is death. I implore you to write to your Congressmen and Senators. They are your servants. Talk to your neighbors. Ask them to do the same. Exercise your rights as free Americans. Register your protest with your representatives against the Hitlerizing of American youth.

We are told that all this is necessary in order to preserve our American way of life. How much of that American life will be left to preserve and defend if we permit this "blitzkrieg" against the peace, freedom, and youth of America to succeed?

Remember you cannot preserve American democracy by destroying it, by curtailing it, or by limiting it. American democracy can live only by letting it live. War will destroy completely our American democracy. Forcing our youth into totalitarian existence under the pretext of training destroys most effectively our American way of living as we have known it.

The President once told us that this generation has a rendezvous with destiny. The youth of this generation have a rendezvous with destiny; not a destiny of the forced labor and military camps, not a destiny of unemployment, not a destiny of war and death. Let us resolve to formulate the destiny of our youth to be a destiny of peace, a destiny of jobs, a destiny of security, a destiny of happiness, and a destiny of freedom.

Narragansett Bay Cruise

OF

HON. FRANK B. KEEFE

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1940

Mr. KEEFE. Mr. Speaker, on a recent week end in the company of our colleague, the gentleman from Rhode Island [Mr. SANDAGER], we were privileged to enjoy an outing as the guests of a distinguished company of Rhode Island citizens associated together for fraternal and social purposes under the name of the Seaweed Club of Providence, Rhode Island. The event was the annual cruise of the members from Providence down Narragansett Bay and out into the Atlantic Ocean to Block Island.

To those who may not have had the privilege of enjoying such a cruise, and especially under such distinguished auspices, may I state that should the occasion present itself do not fail to accept the opportunity for a most joyous, pleasant, and instructive week-end. The trip from Providence down Narragansett Bay is like turning the pages of history, and events continuously reveal themselves as the boat passes one point of interest after another down the whole length of this famous body of water. Members of Congress should be especially interested because of the large proprietary interest of the Government in the upbuilding and maintenance of all manner of naval bases and equipment.

The trip from the mainland to Block Island offers a short ocean voyage that is particularly attractive. Here the ocean is dotted with fishing boats of all kinds, engaged in the business or sport of battling with the mighty tuna and the elusive swordfish. Game fishing of all kinds abounds at this spot. A choice of two splendid harbors on Block Island is offered as a safe haven for all types of seagoing water craft. In a very short space of time, on the water or in the air, one is removed from the hustle and bustle of modern civilization to a spot thoroughly American but offering a haven of refuge, of peace and quiet from the vicissitudes of ordinary American life on the mainland.

The island itself, being about 4 by 9 miles in size, has a very historic background; and while the record of the birth of the inhabitants of the island can be ascertained, there are no records available as to when or just how this island was created. It is enough to say, however, that records do disclose that it was noted by early explorers in the fifteenth century and that prior to 1636 it was inhabited by Indians. Some time thereafter the authorities of Massachusetts sent one Captain Endicott with a well-armed force onto this island for the purpose of exacting reparation from the Indians on account of the alleged killing of a Bay Colony man who had wandered onto the Indians' ground. It is recorded that the leader of this expedition and three others, in recognition of their meritorious services in dispatching practically the entire Indian population of the island, received it as a grant, and thereafter, in about the year 1661, it was sold to a group of settlers whose names now appear upon a memorial stone placed on the island in the month of September 1911 to commemorate the landing of the first citizens thereon. With their families, they numbered about 75. They were a sturdy lot and worked hard.

The island was heavily wooded, except where the Indians had grown crops. Much of the timber was scrub oak but here and there were clumps of beautiful trees. Deeming the island best suited for agriculture, most of the trees were cut down, and the scenic beauty produced by the forest gave way to fields of potatoes, corn, oats, and other crops. For many years the island supported these original settlers and their descendants and it became an exporter of dairy and agricultural products as well as fish. The island supported thousands of sheep, and exports of wool provided a considerable means of income for the residents there. For years these hearty people maintained themselves and developed churches, schools, and community life and produced a strain of real Americans that have survived right down to the present day. The island is traversed by good roads and the incessant toil of its people can be noted in the hundreds of miles of stone fences which have been built from rock taken out of the soil to make the boundaries of land ownership. For years the fishing industry of the island was one of note and many fishermen have been developed whose skill in fighting the elements of the sea is legendary along that part of the Atlantic seaboard.

As the years passed the attractiveness of the island as a resort impelled the construction of summer hotels and for many years the islanders have profited as a result of the steady stream of tourists who have come there to enjoy the wonderful climate, the splendid ocean beaches, the marvelous sport of fishing and boating, and, above all, the gracious and generous hospitality of the island citizens.

To meet a real Block Islander is to meet a God-fearing gentleman whose courage and hospitality know no bounds. It is not strange, therefore, that the "Seaweed Club of Rhode Island" first referred to should have placed in its constitution a provision that membership in the organization should accrue only as the result of initiation into the order conducted at Block Island.

Mingling with the people of Rhode Island and the citizens of Block Island, I am reassured in the faith that the spirit of the pioneers still lives and that truth and honor and decency and fear of God are to be found among these people as a mighty bulwark against any effort to destroy this Nation either from within or without.

REMARKS

OF

HON. CHARLES L. GIFFORD

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1940

Mr. GIFFORD. Mr. Speaker, this is such a provoking and challenging editorial and has caused so many letters and telegrams to come to me from my own district that I challenge you to help me answer this editorial to my people. I think it is worth reading.

In a fog of red tape the Army and the Navy block immediate defense.

Will you kindly reply in some way in order that I may make my people feel more comfortable?

IN A FOG OF RED TAPE THE ARMY AND NAVY BLOCK IMMEDIATE DEFENSE

We in this country are facing disaster, not economic, but military—a direct attack from Hitler in the event of Great Britain's defeat—and we are doing nothing about it—now.

Billions of dollars are being appropriated, vast armaments provided for. Plans for the Army and Navy stagger the imagination by their scope for the future. But immediate steps to ward off the immediate pressing danger of a Hitler attack are next to zero.

Unbelievable as it sounds, the reason we are doing next to nothing now to meet the immediate defense needs is the Army and the Navy.

Although there is hardly a modern plane in the United States Army today, few, if any, have been ordered since the invasion of the Netherlands and Belgium, since the President's demand for 50,000 airplanes.

This is not because of a shortage of machine tools, vital materials, or parts, nor because of a shortage of capacity in our plants.

The airplane industry today in the United States has a present capacity of military planes of 1,000 per month.

At present manufacture is but 500 a month, mostly for the Allies.

Responsibility for this delay in production lies at the door of the Army and Navy whose "indecision, lack of standardization, insistence on odd sizes, on specifications which do not fit the equipment of industry" have made mass production, or any other kind of production, impossible so far.

In 1 plane factory the Army a year ago ordered approximately 1,000 planes of a type then and now unequaled, but not 1 plane has been produced because it was impossible to satisfy fantastic Army inspection and production requirements. Nor has this anything to do with that other and controversial problem of whether standards should be lowered to permit rapid and sudden mass production, which accounts for the stupendous pace of Hitler's plane supremacy.

The 500 or more military plane-production facilities now available in the United States and unused cover present high-standard precision planes.

But the Army and the Navy cannot make up their minds.

They tie with red tape the hands of hundreds and thousands of loyal and capable workers and officials of the American aircraft industry. These are bewildered to see the crisis at hand and their important tools of defense production unused.

The situation is as bad, or worse, in the fields of tanks, antiaircraft guns, machine guns, artillery, and even rifles.

With hands tied by the frozen standards of the Army, it will be 2 years before production will be sufficient to arm the minimum-sized Army needed for defense with the type of rifle that the Army staff is demanding. Other weapons nearly or actually as good can be produced much quicker.

Knee-deep as both Army and Navy are in traditions and technicalities, there is no agreement between them. Each has its own petty opinions about scores of gingerbread items. Even the type of gasoline specified by the Navy is different from that demanded by the Army.

Why this strange blundering? Why this tragic indifference? Why, of all parties, must the Army and the Navy of this country stand in the way of our immediate needs in defense?

The bald truth is that the Army and Navy, like the American people themselves, have a peacetime psychology. Their plans and systems for procurement—and both the Army and Navy would deny this bitterly—were developed in and are adapted to peace, when time is not the all-important factor. Both have prided themselves on the quality of limited equipment, rather than quantity—a few tailor-made units rather than quantity production.

Starved, as the Army and Navy have been in years past, both have learned that there is a feast or a famine under the democratic system. A period of public-defense anxiety to them is an opportunity to get vast, long-delayed appropriations, a chance to fill the sock for a long time to come.

Judging by the orders actually placed for vital planes and "antiblitzkrieg" equipment to defend the country, the Army and Navy take the peril of immediate military attack no more seriously than might a farmer in the quietude of the Missouri Ozarks.

Yet, if the danger of military attack on this country is not immediate, it probably does not exist at all.

The fact is, the plans for that attack already are completed in the Hitler portfolio, as were those for attacking Poland, Norway, Denmark, the Netherlands, Belgium, France, and England. We are having our turn now at the same peace propaganda which lulled these nations into a false feeling of security.

This country is the only country in the world capable of successfully resisting Hitler, economically and in a military way. But Hitler does not wait for an enemy to prepare.

If the United States is not attacked by the armed forces of Hitler in a matter of months, it will be due to one of two things—(1) Successful resistance by England; or (2) Axis war with Russia.

The American people are not to blame for the situation in which they find themselves. They are willing to make whatever sacrifices are necessary to defend their liberties and their country.

They are not demanding long-range socialized war planning, nor do they want the scourge of war perfumed with words about the abundant life.

They want the Army and Navy—to whom they have given the task of their defense—to do this job efficiently and in time; and they want those they have chosen to represent them in government to see that this is done.

They will accept no explanations from Army, Navy, or politicians.

Five weeks ago, in a widely published preparedness platform, we called for:

"Shaking up the Army and Navy personnel, and smashing red tape and cumbersome inspection technique, which throttles mass production of planes and other vital war equipment."

Five weeks have gone and this has not been done.

Meanwhile, this country has announced Monroe Doctrine policies that a victorious Hitler will not accept.

Only the President, as head of the Army and Navy, has power to meet this situation.

Will he do so—in time?

Elimination of the Tax on Brandy Used in Fortifying Wine

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK H. BUCK
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 9, 1940

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, on June 24, 1940, the President approved H. R. 9117, which thereby became law. This act eliminates the tax on brandy and wine spirits used in the fortification of sweet wine; to compensate for the loss of revenue by the elimination of this tax, the tax on wines containing more than 14 percent of absolute alcohol was increased. The increase runs as follows:

On wines containing more than 14 percent and not exceeding 21 percent of absolute alcohol, an increase from 10 cents to 15 cents per wine-gallon; on wines containing more than 21 percent and not exceeding 24 percent of absolute alcohol, an increase from 20 cents to 25 cents per wine-gallon; all wines containing more than 24 percent absolute alcohol by volume are to be classed as heretofore, as distilled spirits, and taxed accordingly.

As the author of the bill, which I introduced on March 27, 1940, and which by order of the Ways and Means Committee I reported favorably to the House on June 5, 1940, it seems appropriate that I should make an explanation of just what is to be accomplished by this Act, and why vintners and grape growers desired its enactment.

The tax on brandy used in fortifying sweet wine which has now been repealed amounted to 10 cents per gallon. One gallon of brandy ordinarily takes care of 3 gallons of sweet wine, so that in fact the old fortification tax, which was in effect a processing tax, amounted to about 3⅓ cents per gallon in addition to the excise taxes which are collected by the Government at the time a finished wine is withdrawn from bonded wineries or storerooms for sale. The Government did not collect this tax at the time of fortification, but gave the producer 18 months in which to pay it. The theory of the extension of credit was to give producers an opportunity to hold the wines for aging through this additional time in which to pay the tax.

In reality, the 18-month credit worked out to the disadvantage of practically everyone concerned. S. W. Harkleroad, president of the Wine Institute of California, made the statement that this fortification tax on brandy had been a disturbing factor in the orderly marketing of wine for years. When it became due, underfinanced producers were forced to dump immature wine on the market to raise money for the Government assessment. In many cases, the wine involved had been sold to other producers. In any event, when time came for the payment of the fortification tax, many producers were without sufficient funds, and the dumping that Mr. Harkleroad referred to took place, forcing soundly financed wineries to meet ruinous prices. As a result, the whole industry suffered. The effects of this demoralization were often reflected directly in the prices received by growers for their grapes.

The Treasury Department had no love for this particular tax. Department officials testified that at the time of the passage of this act, delinquent fortification taxes amounted to $3,500,000. There are 29 suits pending against various wineries for delinquent taxes. While there will probably not be any actual loss of taxes to the Government, because it is protected by bonds, the process of collection was costing the Government a considerable sum and extensive effort every year. The consumer likewise suffered from the dumping which I have referred to, of improperly aged wines on the market.

The present act, at the new tax rates, will actually produce to the Government additional revenue annually, besides eliminating the costly collection procedure. This new combined tax will be paid as usual when wine is withdrawn from bonded wineries or storerooms for sale to the consumer.

I should note that the new rates referred to above, of 15 cents and 25 cents per wine-gallon, respectively, are permanent basic rates. To these, as to all other taxes on wines, the recently enacted Revenue Act of 1940 added a special defense tax of 20 percent, so that the rates now payable on withdrawal of sweet wines for sale are, respectively, 18 cents for wine containing 14 percent to 21 percent of alcohol, and 30 cents per gallon for wine from 21 percent to 24 percent alcoholic content.

Appropriate provision is made in the act for the filing with the Commissioner of Internal Revenue of a claim by the proprietor of any bonded winery or storeroom in which there was stored, on June 30, 1940, wine previously lawfully fortified with brandy for wine spirits. The Commissioner is authorized to issue to such proprietor documents entitling him to a credit of 5 cents per gallon in respect of each gallon of such fortified wine as the Commissioner shall find was on such proprietor's bonded winery or bonded storeroom premises on June 30, 1940, or in transit thereto. These claims must be filed on or before October 1, 1940.

Long conferences between representatives of the Wine Institute of California, of the Alcoholic Tax Unit of the Bureau of Internal Revenue, and the Treasury Department, in which I was happy to participate, preceded my introduction of the bill. Technical difficulties had thus been overcome and the Treasury Department offered no objection to the enactment of the law.

This has been a splendid example of cooperation between industry representatives and the Government, which we should have more of. I am personally very happy to have been of some service in connection with the enactment of this law. I sincerely hope that its application will bring about all the beneficial results that its proponents anticipate.

Congress Will Not Adjourn in a Crisis

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK H. BUCK
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, July 9, 1940

Mr. BUCK. Mr. Speaker, a goodly number of my constituents have written me urging that Congress forego the usual adjournment that ordinarily comes about this time of year. It is their belief that since admittedly there is a world crisis, changing in its aspects almost from hour to hour, that the country needs Congress here to take such steps as may be appropriate from time to time to protect our own national interests.

Some of the writers have felt that Congress could be stampeded into adjournment now. Let me set at rest that idea. Congress, except when called into special session, meets on a fixed date annually, January 3. No fixed date is set for adjournment, however. It requires passage of a concurrent resolution of the House and Senate to set an adjournment date. Therefore, once in session, unless such a concurrent resolution is adopted, Congress will remain in session—subject to constitutional 3-day recesses which either house may take independently of the other—until the beginning of the next regular session.

It is not necessary, consequently, to adopt a resolution to remain in session; it is sufficient to refuse assent to any resolution setting an adjournment date.

True, adjournment appeals to many Members. The Members have put in a long and wearying session and are tired. It is election year for all the Members of the House and for one-third of the Senators. Many, and I am one of those, still have both primary and general elections ahead of them. All realize the desirability of campaigning personally at home in their own districts.

Yet, with a knowledge of that desirability, the great majority in Congress has also become acutely conscious of the greater desirability that Congress remain in Washington. One of our leading political commentators recently expressed the view that when the very existence of parliamentary government is in question throughout the world, and when representative government is being extinguished to be replaced, as apparently it is to be now, even in France, the home of liberty, it is no time for this Congress to leave the scene of its activities. With that view I concur.

At the least adjournment would be subject to misinterpretation, perhaps willful, by the totalitarian powers. But more than that, this is a time for the United States to show the world that its legally elected legislative body can and will function in a time of crisis. Those of us who believe, as most Americans do, in our own processes of government, will be reassured by our remaining here, even though our labors are redoubled and even though we must act when we act with unusual care and watchfulness. Our citizens are entitled to know that their elected representatives are on the job and will remain on the job.

Mr. Speaker, as I have intimated I am definitely against any adjournment now. Even our defense program is not yet complete. Some $5,000,000,000 additional has been requested of Congress by the President only last week. These funds, when authorized and later appropriated, will be used for defense purposes, divided between Army and Navy in approximately the ratio of 3 to 2. Hearings are just starting on this request.

Other matters of primary importance are not only before us now, but may be expected to emerge as our plans proceed. For example, the compulsory military training bill. It will take some time to write a bill along this line that will be fair to the men called for training and yet of value and protection to our Nation as a whole.

Furthermore, these defense appropriations must be financed. The tax bill recently passed will not take care of what has been asked for already or what Congress will grant. Our Ways and Means Committee has promised to take up the subject of an excess-profits tax at the earliest possible date and has already requested the Treasury to have its views ready for presentation promptly. Other serious matters press for consideration.

With all this before us, neither I nor the majority of Congress can do otherwise than vote down an adjournment resolution. Despite the fact that the California primary election is set for August 27 and that I am a candidate for renomination and reelection; despite the fact that if we remain in session it will not be possible for me to go home and contact my constituents for more than a few days, if at all, my vote will be cast to stay on the job and complete the legislation indicated and required in this tragic crisis. The international situation is more vital than politics. As to my own campaign, I rely on the people of the Third California Congressional District who understand the dangers lurking in that situation to carry on for me during my absence at Washington.

ADDRESS BY DR. ARCHIBALD MACLEISH

Mr. KELLER. Mr. Speaker, as chairman of the House Library Committee, I want to bring to the attention of the Congress an address made by Dr. Archibald MacLeish, the Librarian of Congress, at the general session of the American Library Association in Cincinnati on May 31, 1940. Entitled "The Librarian and the Democratic Process," this searching inquiry into the problems faced by the librarians of our democracy deserves the attention of all, because the special problems of the librarians are but part of the common burden which the revolutionary developments in Europe have recently placed on all Americans. This address is a splendid statement of what librarians must do if they are to preserve and make effective the social institutions in which they and the great majority of Americans believe.

[From the A. L. A. Bulletin for June 1940]

THE LIBRARIAN AND THE DEMOCRATIC PROCESS

(By Archibald MacLeish)

It would be a brave man and an optimistic man who would suggest at this hour that the events of the past few weeks and months have been anything but evil. Certainly it would be a very foolish librarian who would suggest that there was any countervailing circumstance to balance the armed successes of obscurantism and brutal force. But there is, I think, one consequence of all this evil which may perhaps be turned to good, and not least by those who keep the libraries of this country. No one can look at Spain, at Austria, at Czechoslovakia, at Poland, at Finland, at Denmark, at Norway, at Holland, at Belgium, and at the situation in Europe of France and Great Britain without asking himself with a new intensity, a new determination to be answered, how our own democracy can be preserved.

And no one can ask with earnestness and intelligence how our own democracy can be preserved without asking at the very outset how his own work, his own activity, can be shaped to that end. Librarians will ask that question of themselves as others will. And asking it, they may perhaps arrive at certain conclusions as to themselves and their relations to the life of the country which will be valuable not only to the country but to themselves as well. Specifically they may perhaps arrive at certain conclusions as to the great question which, in speech and in silence, explicitly and implicitly, has troubled them so long—the question of their profession.

The wholly admirable attempt to put librarianship upon a professional basis, has, as I understand it, met this principal difficulty: That it has proved impossible to arrive at a common agreement as to the social end which librarianship exists to serve. Men are bound together in professions not because they speak in professional vocabularies or share professional secrets or graduate from professional schools. Men are bound together in professions because they devote themselves in common to the performance of a function of such social importance—a function so difficult, so particular, and so essential to the welfare of society—that it requires of necessity a discipline, a technique, and even an ethic of its own. The definition of that function in the case of librarianship has not proved easy. The social function of the medical profession is known to every member of that profession. The social function of the profession of the law was well known to lawyers in the years before the law became a business. But the ablest and most distinguished librarians declare without hesitation that they have not themselves arrived at a statement of the function of librarianship satisfactory to themselves, nor have their colleagues supplied the lack.

AGREEMENTS HAVE BEEN FRAGMENTARY

The literature of the subject, insofar as I have been able to consult it, would seem to bear them out. Librarians have apparently agreed at one time or another upon a description of their social usefulness, but their agreements have been fragmentary and of such a kind as to increase rather than to resolve the doubts of skeptics. At the time of the founding of this association, for example, librarians seem to have thought of themselves as purveyors of a harmless sort of recreation which would entitle the humbler citizens away from "the street, the saloon, and the low amusement places of the poor." (I quote from an article by Mr. Sidney Ditzion in the Library Quarterly.) Twenty years later this same association published a pamphlet called American Library Association Material for a Public Library Campaign, in which the association gave its blessing to a series of quotations which Mr. Ditzion reprints. Mr. Andrew Carnegie is cited as holding the opinion that the purpose of a library is to "improve" the masses. Mr. Henry E. Legler supplies the view that the purpose of a library is to "furnish the ambitious artisan with an opportunity to rise." Mr. F. A. Hutchins is authority for the proposition that the purpose of a library is to give "wholesome employment to all classes for those idle hours which wreck more lives than any other cause." It is at least doubtful to my mind whether librarians would accept these descriptions of their usefulness today. And if they did, it would be even more doubtful that a professional function would have been defined. To provide harmless recreation in competition with the street and the saloon is not a profession; if it were, Hollywood would be a profession from producers and directors down to ticket takers and ushers in plum-colored regimentals. To give wholesome employment for those idle hours which wreck the young is not a profession. And neither, in any realistic and comprehensible sense, is the "improvement of the masses." There are many things essential to the "improvement of the masses," if we are to permit ourselves that patronizing phrase, which have no professional implications whatsoever.

FORCED TO RECONSIDER OUR LIBRARIANSHIP

Definitions such as these do not, of course, exhaust the field. There are many more besides. But definitions such as these taken together with the contemporary state of mind would seem to establish the fact that no generally accepted or acceptable definition of the function of librarianship has yet been found. It is to this situation that the disasters of the last few months and their effects upon the American mind would seem to have application. For the destruction of democratic governments in Europe forces us as librarians to reconsider our librarianship, not in a vacuum, and not in relation to ourselves, but in relation to a democratic society * * * and, more, in relation to a democratic society which stands in the face of very present dangers.

A newcomer entering the library scene cannot avoid the impression that some at least of those who have undertaken in the past the labor of putting librarianship upon a professional basis began not with the inward function of librarianship but with the outward furniture of professionalism—the professional schools and the professional terms and the professional privileges. The kind of reconsideration which danger now forces upon us is a reconsideration which cuts beneath all this to the essentials of our work and of our lives. Today we ask ourselves not how we can prove that our profession is a profession but what we can do to preserve and make effective the social institutions in which we believe. More briefly, we ask ourselves what we as librarians in a democracy can do. And in the answer to that question, if we can find it, we may also find the solution of the difficulty which has plagued us for many years. "Out of this nettle danger" said a brave man once. Out of this nettle danger we may pluck not only for our country but for our life's work a meaning it has never had before.

IMPLICIT IN THE NATURE OF THE CRISIS

The relation of librarianship to the present and impending democratic crisis is not, I think, impossible to describe. On the contrary, it is implicit in the nature of the crisis. What democracy as a way of government and a way of life now faces is the threat of a competing form of government, a competing way of life, which is more immediately efficient than democracy because it sacrifices to efficiency—to commercial efficiency and to military efficiency—every other consideration, whether of individual freedom or of moral loyalty or of human decency—which could in any way detract from efficient military or commercial operation. What democracy as a way of government and a way of life now faces, in other words, is this—the question whether it can survive in competition with a more efficient way of government and a more efficient way of life which achieves its efficiency precisely by suppressing and destroying and eliminating all those human values which democracy was created to achieve.

HOW ARE THE PEOPLE TO BE INFORMED?

Can a form of government and a way of life, in which the basic decisions are made by the people themselves, in the people's interest, and after discussion and reflection, survive in competition with a form of government and a way of life in which the basic decisions are made in secret by a single will? This was the question the President of the United States presented to the Eighth Inter-American Scientific Congress. It is a question the events of the last few days have presented with ever-increasing intensity to all Americans—and not least to those who keep the country's libraries. But to us the question is presented with a particularity and a specific meaning which absorbs all our thought. For the question to us is not the question of public action but the question of public information. If the basic decisions are to continue to be made by the people, and if they are now to be made by the people, not in conditions of peace with margin for error, but in conditions of threat and danger and imminent war with no margin of any kind, how are the people to be informed? How are they to be provided not only with knowledge of the new facts creating the specific issue to be decided, but also with knowledge of the relevant parts of the historical record which constitute the precedents for action? How are they to be provided with defenses against the special pleading—the propagandas—the new propaganda which now impudently tells them, with all the lessons of Europe spread out for them to see, that they need not act, that no one wishes to attack them, that if they will only delay, if they will only remain weak and silent and defenseless, they will be safe; that if they will only wish to keep out of war they can keep out of war—as Norway wished, as Holland wished, as Finland wished? How are they to be provided with the facts of record, the chapters of their own experience, the materials they must have and have quickly and in the most useful form if they are to decide well and decide wisely the issues upon which all the future hangs?

These are the questions which present themselves to us when we consider our lives and our work not in abstract but in relation to the danger in which democracy now stands. For it is we who are the keepers—the proud keepers—of these records of the experience of our people, these precedents for decision. And it is we, if it is anyone, who will devise means and establish ways to make these precedents available to those who need them. What means we will devise, what ways we will establish, it is not for me, the youngest in point of service among you, to attempt to say. I have no doubt the leaders of our profession have long considered this most obvious and most desperately pressing problem and have drafted proposals to submit to you. But of one thing I am sure—that however we answer these urgent, these insistent questions—whatever technical procedures we adopt—the necessity of facing this problem in these terms cannot help but advance our understanding of our work and of ourselves. For no one, I believe, can think of librarianship in the terms of this necessity without a reconsideration of its basic purpose. And no one can think of librarianship in these terms without concluding that the notions of librarianship sometimes held are less than adequate. If librarians accept a responsibility for the survival of democracy insofar as they can assure that survival, if librarians accept a responsibility to make available to the people the precedents for decision and for action in order that the people may govern by them—then librarians cannot satisfy that responsibility merely by delivering books from public libraries as books are called for, nor can they satisfy that responsibility in reference libraries merely by supplying scholars with the materials of scholarship. They must do far more.

They must themselves become active and not passive agents of the democratic process. And they must think of their libraries not as patented machines to deliver to the asker the book he wants, their responsibility and obligation ending when the book is delivered to his hands. They must think of their libraries as organizations of intelligent and well-trained men and women qualified to select from the record in their keeping such materials as are relevant to the decisions the people must make and able to provide those materials to the people in a useful form. They must think of their libraries in other words not as books and catalogs with the men to serve them but as expert men to whom the books and catalogs are tools for the performance of a duty. They must think of their libraries as the director of a legislative reference service thinks of the books he uses, not as the director of a circulation service thinks of books—they must think, that is, as the director of a legislative reference service who serves not Congress only or a legislature, but a people.

That such a service would be as difficult to perform as it is difficult to define we must, of course, admit: democracy is difficult and in no aspect more so than in the provision of information and the preparation for action. But that such a service is impossible of accomplishment we will no more admit than we will admit that democracy is impossible of defense. To subject the record of experience to intelligent control so that all parts of that record shall be somewhere deposited; to bring to the servicing of that record the greatest learning and the most responsible intelligence the country can provide; to make available the relevant parts of that record to those who have need of it at the time they have need of it and in a form responsive to their need—surely these are not difficulties beyond the competence of the men and women who have constructed in this country one of the greatest library systems the world has seen.

There are dangers in such an undertaking. But there are dangers also—even greater dangers—in refusing to attempt it. And the rewards of success are rewards worth seeking. Not only would the cause of democracy, the cause we believe to be the cause of civilization, be served; but it is conceivable that the profession to which we belong might find in the process the definition of its function for which it has sought so long—a function as noble as any men have ever served.

The Fourth of July, the Nation's Birthday

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DAVID I. WALSH

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 10 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. HENRIK SHIPSTEAD, OF MINNESOTA

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an able and patriotic speech by the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. SHIPSTEAD], delivered in his home city, Northfield, Minn., on the Fourth of July.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE FOURTH OF JULY, THE NATION'S BIRTHDAY

One hundred and sixty-four years ago today the foundation of the United States was laid in the adoption of the Declaration of Independence. That was the first political document in the history of the human race, expressing the principle that all men are entitled to a position of equality before the law. It recognized that man is endowed by his Creator with certain inherent rights that the government shall not take away from him. It was the first expression of a publicly accepted political principle—a government is the servant of men and not their master.

DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE FOUNDATION OF CONSTITUTION

This document later became the foundation of the Constitution for the purpose of carrying into effect by law the political principles thus enunciated. This theory of equality before the law had been proclaimed before in the teaching of the lowly Nazarene, who came to a world governed by dictators, and an earthly population composed of 90 percent slaves and about 10 percent freemen. The slave had no standing before the law. The Nazarene brought to this earth the doctrine that all men were children of the same Divine Father, and therefore brothers, and that before the judgment seat of divine law, rich and poor, powerful and weak must stand in judgment on a basis of equality.

This was a very revolutionary doctrine. It threatened the very foundation of existing order and resulted in centuries of war and strife until at last the principle of equality was established, the principle that before the judgment seat of God Almighty all men were equal. That principle having been established, men began to question, "Why not equality before the civil courts of the land?" That led to a struggle to achieve political equality, resulting in more centuries of war, until finally that principle was written into the Declaration of Independence.

FREEDOM PROTECTED BY CONSTITUTION

As I have already noted, the adoption of the Constitution followed later and under its protection, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, the right to peacefully assemble, religious liberty, have been preserved in this land until this day. The United States of America from its birth became the haven of refuge for the oppressed and poverty-stricken peoples of all European races. They came here to a land that guaranteed them not only freedom from political and religious persecution, but they came to a land that gave them an opportunity to own land, to own a home, to worship God in their own church according to the dictates of their conscience * * * a land and a government that offered them citizenship, and only asked in return that they help build the Nation, maintain order, and preserve our institutions—as well as enjoy them.

NATION GROWS GREAT IN FREEDOM

In looking back upon these 164 years, it is amazing to contemplate how well they built it, and how loyal to this country's institutions they have remained. And why not? The poorest peasant could come here, and in a few years could have a better farm than the landlord who lorded over him in the old country. No one interfered with his normal way of living. No one interfered with him or his family in attending the same church and worshipping the same God that he had worshipped in the old country. He came to a land that by its Constitution prohibits a religious test for holding office.

He could sing his own folk songs in his own language, he could dance his own folk dances as he danced them in the land from which he came. He could sing the same hymns that he brought with him, in whatever language he could sing them.

As a result we have here a mixture of the culture of all lands, out of which in time will come the true American culture. We can say with the Apostle Paul, "We are the heirs of all ages."

We have escaped from the political and religious persecutions of Europe. There have been comparatively few mild waves of religious and racial prejudice manifested, but they have gained no headway because of the protection of the Constitution and our courts, for all men, regardless of race or creed.

It can be truly said, in view of all the circumstances, that the American people have succeeded to a marked degree in keeping old-country prejudices and bigotry from coming to find a home on American soil. That is the foundation of our freedom. For that our fathers came here from the beginning. To these principles we have remained true.

Under the benign protection of our Constitution we have become more and more a united people. Through the courage, thrift, and industry of our people we have become powerful. With great power come great responsibilities. The administration of that power for good or ill and the general welfare of our people depend upon the intelligence and moral character of every American citizen. Here every citizen is his own ruler—in fact, his own king. All power of government here is inherent in the people, who have delegated limited power with specific restrictions to its local, State, and Federal Government. In no other way can the people be masters of the Government instead of its servant.

As this Government was born out of revolution, so it was preserved by civil war, and it is well to remember that in the war to preserve the Union newly arrived immigrants volunteered and fought as bravely as the descendants of those who came on the Mayflower. We have grown and developed in freedom from a narrow strip of scattered settlements along the Atlantic coast to become a great nation—the envy of all the world. We have become great and strong in our own right because we have been true to ourselves. We have, under the guidance of patriotic statesmen, been able to keep out of the political, religious, and military upheavals in Europe and other parts of the world. In this policy our people have, for something like a century and a half, supported men like Washington, Jefferson, Jackson, Monroe, Lincoln, and Cleveland because they would have no traffic with the political systems of countries from which they escaped when they came to the United States. They have remained true to the warning of our first President, George Washington, in his Farewell Address, when he said:

"Europe has a set of primary interests, which to us have none, or a very remote relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns. Hence, therefore, it must be unwise in us to implicate ourselves, by artificial ties, in the ordinary vicissitudes of her politics, or the ordinary combinations and collisions of her friendships or enmities. Our detached and distant situation invites and enables us to pursue a different course.

"If we remain one people, under an efficient government, the period is not far off when we may defy material injury from external annoyance; when we may take such an attitude as will cause the neutrality, we may at any time resolve upon, to be scrupulously respected; when belligerent natons, under the impossibility of making acquisitions upon us, will not lightly hazard the giving us provocation; when we may choose peace or war, as our interest, guided by our justice, shall counsel. Why forego the advantages of so peculiar a situation? Why quit our own to stand upon foreign ground? Why, by interweaving our destiny with that of any part of Europe, entangle our peace and prosperity in the toils of European ambition, rivalship, interest, humor, or caprice?"

WE SHOULD RETURN TO POLICY OF NO ENTANGLEMENT IN FOREIGN POLITICS

To this day that doctrine should remain ours. European history through the centuries is one of almost continuous warfare. Large and increasing populations on restricted areas of land beget hunger and cry for more land, more raw material, more food.

Ambitious rulers, determined to hold their position in seats of power by methods of war if necessary, prepare their people for war through the spreading of propaganda of hatred against other nations and peoples until some overt act can be seized upon to lead their people to war. And if the overt act does not occur at the selected hour, overt acts can easily be manufactured to serve as the excuse for precipitating their people into the shambles of war.

The tragedy of Europe has been that in order to have war, hatred must first be engendered in the hearts of men—of people against people, nation against nation—because the dominating force of war is hate. The tragedy of life is that out of this hate engendered in order to conduct war, comes a treaty to so-called peace, enforcing by the conquerer upon the conquered, conditions conceived in hate and revenge, carrying the seeds for the next war.

And so we find that European wars have been a series—one after the other. MacKenzie King, Premier of Canada, said something like this more than a year ago.

"To expect that the people of Canada shall be called upon every 20 years to enter a war in Europe to help restore order in a continent that cannot govern itself seems to many people plain insanity."

We were induced to become a party to the European war in 1917. The aims of the war were made attractive by propaganda. It was said the war was between autocratic dictators of the Central Powers and democracies, and on the side of the democracies were the Czar and his Imperial Government of Russia, and the Emperor of Japan—strange as it may seem. The emotions of our people were whipped to a frenzy. Any citizen who expressed doubts as to the wisdom of our country entering upon that war was branded as disloyal and a traitor. This was to be a holy crusade to protect and preserve and defend the democratic principles of government. And so we joined with our men and our resources, the forces of the Russian Czar and the Emperor of Japan, in what we were told was the last great war for the ideals and blessings of democracy.

The cost of that experiment has as yet not been estimated or calculated. The cost to the National Government to conduct the Civil War was five billion, not only to conduct the war, but to aid 3 years of reconstruction. The cost of our European experiment in repudiated and accumulated debts can be estimated only in part—but the suffering that resulted from the collapse of our national economy, under which we are still suffering, cannot be calculated because it is still with us. As a reward, we have discovered that there was less democracy in the world after the World War was over than before.

PRESIDENT WILSON DISILLUSIONED

After his great disillusionment, President Wilson, who led us in that crusade, stated in an address in St. Louis after the war was over, that the World War No. 1 was a commercial war for territory and our commerce and trade. As a result of the hatred engendered, a treaty of peace was signed, exposing the war aims of the victorious powers.

Documents in the State Department made public 2 or 3 years ago showed us that the secret treaties made not only by Russia, Italy, France, and England, as well as by Germany and Austria, were to divide the territory of the world among themselves if they should become victors. The records show that these secret treaties on the part of our Allies had been placed in the State Department by Mr. Balfour in 1917, but our President, Woodrow Wilson, upon his return from his first trip to Paris, stated to the Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate that he did not learn of these secret treaties of our Allied Powers until he came to Paris. So much, in brief, for past history of our experiment in European politics.

In 1922, when the people of Minnesota elected me to the United States Senate, I stated at that time: "We are already in danger of being involved in the next World War that seems inevitable as a result of the last war." Time will not permit on this occasion for me to go into the reasons for that statement further than I have already tried to make clear. In 1931 and again in 1938 I was sent to Europe by the Senate of the United States. On both occasions, upon my return, I stated that Europe is a ship sailing with a corpse in the hold. To those who do not understand the meaning of that phrase I will say it comes from an old superstition of sailors that a ship sailing with a corpse in the hold is bound for destruction, and Europe was sailing with the corpse of the last war—and Europe is now sailing the seas of destructive war.

EUROPE GOING TO PIECES

This war is a colossal tragedy for Europe. The economic life of Europe is going to pieces. Last winter there were millions of hungry and freezing people in Europe, and next winter there will be many more. The war is being fought on paper money. Europe is not only sinking in a sea of blood, but in a sea of debt that can only end in a complete collapse of its credit and currency. If the war should stop today it will take many years for Europe to come back to normal production and distribution of food and other products. If the war shall be prolonged human beings, not only in Europe but also here, even if we can muster the will to keep out, will make the depression following the last World War look like summer zephyr as compared to a Kansas cyclone.

The war is wrecking Europe and is preparing it for the early starvation of increasing millions of men, women, and children not only in the warring countries but in the neutral countries as well. Hunger, suffering, and famine furnish the most fertile soil for social disorder and revolution. The statesmen responsible for this war and its continuation may find that they and their people will pay a greater price than they ever dreamed of. There was in no country in Europe amongst the people any desire for this war. They are the victims of their governments. There were too many memories of the griefs and poverty and suffering of the last war on which to build any enthusiasm for the present war. It is only because of the men in high places of the governments of Europe that war is possible, and they have gone to desperate lengths by their propaganda to generate hysteria and hate in order to conduct war at all.

If the war continues as it has started it must be plain to everyone that it will result in the slaughter of millions of men and in the creation of millions of widows and orphans. The frightful tragedy is that this terrible war will add nothing to human happiness, nor will it influence in the least iota the saving of democracy, because war destroys democracy. War destroys democracy because it causes national bankruptcy, and national bankruptcy produces poverty, unemployment, hunger, and suffering, and no democratic form of government can exist in such soil.

The first casualty in war is the truth. The second is democracy and human freedom. National bankruptcy, hunger, and suffering bring more and more centralization of government into dictatorships. If this war continues, I venture to say that instead of saving democracy, it will destroy every democracy that still remains. Tens of millions of families in Europe—men, women, and children—are praying to God every day that He will put some good will into the hearts of our political leaders and inspire them to declare an armistice. A man of wide experience who has spent the last 20 years in Europe as a representative of one of our great corporations and who has spent 8 months since the war started, and has traveled in every belligerent country, says that peace would bring general delirium of joy, a universal escape from fear, terror, horror, despair, and material and spiritual misery and devastation, into this maelstrom of human suffering, brutal and merciless slaughter of millions of men.

There are men and women in the United States who believe that it is the duty of the United States to again intervene. They sneer and malign men and women who do not agree with their point of view. It is said by a famous philosopher that humanity can only learn one thing from history, and that is that they cannot learn anything. As a result, history repeats itself and poor humanity, having forgotten the danger signals along which former generations have traveled, travel the same road. As a result we have already drifted far into the shambles of a World War. It is said we can do that and still not make war.

Since the last World War we have played with matches in the powder house of international affairs, which is filled with dynamite. We have taken varied positions in international affairs and our policies have had a great deal to do with causing the impoverishment of Europe and the present war. How far we have gone in the direction of causing this war is too early at this time to appraise and determine. We have been fed on a propaganda since the last war that it was inevitable that we must enter the next war, which is now upon us. That propaganda has been organized and has been persistent.

DICTATORSHIPS A RETURN TO POLITICAL SLAVERY

We are already conducting an undeclared economic war on the countries we have identified as our potential enemies. Certainly we abhor the theories of dictatorial government prevailing in different parts of the world, and we look upon them as something modern and new, forgetting that there is nothing new under the sun. Dictatorships were repudiated in theory centuries ago. There is nothing new in communism or in the near communism called national socialism. It is only a new name that has been given to them. These systems of government have been revived from the garbage dump heaps of the past, painted up with a new name, and sold to gullible people as new doctrines of human, economic, and political salvation. Humanity, not knowing the history of the past, does not recognize them as systems for reinstating human slavery, under the theory that the government is the master of the people instead of its servant.

In this upheaval of economic and political convulsions shaking the world, what is the best defense that we, the citizens of America, can prepare and assume to defend our national life and our freedom? What can America do for the benefit of its people against becoming contaminated with the colossal catastrophe that is degrading and destroying Europe? In 1917 when our boys went over to Europe to fight, we were told we were taking part in creating a new world and a new order of society.

If we should at this time become induced by policies of our statesmen to enter upon that experiment again, and they shall send our sons eventually to Europe to fight, can't we be more honest with them this time than we were the last time? Can't we give our sons a more definite idea what the brave new world will be like? Are we sure, and are these people who are trying to get us into the war sure, that sending our men and guns to Europe to help shoot up the place will have anything to do with constructing a more orderly Europe? If we are again compelled by our statesmen to enter this World War, which they still do not have the courage to say they want us to enter is there an opportunity that before we join the fight we should like to know what the fight is all about and what the terms of peace will be when the fight is finished? Will our entry into the war help to further destroy Europe and European civilization, including our own, or will the mission of America be to preserve upon the soil of America the last vestige of democracy and freedom by defending the soil of America against all conquest, either military or ideological, so that America shall continue to be a refuge for the oppressed, unfortunate people of the world who suffer from the mistakes and cruel blunders of their statesmen?

I believe that a nation, like men, must remain true to its confession of faith and if our Nation does that, we shall remain true to the traditions we followed for 150 years, during that time when we traveled the road of being true to ourselves, true to our Constitution, true to our institutions.

As a people our forefathers came from Europe to escape the social, economic, and political disorder of the land of their birth to come to the United States as refugees to a haven of safety which we have enjoyed and which we must preserve with our lives, if necessary, under the American flag and on American soil. The slogan of American citizens must be: "These ideas and these forces representing human, economic, and political slavery shall not pass."

On this, the Nation's birthday, it is for us to rededicate ourselves to the principles for which our founders pledged their lives and their sacred honor. Our Nation was born in the baptism of revolution against European dictatorship. Let us remain true to the faith in which our forefathers gave their lives that this Nation might live.

A Joint Debate on the War Referendum

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Tuesday, July 9, 1940

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, on July 6 the American Forum published simultaneously in various newspapers throughout the country the views of Col. Louis Johnson, the Acting Secretary of War, and myself, on my proposed amendment to the Constitution which would give the people a right to vote on proposals to participate in overseas wars.

The American Forum is an institution for exchange of views which is becoming very well known throughout the country. Theodore Granik, its able founder and director, is careful to select subjects of timely interest, and he chooses as participants in these newspaper debates persons who are especially well identified in the public mind with the subjects that are presented. In this particular case I felt complimented on having as my opponent the very capable and distinguished Acting Secretary of War, Colonel Johnson. He was not a new antagonist. It will be remembered that in December 1937, after a majority of Members of the House had signed a discharge petition to bring my war-referendum proposal before the House for debate and a vote, Colonel Johnson made a tour of the country speaking in opposition to it. His speeches were effective and were an important factor in encompassing its defeat at that time.

In submitting for discussion in the American Forum this question of permitting the people to be the jury to decide whether we shall enter overseas wars, Mr. Granik, the director, made the following introductory statement:

With the problem of national defense uppermost in the mind of every American, considerable attention again has been focused on the resolution introduced by Representative LOUIS LUDLOW, of Indiana, providing for declaration of war only by popular vote.

It recommends an amendment to the Constitution of the United States providing that, except in the case of invasion, the authority of Congress to declare war should not become effective until confirmed by a majority vote in a Nation-wide referendum.

Considerable controversy has raged over the proposed legislation, as opinion is sharply divided as to the practical effectiveness of a popular vote in the event our country should be faced with deciding whether to go to war overseas. The war crisis abroad has brought this question home to many millions of Americans.

Herewith are presented the views of two outstanding leaders in public life, written exclusively for this page.

Since I am the proponent of the war-referendum resolution, the duty of opening the debate fell to me. My statement, advocating a referendum on overseas wars, was as follows:

The proposal that the people shall have something to say about making war, since they are the ones who have to suffer, and, if need be, to die, and to bear the unspeakable burdens and griefs and costs of war, is not a new idea. Its origin is shrouded in the mists of antiquity. I imagine I can hear the widows of Macedonia cry in anguish, "Oh, why did Alexander the Great send our husbands to die on the spears of Darius' men without allowing them to have anything to say about it?"

Throughout the long train of ages, as far back as human history records, it has been the rulers and not the people who have made war. This unchallengeable truth was graphically expressed by Woodrow Wilson, scholar and statesman, when he said he had known of governments making war on governments, but never within the range of his study and observation had he known of "peoples making war on peoples."

For more than 40 years, in my writings and speeches, I have been trying to bring before the American people the idea that in a democracy, a form of government supposed to be founded on popular rule, the people should have something to say about making war. The proposition I am advocating, a plebiscite on participation in nondefensive overseas wars, is not of sudden inspiration, nor is it suggested by anything now going on in the world.

Long ago, in a time of profound peace, when there were no war clouds in sight, I brought it forward as a proposed long-range program for the future of America. My studies and observations had led me to a very deep and strong conviction that the time had come when we should complete our Bill of Rights by adding one more guaranty, namely, "No participation in overseas wars without the consent of the people." I introduced my first resolution on the subject in January 1935, and by the middle of December 1937 a majority of the House of Representatives had signed a petition to bring the measure up for debate and a vote. Thereupon powerful forces swung into action and the motion for consideration was defeated by a narrow margin.

This sealed the resolution in the catacombs of the Judiciary Committee, where it has remained ever since. I have introduced another discharge petition, to which 64 Members, representing over 18,000,000 people, have attached their signatures, but the petition will not become effective until it is signed by 218 Members, a majority of the House. Further progress toward the achievement of this constitutional reform will be made when constituencies that favor a referendum on foreign wars persuade their Representatives to sign discharge petition No. 4 now at the Speaker's desk.

MOVING TOWARD WAR

The advisability from the Nation's standpoint of having such a permanent provision in the Constitution is, I think, becoming more sharply and clearly indicated all the time. We are moving not precipitately but slowly and gradually, in the direction of war.

If the time comes when a decision is to be made whether our boys shall be sent into war's hell across the sea, who should make that decision? My contention is that the people should be the jury to make the decision. The principal, and not the agent, should decide, and in this case the principal is the American Nation.

I would place on that jury, along with the men, the women of our country and every boy over conscription age. Surely a boy who is subject to conscription as cannon fodder has a right to vote in a plebiscite on war. And why should not women have a vote? Women go down into the valley of the shadow of death to bring our boys into the world. Why should they not have something to say about whether their flesh and blood shall be hurled into the hell of a foreign war? In the present Congress only 7 of the 531 Members are women, so you see how pathetically impotent is the opportunity now afforded to give expression to whatever may be women's viewpoint on any particular war proposal.

The people of America are today overwhelmingly opposed to entering war overseas. They loathe and despise the dictators but it is not the dictators they fear the most. They fear more than anybody else the internationalists and interventionists in our own country. They are afraid they will keep on meddling until they get us into war, and their apprehensions have not been quieted in the least by the appointment of two of the most outspoken interventionists in America as heads of the two departments charged with the responsibility of making war.

WOULD "STABILIZE" PEACE

If there was at this time a provision in our Constitution that the people shall be the jury to decide whether we enter overseas wars, there would be no likelihood that our boys would be sent into the holocaust now raging in Europe. Such a provision would be a stabilizing influence for peace. I believe that if it is written into the Constitution it will keep us out of all foreign wars, and indeed out of all wars, unless occasion should arise to wage a war of self-defense—which I think is very unlikely to happen.

The only tenable argument ever made against a referendum on foreign wars was that too much time would be consumed in obtaining the decision of the people and that this would give the enemy an advantage.

I will grant that in the early days of the Republic, when means of communication were imperfect or nonexistent, this was a valid argument. But now it is all different. The fast trains, airplanes, telephone, telegraph, and radio have annihilated time and space. The President, sitting before a microphone at Washington, addresses the entire Nation. Modern means of communication have made a referendum perfectly practicable and feasible. If my proposed amendment is adopted the general staff will set up the necessary machinery to hold a referendum on short notice, though in the case of entering a foreign war there will be no pressing time limit.

ONLY OVERSEAS WAR AFFECTED

My proposed war referendum has been so often and grievously misconstrued that I would like to make clear the fact that it applies only to overseas wars. In case the United States or any other country in the Western Hemisphere is attacked or invaded, the referendum would not apply. In every way it protects and safeguards the Monroe Doctrine.

The proposition seems to me to be so intrinsically meritorious and so completely in harmony with our democratic philosophy, that I do not see how anyone who believes in democracy can oppose it. The citizen can now vote for constable or dog catcher, but he has no vote on the greatest and most tragic question that can possibly affect him and his loved ones—the question of peace or war.

Such a right would be as precious to the citizen in the ages of the future as any of the sacred rights now guaranteed to him by the Bill of Rights, and the exercise of it would not in any way, shape, or degree impair or weaken our national defense. Rather would it inspire the citizen more than ever with the conviction that he has a country worth fighting and dying for in any war of defense.

I myself believe that a combination of strong national defense coupled with a referendum on foreign wars would be the very best peace insurance our country could have in the years to come.

Colonel Johnson closed the debate and his statement was as follows:

I am unalterably opposed to a war referendum. Its adoption would invite military disaster. Encroachment in the Western Hemisphere by non-American powers would be encouraged. Our continued existence as a free nation would be seriously jeopardized.

We are committed to a policy of hemisphere defense. This course of action is based not only on altruism but, above all, on stern military necessity. The acquisition by aggressive non-American powers of operating bases anywhere in the New World is a definite and serious threat to the safety of the United States.

These are the days of blitzkriegen. An enemy who attacks to gain such footholds will give us little or no warning. The proposed legislation denies our effective opposition to such action until we have first held a national referendum. By the time this procedure has been completed the enemy expeditionary force would be so firmly established as to make its ejection most difficult, if not impossible. Under the terms of the proposed referendum the Government would be free immediately to oppose force with force only in case of direct attack on continental United States.

Greenland is America. Dutch Guiana is America. Martinique is America. Their erstwhile owners are under the domination of the Axis Powers. Any time now these totalitarian nations may demand possession. This we cannot permit. If the Atlantic is spanned, if the aggressor nations are allowed to occupy, organize, and equip advance depots within our very portals, then our days as an independent nation are indeed numbered.

DELAY MEANS DISASTER

To wait for a referendum, to turn ourselves into a debating society at a time when our very existence is threatened, I repeat, would invite disaster. It takes time to phrase the question, to present it to the voters, to allow for its discussion, to provide for the actual voting, and to count the ballots.

Time is the one essence of battle we can least afford to waste. The greatest change in modern warfare is a fuller appreciation of the time element. While England and France debated, Germany acted. While the democracies procrastinated, the Nazi conquered western Europe. If there is any worth-while lesson to be drawn from recent events, it is the vital importance of prompt and concerted action.

The advantage of that initial jump is what we, in America, must fear most. We are so powerful in men, in money, in resources and in raw and manufactured munitions that, given ample time to get under way, we would prove more than a match for any nation. Our potential enemies know that fact. They are familiar with our performance during the World War. They know that once mobilization of men and munitions start in full force, we are unbeatable.

The whole strategy of any power preparing an attack against us must be to cripple us so badly, to surprise us so fully, and to overwhelm us so completely at the outset that we would be unable to make up for our initial losses. Time for training and mobilization lost in discussion and debating would be a welcome gift to the cause of any enemy.

If such an amendment were to become a part of our Constitution, the President of the United States, who has stood out as the rock and refuge for peace in a storm-troubled world, would be reduced to a mere figurehead in international affairs. Our State Department, which time and again by diplomacy has kept wars from invading our shores, would be shorn of its influence. Our Navy, which guards us against the threats of invasion and protects our interests on the high seas, would be scuttled. Our Army, which has led us to victory in every war, would be licked without firing a shot. So far as an industrial mobilization program is concerned, it would be but a futile effort.

WOULD DIVIDE THE NATION

Moreover, it must be recognized that perhaps no ballot that was ever taken resulted in a unanimous vote. No matter how the question is phrased, no matter how great the outrages against our country may be, no matter how overwhelmingly the Nation may vote for war, there will always be a minority to disagree.

That minority would prove a boon to our enemy. The communities, the sections, and the groups that oppose the vote would be marked and defined for his benefit. Seeds of dissatisfaction already present, he would cultivate and develop. Trojan horse activities would be greatly facilitated. Instead of a united Nation, working together for one effective supreme war effort, we would break up into factions and fall prey to our enemies within as well as without our country.

A war referendum is an untried innovation in the orderly governmental processes of our country. On no other question do we ask the people to vote directly on a measure discussed, deliberated, and passed by Congress. It is the very antithesis of representative government. It is based on the simple theory that every citizen is capable of voting on every question that confronts the American people.

DEFENDS REPUBLICAN PROCESS

That theory holds good in town government. It is generally applicable to small, ancient city states. It is wholly incompatible with a large industrial nation. The average citizen has neither the special training nor the experience nor the necessary time to study all the questions that confront the executive and legislative departments. It was the genius of America to discover a system of representative government.

Our present method of declaring war is the very essence of a republican process. The President of the United States is selected by the people. To assist and advise him in foreign affairs he has a Secretary of State, an expert in international matters. Behind the Secretary of State is a permanent corps of professional career diplomats who have made international relations their life's study.

The Members of Congress are elected by the people. In each House there is a Committee on Foreign Affairs whose members, too, have made themselves specialists in international relations.

These are the experts to whom we have entrusted the guidance of our ship of state and they, in turn, never have failed us. In their hands it must remain. We must strengthen, not weaken, our capacity for immediate and concerted action. By this means, and by this alone, can we successfully deny conquest by aggressor nations in this hemisphere.

When France Awoke

HON. JAMES SECCOMBE

OF OHIO

EDITORIAL FROM OMAHA WORLD-HERALD

Mr. SECCOMBE. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Omaha World-Herald of June 14, 1940:

[From Omaha World-Herald of June 14, 1940]

WHEN FRANCE AWOKE

On November 12, 1938, the Republic of France belatedly recognized the peril of Hitlerism. It enacted the now famous decree laws which were intended to put the nation on a war footing and in a position to defend itself.

At the same time, in justification of the decree laws, there was published the general report of MM. Daladier and Reynaud, the man who was then Premier and the man who is now Premier.

In the light of later events that report has become significant to Americans. We print below a series of extracts from a reliable translation:

"It is our profound conviction," said Daladier and Reynaud, "that, fundamentally, the economic question is predominant. But we believe also that unsuccessful policies have profoundly aggravated the consequences of the continuous deterioration of economic activity. * * * Actually that part of the French population which creates wealth, which labors for the future, is continually diminishing, while that part which, directly or indirectly, lives on the state is constantly growing. * * * There is a steady fall in the number of Frenchmen who are ready to bear the risks of enterprise and creation. * * *

"That everyone should work more and that the state should spend less—for ourselves we see this as the only formula for salvation; it is elementary, but it is inescapable. * * *

"The 40-hour week * * * limits our capacity to work. * * *

"Sometimes * * * the authorities themselves have intervened to prevent the introduction of new methods designed to lower costs. In every field where activity might be reborn enterprise has been restricted and discouraged. The creative spirit and the willingness to take risks have been weakened. This—let us not fear to say it—is the root of the evil, for it adds a sort of moral abdication to the material difficulties. * * *

"The state must do its utmost to restore the doctrine of risk and profit as well as that of work and output. * * *

"The conclusion of this gloomy survey is that for several years our substance has been melting away. * * *

"Tomorrow, if we do not succeed in achieving a real increase in the production of wealth in France, we shall be unable to prevent the purchasing power of the working class—even if it be indefinitely swollen by the poisoned gift of nominal wage increases, coupled with diminished production—from being indefinitely reduced by a continuous rise of prices, which would implacably adjust the standard of living of the masses to the persistent inadequacy of the true income of the country.

"The problem then is not to choose between preserving or repealing the recent social reforms, whose generous inspiration nobody disputes. The problem is to prevent them from automatically dwindling to nothing, to prevent their benefits from evaporating in the high cost of living, to prevent employers and employed, in a country which is still poor, from having nothing to share but poverty."

With those words (and others which cannot be repeated here because of space limits) France abandoned the new deal of Leon Blum and began the long, hard trudge back toward economic and military security. Daladier and Reynaud estimated that their program would come to fruition in 3 years.

But France didn't have 3 years. Even while the statemen were writing their sobering report the republic's clock of destiny was preparing to strike.

As this is written the enemy is smashing savage blows at the gates of Paris.

No analogy can be exact.

But can any American read this story of the unintentional sabotage of the might of France without a feeling of black foreboding? Can anyone ignore the threat of that last, grim phrase, "nothing to share but poverty?"

Today we stand where France stood in November of 1938. We have had our warning, and we are unprepared. We are determined to rearm, in both a military and an economic sense. We hope and believe that we shall have more time than France had.

But as yet our leadership has not had the courage or the realism to state, as Daladier and Reynaud did, that the only formula for salvation is "that everyone should work more and that the state should spend less."

Compulsory Military Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

LETTER FROM WALT NEIBARGER, EDITOR THE TONGANOXIE (KANS.) MIRROR

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

THE TONGANOXIE MIRROR,
Tonganoxie, Kans., July 8, 1940.

W. P. LAMBERTSON,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR FRIEND: Never before has it been seriously proposed that this country adopt compulsory military service in time of peace. It will not be approved now if public opinion has time to express itself in Congress.

The country believes in preparedness, and if the Government provides planes and equipment needed, there should be no lack of men in a country with 11,000,000 unemployed.

Putting millions of manpower on paper will provide paper, not real, defense. There will be no lack of volunteers once the people understand that the Government's object is defense and not to involve this country in the wars of other continents.

Yours,

WALT NEIBARGER.

Florence Nightingale and the Nursing Profession

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS C. HENNINGS, JR.

OF MISSOURI

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

Mr. HENNINGS. Mr. Speaker, it was largely through the influence of one young Englishwoman, perhaps the most notable of her century, that the first great revolutionary change in the field of nursing took place.

Florence Nightingale was born on May 12, 1820, of good family and aristocratic surroundings. She was beautiful and well educated, but restless and discontented. From girlhood she desired to assist in relieving human suffering and misery by working in a hospital, but it was not until 1851 that she succeeded in gaining the consent of her parents to follow such a calling.

Her opportunity came with the outbreak of the Crimean War in 1854, when the subject of nursing first became a matter of general and most pressing national concern. Sidney Herbert, the Secretary of War, who was an intimate friend, knowing of Miss Nightingale's talents and ability, and the help she might afford to the sick and wounded British soldiers, appointed her to take full charge of a group of women nurses, an experiment which was unheard of prior to that time.

During her period of service she was known to spend hours on her knees dressing wounds, and at other times she was known to engage in such activities as distributing stores, directing her staff, assisting at operations, and so forth. "Before she came," one soldier wrote home, "there was cussin' and swearin', but after that it was holy as church."

Miss Nightingale undoubtedly is identified largely with her services during the Crimean War, but her greatest contribution to the service of mankind was the success she achieved by her earnest desire and work to raise the status of nursing from being a menial occupation to that of a trained calling.

The high calling of the modern nurse is well brought out by the following pledge, which is sometimes ascribed wrongly to Miss Nightingale's authorship, but which is in fact the modified Hippocratic oath:

I solemnly pledge myself before God, and in the presenee of this assembly, to pass my life in purity and to practice my profession faithfully. I will abstain from whatever is deleterious and mischievous, and will not take or knowingly administer any harmful drug. I will do all in my power to maintain and elevate the standard of my profession and will hold in confidence all personal matters committed to my keeping, and all family affairs coming to my knowledge in the practice of my calling. With loyalty will I endeavor to aid the physician in his work and devote myself to the welfare of those committed to my care.

Nurses have proven themselves to be equally as vital to our national welfare in time of peace as in time of war, and it is with that thought in mind that every year thousands of young people throughout our land consecrate themselves anew to the service of humanity.

As a result of the untiring efforts of Florence Nightingale and that great group of faithful followers, we now have throughout our land thousands of nurses on duty in hospital wards and in out-patient departments, in city health centers, and in the public and parochial schools.

We must also remember that large corps of nurses who are known as the visiting nurses, who make their rounds in all kinds of weather, in every section of our country, in aid of the needy ill. These are the nurses who care for patients who are ill in their homes and cannot, in a large number of cases, afford to pay for nursing care. Millions of visits of this kind are made during the course of a year, and the demand for this service is increasing every day. In this connection, there are two points that should especially be borne in mind, as were so ably brought out in an editorial appearing in the Washington Star of May 1, relative to the bill that I have had the privilege of introducing. First, that "no government agency ever has been or ever is likely to be devised to substitute for what, for lack of a better phrase, is called the personal element"; and second, that "in a world afflicted with regimentation, the human spirit is a value deserving of defense wherever democracy still prevails."

The hospital nursing service has become enormous in its scope. Seventy-eight fields of nursing are covered in the New York City program alone, from the fundamental branches of medical and surgical nursing, pediatrics, and obstetrics, to the specialized fields of psychiatry and communicable diseases.

The public-health nurses have also made their influence felt. In fact, neighborhood mothers in many large cities have come to know and depend on the nursing station.

In some of our larger cities these nurses supervise foster homes and day nurseries. They oversee the equipment of midwives, and seek their cooperation in urging expectant mothers to have regular examinations by a physician. Public-health nurses conduct classes for parents in prenatal health measures and in the care of the baby.

They also help the family in whose home a communicable disease has been reported in preventing the spread of contagion, suggest measures for the patient's comfort, and sometimes go so far as to make arrangements for institutional care.

So, in this time of national emergency, such as we are witnessing today, it seemed only fitting and proper that a memorial to the splendid work of Florence Nightingale and to the members of the entire nursing profession who are giving so wholeheartedly of their very selves, during the night and throughout the day, in ministering to the needs of the poor and sick and in assisting the Divine Healer of all human ills in the greatest work known to man, would be particularly significant, especially in view of the present-day conditions throughout the world. It was with this thought in mind that I was prompted and inspired to introduce House Joint Resolution 520 on April 22, 1940, to provide for the issuance of a special postage stamp in honor of Florence Nightingale and the nursing profession, and to make the aforementioned remarks, which, in a general way, show how this noble profession has been stimulated and led to greater and finer achievements by the influence exerted on it by the memory of that fine character.

The History of Our Postal System

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EUGENE J. KEOGH

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY GEORGE E. ERNENWEIN

Mr. KEOGH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address delivered over station WARD Friday, March 29, 1940, by G. E. Ernenwein:

Friends and fellow citizens, as an official of the New York State Federation of Post Office Clerks, it gives me great pleasure to say a few words regarding the Postal Service of our Nation, and thereby at least partially acquaint you with the history and growth of this institution and the prominent part played in its development by our postal employees.

Our Postal Service originated in Colonial times. A postmaster was appointed at Boston in 1639, and the first post road established in 1672, which ran between Boston and New York. A unified postal system was established in 1691 for all the Colonies, under a postmaster general appointed by the British Crown. Prior to the Revolutionary War additional post roads were inaugurated, and the system was gradually extended and improved. In 1753 Benjamin Franklin was appointed Postmaster General. In 1774 he was dismissed for insubordination. During Franklin's administration great improvements had been made. Post roads were running from Maine to Florida, and from New York to Canada, and mail was being carried to the British Isles on a monthly schedule. The post office of this day had much to do with uniting the separate Colonies and creating the national sentiment which later led to the Revolutionary War.

At the time of Washington's inauguration there were post offices in 75 towns, and the mails were carried by post riders over 1,785 miles of post roads, consisting of 1 principal route along the seaboard and a number of cross or feeder routes serving inland towns. Envelopes and stamps were not used in those days. Instead, the sheet or sheets of the letter were folded and sealed, and the address written on the back. The postage was paid in cash and varied from 6 cents a sheet for a distance of not over 30 miles to 25 cents a sheet for distances greater than 450 miles. Rates for newspapers ranged from 1 to 1½ cents, according to the distance.

The service continued to improve under our early Presidents, and by 1815 there were 3,000 post offices in operation and almost 50,000 miles of post roads in use. Newspapers and pamphlets from eastern cities were freely distributed in the West. Residents of inland and western sections were kept in touch with their friends and relatives in the East, and this was a factor second to none in the settlement and development of our Nation prior to the Civil War.

The post office in those days did not function alone in the matter of providing a communication service. It was through the Postal System that we laid the foundations of our national transportation system. First the stage coaches and, later, the railroads and steamship lines received contracts from the Post Office Department to handle the mails, which had as their real object the creation of transportation facilities essential to our commercial development. During the past decade in like manner we have witnessed the development and advancement of the airplane, along with the extension of air-mail service both at home and abroad.

Sixty years after the establishment of our Nation, Congress adopted a law providing for the printing of postage stamps, and in 1847 the first stamps were issued. Stamped envelopes were introduced 6 years later, in 1853. Registered mail was established in 1855, and railway postal cars for the distribution of letters while in transit were first used in 1862. Free delivery in cities was authorized in 1863, and the money-order system was inaugurated in 1864. Postal cards were first placed in use in 1873, and special delivery began in 1885. These added facilities not only aided in the development of our Nation but provided many advantages and greatly increased its usefulness to the general public in every community.

My remarks would not be complete were I not to mention the spectacular Pony Express. The course lay between the Mississippi River and the west coast, running from St. Joseph, Mo., the end of the railway and telegraph lines from the East, to Sacramento, Calif., which was connected by fast stagecoach and telegraph to San Francisco. The first trip was started on April 3, 1860. The time allowed was 10 days for the entire 1,966 miles. Each rider covered from 75 to 125 miles, changing horses every 10 to 20 miles. One to two minutes were allowed for changing horses. Eighty men were selected for their light weight, courage, and endurance. Later the number was increased to 125. Two of the most famous riders were Buffalo Bill and Wild Bill Hickok. Many feats of bravery were performed by these men. Several were killed by Indians or hostile bands of desperadoes while on their run, but seldom were the mails delayed long even by that. In October of 1861 a telegraph line was completed between Omaha and California, and the Pony Express was discontinued after an unforgettable career of 1 year and 5 months. Next Wednesday, April 3, 1940, a special stamp will be issued to commemorate the historic Pony Express, and already thousands of covers are awaiting first-day cancelations at St. Joseph and Sacramento.

Four outstanding additions to our postal facilities have been made within the memory of a great many of the present generation. Rural free delivery was inaugurated on an experimental basis in 1896, and by 1907 was in operation in all parts of our country. Letter carriers bring to 25,000,000 people on our farms the same house-to-house service which is granted those who reside in the larger cities.

In 1911 the Postal Savings System was founded, and the Post Office today is the depository of savings belonging to more than 2,000,000 people and amounting to more than $1,200,000,000.

In 1913 the parcel-post addition was made and this has greatly benefited those who live on farms or in outlying towns.

The last important improvement in postal facilities was the air-mail system, which had its beginning in 1918, and at present embraces routes aggregating over 35,000 miles. There is 24-hour service between the Atlantic and Pacific seaboards, and during 1936 we have extended this service to the Orient. Air mail can now be sent to China, Australia or other points in the Pacific at a nominal cost. All South American countries can also be reached in this manner, as well as points in the West Indies, Mexico, and Canada. Air-mail service to Europe and Asia was instituted during the past year via the Atlantic to further serve those who desire to communicate with those nations. There has been an enormous increase in the air-mail volume at the Brooklyn office since the inception of this trans-Atlantic service.

Today, after 200 years of development, the Postal Service is a complete, well-developed system of communication. It is reliable, convenient, and inexpensive. Its development, growth, and efficiency has been made possible principally by a vast army of loyal employees. They have contributed greatly to our successful postal system. At present there are approximately 350,000 employees engaged by the Post Office Department. About 20,000 of these are substitutes. These employees are organized into a number of organizations, among which are the National Federation of Post Office Clerks, National Association of Letter Carriers, Railway Mail Association, National Federation of Rural Carriers, National Association of Post Office and R. M. S. Laborers, and the National Federation of Motor Vehicle Employees. These organizations, most of whom are affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, obtain their objectives principally by legislation. At the present time several measures of vital importance to these employees are before Congress. These bills, if enacted into law, would prove of considerable assistance to them, as they are in most instances the paramount legislative objective of the aforementioned groups.

The measures to which I refer are known as the longevity pay bills, S. 487 and H. R. 3649, introduced by Senator JAMES M. MEAD and Representative J. HAROLD FLANNERY, respectively. If enacted, these bills would provide for a $100 increase in pay after 10 years of service, and another $100 after each additional 5 years of service until the thirtieth year. This, in our opinion, is a very reasonable and conservative way for our Government to reward the faithful, efficient service rendered by this deserving group of public servants.

The New York State Federation of Post Office Clerks are carrying on an aggressive State-wide campaign to secure favorable consideration on the longevity pay bills. We would greatly appreciate any cooperation we may receive from the general public which would assist us in securing enactment of this legislation. You can grant this cooperation by writing your local Congressman and United States Senator, requesting them to support these bills, which are known as S. 487 and H. R. 3649. Postal employees of our entire Nation will deeply appreciate any consideration you may give this matter.

In closing, I trust that what has been said here today will give you a clearer understanding of the workings of our great postal system, with its complex problems, activities, and accomplishments, and the prominent part played in this system by our postal employees. I am also sure that the time will not be far distant when the previously mentioned beneficial legislation will have been enacted into law, in this manner rewarding these employees for the loyal and efficient service rendered the citizens of our Nation.

The Story of Jesuit Missions, 1540–1940

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN J. KENNEDY

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

RADIO ADDRESS BY REV. THOMAS B. CANNON, S. J.

Mr. MARTIN J. KENNEDY. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, under leave unanimously granted me, I am happy to insert a radio address delivered by Rev. Thomas B. Cannon, S. J., on the Church of the Air program over Station WABC on June 23, 1940. I am honored to insert Father Cannon's address because of my interest in the work of the Jesuit Mission Bureau. The headquarters of this bureau are at 51 East Eighty-third Street, New York City, in my neighborhood and serves as a center of a mission band which encircles the globe and ministers to the peoples of the world. The address was a story of Jesuit missions and it is to me a source of inspiration to read of the glories of these outposts of civilization which today, as for hundreds of years, are carrying forward the banner of peace—the emblem of Christ, and we must indeed be conscious of the present need to encourage and promote the message of peace and hope throughout a strife-torn world:

Old legends and fairy tales used to tell us that at the foot of the rainbow there lies a pot of gold. The rainbow ends at the ends of the earth; and countless adventurers have sought treasure there. A hundred thousand Cortezes have overturned pagan monuments all the way from Mexico and Peru to Bangkok and the steppes of Mongolia, in search of gold; a hundred thousand Ponce de Leons have explored primeval forests in search of the fountain of youth. And most of them have been disappointed, disgusted, disillusioned; some dying hideous deaths, racked by fever, torn by hunger, bound by chains.

But today, I'd like to tell you, dear friends, whoever you are and wherever you may be, of other heroes who found at the end of the rainbow a pot of gold and a fountain of youth, in a work that most of the world has not yet begun to understand. They are the heroes of the missions.

This year we are celebrating the four hundredth anniversary of the founding of the Jesuit Order, the Society of Jesus. Comparatively few people understand that in addition to a great educational, parochial, retreat-giving, and preaching program, the past 400 years have witnessed tremendous activity in the foreign missions on the part of Jesuits. At the present day, the Society of Jesus is the largest missionary organization in the Catholic Church.

It may seem strange to pick a day like this to tell the story of these missionary heroes. All of the Old World is at war; the map of Europe is being redrawn every 3 days—sometimes twice a day. Nations are being swallowed up; ships are being sunk at sea; and yet we stop to speak of the missions. Untimely subject, many will comment. We worry whether forces are at work to draw us into the conflict; momentous questions are being argued in Congress; great industrialists are calculating their chances for profiteering in war munitions; the poor wonder about their chances of employment; and yet at a time like this, I bid you to turn your thoughts from war and the harsh terms of conquest, to a spiritual work among far distant pagan places and primitive peoples.

But somehow, I think you will welcome the change, the contrast, striking as it is, between the works of war and this work of peace. For I do not hestitate to say that the work of the missions is the most unselfish work being done in the world today. It is motivated by no political scheming. It has as its purpose nothing less than to bring the world to the feet of Christ. To bring God down to man and to lift man up to God—this is the single-minded aim of the priesthood of the Catholic Church.

And, "Of all the works of the Catholic Church," in the words of our late Holy Father, Pope Pius XI, "the greatest and the holiest is that of the missions." Greatest, because the church in its beginning, is always a mission; greatest because it reminds us of the primitive simplicity of the church as it came from the hand of Christ Himself, and as it endured in the age of the apostles; greatest, too, because the church in the missions is a direct link between savagery and civilization. You cannot study the pages of history without being convinced that all the culture and civilization which the world boasts of today is derived directly from the civilizing influence of the Catholic Church, carried from land to land by missionary heroes, countless thousands of whom laid down their lives as martyrs in giving their message to the barbarian world. And this is the holiest work of the church, because it is most fraught with suffering and self-sacrifice; and most blessed by God.

This is in a very real sense, the missionary age of the church. Never before was there such activity, such organization, such zeal to spread the Gospel, to obey that God-given command to "preach the Gospel to every creature."

Not long ago, in a Mission Sunday lecture, at the Gregorian University in Rome, Archbishop Celso Constantini, formerly Apostolic Delegate to China and now secretary of the Sacred Congregation de Propaganda Fide, declared that the church is now passing through "its missionary hour, the most interesting and noteworthy that it has experienced in the course of three centuries. Each year," he declared, "the total number of conversions now being made exceeds those made during the whole eighteenth century * * *." And our own country particularly, has only begun of late to be mission minded, to become conscious of a responsibility to share with others less fortunate the priceless treasure of the faith.

But the missionary labors of the Society of Jesus began 400 years ago.

The Society of Jesus owed its foundation to the missionary zeal of Saint Ignatius; its organization was a part of his missionary plans. When at last he turned entirely to God, as a result of the inspirational reading he had done during his forced convalescence after being wounded at Pamplona, his one idea, his only ambition, was to preach the Gospel to the heathens in the Holy Land. When that proved impossible at the time, he and his companions put themselves at the service of the Pope and made a fourth solemn vow of special obedience to the Holy See with regard to missions.

Ignatius of Loyola, nobleman and courtier in the brilliant retinue of King Ferdinand of Aragon, skilled in the tournaments which were the athletic contests of those days, had enlisted to aid his king in uniting the small kingdoms of scattered Spain. Navarre, aided by France, revolted; the crisis of this civil war was the siege of Pamplona. The duke was absent, collecting an army; and Ignatius was left in command of part of the defenses. The city was carried by combined French and Navarrese forces; and the citadel also would have been occupied had not Ignatius, alone of all the Spanish officers, stubbornly refused to surrender.

On Pentecost Tuesday of 1521 the final assault was made upon the fort. Two elder brothers of St. Francis Xavier were, strangely enough, in the front line of the charge that day, as Navarre's shock troops stormed the walls and the French artillery laid down a barrage. The walls were destroyed; and Ignatius, fighting desperately in the breach, trying to hold up the spirit of resistance by the force of his own indomitable will, was struck at last and fell. With him fell the fortress. The Spanish flag was lowered and the Spanish troops surrendered. Ignatius was well cared for by his enemies and carried home to his brother's castle of Loyola to recover. But it was a weary time of torture for him. He had several painful operations to endure, and long months of convalescence to while away. And, finally, because he could not find the books he wished, he began to read the Lives of Christ and the Saints.

Gradually his humiliating injury began to teach him from what a feeble thread his dreams of military glory swung. He lay upon his rough stretcher, his shin splintered, his dreams shattered; and he began to think. And there, tossing impatiently upon his army cot, he had the first faint glimmerings of that vision which was to break upon him in its full splendor many years later.

What was the vision that changed his life? To see it completely we would have to see all the labor that he and his men did for God's glory in the four centuries that followed. What made him leave the little fortress of Pamplona to battle upon the citadels of the world? The cannon shot left him a physical cripple; what made him the spiritual giant that he became in the army of God? What made him forget the petty civil wars of Spain?

It was the same vision that has inspired every missionary—simply the knowledge of God's goodness, of God's nearness, of His presence in us and about us; and the desire to bring others to know Him, to know the dear Christ as He was when He walked upon this earth of ours 2,000 years ago, and as He is today, in heaven and upon our altars.

Ignatius, we might say, was not a man who had visions, but one who lived them. He saw that God wanted him to put at His service his military knowledge, and found an army to do battle for His church, to come and go at the call of the vicar of Christ and carry the Word of God to the ends of the earth. He saw the army that he would enlist. He saw himself marching across Europe, across the face of the earth with an ever-growing host of men at his back. He would take the hearts of strong men and set them on fire with his own ideals; and through the centuries the world would watch them chance things dearer than life itself at his command.

The soldier has changed his plans, his methods, his hopes, his thoughts, his words, his deeds, his end, his object, the ambitions of his life—but he is still the soldier. All the quick beating of Ignatius' loyal heart, all the driving force of his unswerving will, all the eager actions of his impulsive nature, from now on will be directed, consistently and persistently to serve the King of Kings. Still the man of lofty thoughts, still the man of knightly deeds, the whole purpose of Ignatius' life has become the training of spiritual soldiers, to serve, with a soldier's unquestioning obedience, with a soldier's driving effectiveness, with a soldier's loyalty to the bitter end, in the ranks of God, to save men's souls, not to bomb their cities, to bring peace, not war.

And still the men of Loyola are marching on. All over the world, in these 400 years that are past, you will find traces of them.

Still acknowledged as the greatest missionary since the days of St. Paul, St. Francis Xavier was the first Jesuit inspired by Ignatius "to set the world on fire" with the love of God. The Society of Jesus was scarcely founded before he departed for the East, and in 10 whirlwind years became the Apostle of India, the Apostle of Japan, the Apostle of a thousand islands strung out like the beads of a broken rosary, in the Indian Ocean, and the China Sea—the apostle of half the world. And now in heaven he is the patron of the missions of the church. No knight of Arthur ever flashed more brilliantly across the pages of literature than Xavier in flesh and blood across the edges of the eastern world. All the world loves him for his spirit of eternal youth, his almost reckless adventuresomeness, his courage, his twentieth-century methods, his almost unbelievable miracles, his efficiency and his love of speed. In 1542 he landed in India. Other Jesuits followed him; and soon Goa, the dissolute city that was more beautiful than any city in Spain or Portugal, had been reformed. Missions were erected all along the coast of India; and from Goa to Malacca in the Malay Peninsula, and all through the countless islands of that coast, as far as the Moluccas, and even, they say, as far as Mindanao in the Philippines, the Word of God was preached under the direction of Xavier.

His was the task to plant the church in many different countries; and that he did personally, leaving in innumerable cities and islands the indelible memory of his inspired preaching and miracles. And when his work of foundation was done, he hurried on; but no mission that he ever founded was left unprovided for. His zeal was not blind. He sent for other missionaries to take up the work where he left off; and from his farthest and newest outpost he governed the chain of missions strung out behind him; and from India to Japan, one system was in force, one method employed, one hand at the helm. He had a peculiar genius in the founding of missions. He is the leader of the modern mission movement in the church, and even yet when missionaries are faced with difficulties, they consult the letters of Xavier, to discover what he would have done. Xavier was the father and the inspiration of all Jesuit missionaries.

Xavier died looking forward to the opening of China to the Gospel. But a Jesuit who followed him, Father Matthew Ricci, the great astronomer and mathematician, by his knowledge of science, gained an opening for the church in China and by the scientific wonders which he was able to accomplish, earned the respect of the Chinese Emperor, and became the founder of the Chinese mission. A host of other Jesuit missionaries in China, by their knowledge and learning, earned the right to preach the Word of God.

The first six bishops of Japan were Jesuit missionaries. And many Jesuits died in Japan, as martyrs, the greatest of them Blessed Charles Spinola, and the Jesuits who died as martyrs in the persecution of Hideyoshi Taikosama, the bitterest persecution known to the church since the days of Nero.

In Africa, there were Nunez and Oviedo, the first two patriarchs of Ethiopia; in Brazil, there were the Apostles Anchieta and Norbrega, who spent 40 years converting cannibal tribes; in Paraguay, the blessed martyrs Roch Gonzalez, Alonso Rodriguez, and Juan del Castillo; and anyone acquainted with the history of the church knows well their unprecedented success in the famous Jesuit Reductions of Paraguay—an experiment in democratic government which proved to be perhaps the only perfect government ever enjoyed by any people.

In Peru, Alphonsus Barsena was the pioneer missionary among the Chiquito Indians; and Colombia was blessed by St. Peter Claver's 40 years of labor as the Apostle of the Negroes—the Saint of the Slaves.

Famous Jesuit missionaries labored in our own land—Peter de Smet and Marquette and St. Isaac Jogues among the Indians; Andrew White in Maryland; Salvatierra in California. And in Lower California and Mexico, Kino became famous as the Apostle of the Plains—setting records in horseback travel that have never been equaled by the hardest-riding cowboys. The soil of Canada was sanctified by the blood of Jesuit martyrs—the giant, St. John de Brebeuf, Apostle of the Hurons; the gentle St. Gabriel Lalemant; and those other heroes, St. Charles Garnier and St. Noel Chabanel, and St. Anthony Daniel.

England too had her Jesuit martyrs—the most famous of them the Venerable Thomas Garnet and Blessed Edmund Campion. Ogilvie, one of Scotland's apostles, was martyred at Glasgow.

Few tales of adventure can compare with the story of Robert de Nobili, the Roman Jesuit of distinguished birth, who for 42 years lived the life of a Brahmin in India, isolated by the inexorable barriers of the caste system from his own friends and fellow Jesuits; or with the story of Alexander de Rhodes, first missionary to Tonking and Siam, Indo-China and Persia, who converted 6,000 souls in 3 years, and then, in quest of more missionaries for the gigantic task that he saw opening out before him in the East, walked from Indo-China to Paris, preaching in every town through which he passed, stirring up in thousands of hearts a love for the missions, and leaving behind him sparks of his own zeal that spread like fire in the forest. It was he who in Paris inspired the foundation of the Paris Foreign Mission Society to supply missionaries and bishops for the East; it is now the third largest missionary organization in the church.

Enough for the Jesuit missions of the past. It is a glorious story of missionary zeal that warms the blood to read of it. Every department of human knowledge open to these men was made to help in their work. They studied languages; learned customs of savages; explored rivers, lakes, and wild country. Bancroft, in his famous passage, says that "not a cape was turned, not a river entered but a Jesuit led the way."

Macaulay in his History of England says: "There was no region of the globe, no walk of speculative or of active life, in which Jesuits were not to be found. They wandered to countries which neither mercantile avidity nor liberal curiosity had ever impelled any stranger to explore. * * * Yet whatever might be their residence, whatever might be their employment, their spirit was the same, entire devotion to the common cause. * * * If he was wanted in Lima, the Jesuit was on the Atlantic in the next fleet. If he was wanted in Baghdad, he was toiling through the desert with the next caravan. If his ministry was needed in some country where his life was more insecure than that of a wolf, where it was a crime to harbor him * * * he went without remonstrance or hesitation to his doom * * *."

The story of the Jesuit missions of the past is a thrilling and an heroic tale, which even non-Catholic historians have been proud to relate. Yet not even the most friendly of historians could ever do it justice. God alone knows the full story of the heroic labor done in His name by these unselfish missionaries.

But the world-embracing work of the Jesuit missions did not cease with the persecutions in Japan, or the martyrdoms in England and Scotland and Canada; it is still going on. It is greater now than ever in the history of the society; there is scarcely a land known to explorers which is not being evangelized by Jesuit missionaries today. None of the heroism has been lost; comparatively few of the hardships of mission life have been rendered easy, or entirely removed; from Alaska to the South Seas, Jesuit missionaries are still following in the footsteps of Xavier.

There are now over 4,000—almost 5,000—Jesuits laboring in mission fields, out of a total membership in the society of 25,954. Two hundred million pagans are the object of these missionaries' untiring zeal. Sixty-five great missions are entrusted to their care. The greatest of these is the mission of the Philippines, in which Jesuits from the Maryland-New York Province are at work.

Throughout the length and breadth of the world, from the icy mission fields of the Far North to the scorched plains of Central Africa, from the steppes of China to the Caroline Islands, set in the bosom of the sea, these missionaries are dispensing the charity of Christ. They are managing 41 hospitals, 10 leper colonies, 107 orphanages, 133 dispensaries; 8 universities, 47 colleges, 3,678 high schools and elementary schools, open to a million and a half students of every age and creed; 14 printing presses, 49 periodicals; and 6 astronomical observatories which have done a tremendous work in saving ships from destruction. Twenty seminaries are conducted by Jesuit missionaries for the education of a native clergy, in addition to four novitiates for the native members of the society.

There are Jesuit missionaries today in Africa, Alaska, Albania, Brazil, British Honduras, the Caroline Islands, China, Ceylon, Ecuador, Egypt, Greece, British Guiana, India, Iraq, Jamaica, Japan, Java, Latvia, Madagascar, the Marianne Islands, Mexico, the Philippine Islands, Poland, Syria, Turkey, New Zealand.

Jesuits conduct 50 mission schools in Egypt alone.

In 1921, Patna Mission in India was entrusted by the Holy See to the Chicago Province of the Society of Jesus which comprises the States of Michigan, Kentucky, Indiana, Ohio, and northern Illinois. Five priests were sent to Patna Mission in 1921; today there are 1 Jesuit bishop, 46 American priests, 13 Indian priests, 16 American scholastics, 18 Indian scholastics, and 5 lay brothers. While this increase in missionaries represents magnificent growth, it is still entirely inadequate to cope with the teeming pagan population of 27,000,000 Hindus, Mohammedans, and Aboriginals.

There are Jesuit novitiates for native vocations to the society in the Philippines, China, India, Japan, Java, Madagascar, Lebanon.

The work done by Jesuit missionaries has tremendous variety. In the Philippines alone, in which there are now 271 Jesuit missionaries, and 7 more now actually on the Pacific journeying there, or about to leave in another month, Jesuits conduct 2 houses of study for Filipino Jesuit scholastics; 1 seminary for native Filipino priests; 4 colleges attached to the Ateneo de Manila, now practically a university, having 2,090 students; 1 other mission college in Mindanao; 4 high schools; the entire weather bureau of the Philippines; 4 leper colonies, including Culion, the largest in the world; 1 retreat house; and almost numberless missions, counting 43 elementary schools, besides countless catechism schools, and about 300 chapels and churches. It is interesting to note that this year, for the first time, college degrees were granted by the Mindanao college, setting a new mark in missionary history.

This month a new Jesuit high school is opening in Naga, in the Province of Camarines Sur, on the island of Luzon. Six hundred and fifty boys are already enrolled, showing the need in that section of educational work.

Many of those listening to me today, I know, have long been helping me, by their prayers and personal sacrifices, in the work which as mission procurator for the Jesuit Missions of the Philippines, and representative in the United States of our missionaries in the far islands, has fallen to my lot to do. And to them I wish to say a word in gratitude for their aid. They have part in the actual work of the missions.

Their spirit and their purpose in this work is the same as that of the missionaries themselves. All the organization and activity of the church and the missions has been for one end, one object—to make it possible for the Gospel to be preached to the ends of the earth; to save souls, to enlighten ignorance, to teach unknowing hearts to recognize their God, to recall abandoned souls from sin, to snatch the thunderbolt from the hand of God—to save souls from hell. That is the work of Christ and the work of the church, the work of the Apostles, the work of the missions today. And it is one with the work which they accomplish who lend their aid at home. For there is but one work that is important after all—one Lord, one faith, one baptism. You, my dear friends, are helping in a material way in the same work which missionaries have done throughout the ages, in all countries; you help to bring down Christ upon new altars. And it is the same Mass, the same sacrifice, whether it is offered by a forgotten missionary in a bamboo chapel beneath the palms, or by the Pope himself beneath the dome of St. Peter's, surrounded by his cardinals in gleaming red, with the silver trumpets sounding. The sacraments are the same—have been the same since the time of Christ—and you are helping to bring them to the forgotten peoples of the missions. When the missionary speaks the words of consecration over a broken altar mended by your help, you have part in the sacrifice; when he raises his hand in the gesture of forgiveness over his penitent, you have a share in imparting that absolution; when he pours the saving waters of baptism on the head of an infant or a dying old pagan, you have a share in the salvation of that soul; when he kneels beside the makeshift deathbed in a grass hut, and anoints the failing senses of some poor soul with the sacred oils, you may be sure that your names will soon be mentioned before the judgment seat of God, when the trial of that soul takes place. Only God himself can know in how many ways you have been the indirect cause of the missionary arriving in the nick of time. Only God knows, but the knowledge is safe with Him, for He will never forget. He is the cause and the end of all our work—at home and at the front—behind the lines, and in the thick of the battle for souls. He began this work. He ordered it. He commanded it. He wished it. He inspires it. He leads it. It is all for Him, the Lord, the King—Jesus Christ, who is the same yesterday, today, and forever!

Billions Without Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. STEPHEN BOLLES

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE JANESVILLE (WIS.) DAILY GAZETTE

Mr. BOLLES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks I include the following editorial from the Janesville Daily Gazette, as follows:

President Roosevelt is asking Congress for additional billions for defense, without offering a program, and at a time when there is already ample money appropriated for all defense expenditures which can be made intelligently for many months.

No one doubts that the money requested will be needed. But the problem now is not appropriations; it is coordination of defense plans, and an intelligent, nonpolitical analysis of the relationship between war expenditures and internal economy.

The American people are entitled to a clear picture of what is before them. They should be told, without further stalling, what economizing will be done domestically to ease the burden of armaments.

Nothing is more important to our security than sound national financing. The world's largest navy and "clouds of airplanes" will avail nothing to a nation hollowed out by termites within.

Emphasizing public bewilderment the New York Times declares: "Big monetary appropriations lead many people to believe that we have equally big defenses. But defense is not a matter of monetary appropriations; it is a matter of actual physical production of planes and ships and tanks and guns and the training of men. To put faith in appropriated billions as such is to mistake the shadow for the substance."

What are the facts so thoroughly hidden from the public? Who is making the plans for expenditure of billions on defense? Some things we know.

For one thing, the Navy is launching a program of approximately $2,000,000,000, a little less than one billion being for construction, replacement, alteration, and repair of naval vessels. At the same time, the Bureau of Aeronautics is allotted $161,000,000 plus contract authorizations of one hundred and twenty-five millions.

A news dispatch informs us that our Navy is already the largest in the world, while our air fleet is far below those of several leading powers in everything but long-range bombers. Airplanes can be built in a tenth the time required for battleships. On whose authority, then, are hundreds of warships started, while aviation orders lag?

Who and what are we proposing to defend? And how? The questions were asked months ago; they remain unanswered. Until they are answered, Congress has no plan to follow in appropriations and taxation. It is asked to sign blank checks and turn them over to a President who refuses or neglects to take either Congress or the people into his confidence.

A board of leading experts in all fields of national defense, working independently of the New Deal cabinet, should be appointed and given time and authority to promulgate a program before commitments beyond immediate construction possibilities are made by Congress.

Military Preparedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH E. CHURCH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

ADDRESS BY GEN. CHARLES E. DAWES

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address on preparedness delivered June 19, 1940, by Gen. Charles E. Dawes:

TEXT OF ADDRESS BY GENERAL DAWES ON PREPAREDNESS, JUNE 19, 1940

In the effort for military preparedness to which the Nation is committed, it is imperatively necessary that we be guided by the bitter lessons learned in 1917 and avoid the colossal mistakes then made.

War, including preparations for war, is the oldest collective activity of man. Certain principles of war through an evolution covering thousands of years have become fixed and must be recognized in our present national preparation for war to prevent disastrous failure.

One of these great principles Napoleon embodied in his sixty-fourth maxim of war, "Nothing is more important than a central command—under one chief." It was in complete disregard of this fundamental principle of war that our Government carried on its war preparations in 1917 so largely through boards and advisory committees.

As a result, although our Government spent in 17 months up to the armistice, billions of dollars on armament, it never got to our front line in France, with the exception of four naval guns, either field guns or ammunition. Our Army in the war fired French artillery loaded with French shells. This delay was caused by an effort of our ordnance department to standardize an American field gun so they could manufacture it in the future in astronomical figures.

NO UNITED STATES PLANES AVAILABLE

Our Government spent hundreds of millions of dollars trying to produce airplanes but was never able during the war to send a single American-made airplane to fight on the front line in France. Our Army aviators flew only foreign planes. This was because those in charge of airplane effort at home, under a committee of manufacturers, endeavored to standardize an American Liberty motor for colossal production in the future.

I hope from the bottom of my heart that it is possible for us, as we are told, to increase the present output of American airplanes to 1,000 per day by standardization, but I beg the President not to put any decisions in this matter into the hands of a committee of manufacturers, as was the case with the Liberty motor.

Of the effort made by our Government to prepare for war, Frederic L. Paxson, the eminent historian, has this to say in his book, America at War: "Every day brought the announcement of new war organizations and more committees. The managers of fresh ventures, virgin to the ways of Washington, worked each as though he were the only bearer of responsibility. The permanent employees of the Government, slowed to the easy stride of civil service, often could not understand new colleagues who did not know there was a time clock. When the new enthusiasts failed, no one had time to eliminate the wreckage. When they succeeded, batteries of desks crowded their gorged offices, overflowed into the corridors, shifted into apartment houses whose occupants were turned into the streets between dawn and bedtime, and migrated soon to mushroom buildings on vacant lots. And the members of the Advisory Commission, responsible for much, and watching it all, fed Congress with so many proposals for helpful legislation that a bewildered Congress wondered whether they or it bore the responsibility."

FATAL TO PREPAREDNESS

Committee management was fatal in 1917 to our proper military preparedness. Committee management in 1940 has been fatal to the Allies. Britain and France went to war under committee control. A cabinet is only a committee.

Each failure of the War Department to respond by shipment to a requisition for supplies from the American Expeditionary Forces registered itself immediately in a new demand on my Army procurement organization in France.

As chief of supply procurement for the American Expeditionary Force, my organization started to work in August 1917, when the Army, then only about 30,000 strong, was suffering from a dearth of essential supplies. There was not a day from that time up to the day of the armistice, November 11, 1918, when our Army had increased to over 2,000,000 men, that my organization did not face a supply emergency. But, thank God, we had a central command in General Pershing and a military coordinating system which worked because it was compulsory.

From a Europe largely stripped of supplies by 3 years of war, my organization, because of that central command and because it was not hampered by committee interference, was able in the war to procure 10,000,000 ship-tons of supplies for the American Expeditionary Force as against only 7,000,000 tons shipped to us from the United States.

NEEDS TOTALITARIAN SPEED

At this time, when our Government is preparing to be able to meet totalitarian attack, it must proceed with totalitarian speed and efficiency under a powerful central control.

Schacht, the former civilian economic dictator and coordinator of Germany, long ago was replaced by an army central command.

German civilian industrialists who have been called upon by the German Government to assist in military preparedness have been coordinated by and made responsible directly to Marshal Goering, of the German Army. By this method Germany has applied Napoleon's sixty-fourth maxim of war—"Nothing is more important than a central command under one chief." This has resulted in remarkably efficient civil cooperation in German military preparedness.

The purpose of this address is to point out the one method by which, in the preparedness work of the United States, both the Government business system and civil collaboration can proceed under guiding military principles, including Napoleon's sixty-fourth maxim of war. It must do so to succeed.

Over the business operations of the 53 departments and independent establishments of the United States Government there exists no central executive and coordinating control, such as exists in all successful private business enterprise and in all successful military enterprises, and as formerly existed in the governmental business systems of the United States.

SYSTEM COORDINATED

When I returned from France after the war, as First Director of the Budget, acting under the authority and with the strong support of President Harding, I imposed in 1921 upon the then 43 decentralized departments and independent establishments of the United States Government, by Executive order, the military central control and coordinating system created over the American Army in France by General Pershing, under which I had operated as chief of supply procurement.

This military system, adjusted to civil administration, was in operation for 11 years in the United States under a chief coordinator responsible to the President, until it was abolished by Executive order on June 10, 1933. For nearly 7 years now, since June 10, 1933, the business of the Government has been carried on without either a coordinating or an Executive control over its routine business.

A comparison of the condition of the Government's business before 1921 and before the establishment of the military executive control and coordinating system with its condition today, after the 1933 junking of the system, demonstrates the necessity of its immediate restoration.

1. The business of our Government—the largest business in the world—was in a disgraceful condition of disorganization and chaos. Thus it is today.

COMPLETELY DECENTRALIZED

2. For 132 years up to that time the departments and independent establishments of government had been completely decentralized. They are operating today also without a central coordinating control.

3. The Government then had no proper machinery such as exists in every properly organized business, public or private, for ascertaining intelligently the difference between what the departments of government want to spend and what they properly can get along on. The Government today has no such machinery.

4. No impartial appraisal of the actual necessity of a department demand was made. The appraisals were in general made by the spenders themselves. This is the case today.

5. Whatever was the public attitude of the heads of the departments and independent establishments, their pressure was always exerted along lines which tended to increase governmental expenditure—to prevent coordination—to decentralize the business of the Government—to increase independent powers—to discourage all teamwork except that designed to increase expenditures or to keep out interlopers who maintained that money could be saved for the Government by the adoption of a proper business system. This is the case today.

6. The administrative heads of the departments were selected, as a rule, with less reference to their business qualifications than to their qualifications as advisers to the President along other lines than governmental business administration. At the inception of their appointment they were introduced to a business with which they were generally unfamiliar, and were compelled to rely largely upon the advice of subordinates who were wedded to the theory of the right of independent operation of a department. As a rule they became the earnest advocates of departmental plans which their inexperience in departmental business prevented them fully comprehending in all their aspects. Being held to no effective responsibility by the President to operate their departments along a unified governmental policy, they became, in general, only a shelter and protection for the independent operation of the departments. This is the case today.

CONDITIONS SAME NOW

7. The departments and independent establishments as individual units were, in many cases, suffering from internal bureaucratic control and lack of proper internal coordination, as would be the case in any private corporation having a succession of executives selected often for political and not business considerations. Especially was this true in departments whose operations involve technical and specialized problems. This is the case today.

8. The monstrosities of the uncoordinated business system arising out of conflicting objectives, the lack of perspective, the duplication of work by the different departments, the wickedly unnecessary waste—may or may not have been seen by them; but no head of a subordinate department of government was willing to give up any portion of his personal power or his appropriations to assist in their removal. This is the case today.

9. After appropriations were made, no departments tried to save money by operating on less than their appropriations, nor was any effort made to compel them to do so. In a private corporation this would be ridiculous, if it were not tragic. Appropriations were regarded always as indicating the minimum of expenditure, not the maximum, as in private enterprise. This is the case today.

If the Government does not set up immediately an effective system of internal coordination as it enters upon an additional and gigantic effort for war preparedness, it will fail, wasting not only enormous resources but what is more important, an incalculable amount of time.

PRINCIPLES MUST BE UPHELD

No matter how great the authority of the President over the routine business system of the United States Government, he cannot properly exercise it unless he adopts immediately the system and principles imposed by necessity on all successful business enterprises—military, public, or private—and upholds them with unwavering strength and determination.

Everything may be lost unless we start military preparedness under a proper governmental business system.

In our present governmental business organization no machinery exists, even for gathering the impartial information necessary to assemble for the President of the United States, or any business leader operating under him in outside and supplemental procurement and transportation, a proper authoritative and coordinated picture of the supply requirements of the Government as a whole.

The leading businessmen directly responsible to the President and placed in sole charge of certain outside procurement efforts, no matter how eminent they be, cannot successfully operate without an authoritative and coordinated statement prepared by a governmental chief coordinator of just what is needed by the departments in these particular lines of procurement. In fact, if these outside businessmen, directly responsible to the President, are not themselves coordinated they will, as their numbers increase, inevitably reach the condition of confusion which now characterizes the decentralized governmental business organization and formerly characterized the 1917 governmental effort for preparedness.

Many eminent business leaders were called into Government service in its preparedness effort in 1917. All of them did their best, but the absence of a central and coordinating control of the effort tangled most of them in a bewildering maze of conflicting purposes and inconsistent attitudes of men and committees with equal but uncoordinated powers.

It is dangerous to substitute outside machinery in the Government's war preparedness effort which in all its major elements must be carried on by the existing governmental machinery.

I cannot overemphasize the importance of this fact. We will best prepare for war if, with a central military control and coordinating system again installed over the departments of government, we enlarge, improve, and expedite the procurement and handling processes now being carried on by the departments themselves, chiefly the Army and Navy Departments. It is always possible to improve, amplify and speed the processes of these departments by relieving inefficient officers and substituting others more capable and experienced in the work. But if it is attempted to substitute new and untried machinery, either external or internal, to carry on a given process, a Pandora's box of troubles is generally encountered of which one of the greatest and most damaging is loss of time. Time is of the essence.

There is another basic principle of war supply and war preparation which no government or army commander can disregard without disaster. Its disregard is as fatal in national preparation for war as it is in battle. It is this: In the government business organization preparing to put an army in the field or in the organization of the army itself in the field, nothing must prevent the immediate application of the greatest possible pressure directly from the point of military and emergency need upon an agent of procurement directly responsible to it.

FAILURE SPELLS DISASTER

In war preparations our peacetime organization and business methods if not adjusted to the military principle are always too late, and the failure to apply it in military preparations and in battle itself spells disaster.

Our business system of government in its present disorganized and decentralized state cannot properly distribute over the body of its business organization the emergency pressure which can be imposed only by the responsible and central command on the front line of attack either in war or preparation for it, and which alone brings the response in speed and in material which military necessity always demands from the business organization of a country preparing for war.

In our present military preparedness effort the following should be the procedure:

1. A chief coordinator should be appointed by the President of the United States to act under his authority alone. He should be a leading industrial expert and empowered to issue, with the approval of the President, coordinating orders which will have the force of Executive regulations over the routine business organization of governmental departments and establishments and their heads.

This chief coordinator, operating directly under the President, charged with the coordination of all Government war preparedness, both civil and departmental, carries out the military principle of the central command.

TIME IS OF THE ESSENCE

2. Experienced business leaders, whose cooperation in the supervision and coordination of general procurement and transportation is essential, should become Government officials and be added by the President to the staff of the Chief Coordinator. Advisory committees composed of such leaders have no place in military preparations and were proved to be disastrous in 1917. They delay decisions, wasting invaluable time, which is always of the essence in war preparations, and cause endless confusion.

3. The chief coordinator should select a corps of coordinators of knowledge and experience in the work of the various departments, who, when detailed for service under him, should be regarded as serving under the President, and should be exempt from control of any kind by the departments or establishments upon whose rolls they are carried. The Federal Coordinating Service, abolished by Executive order of June 10, 1933, should be immediately reconstituted by the Chief Coordinator. Department coordination is never a success unless it is compulsory.

4. The duties of coordinators under the authority and direction of the chief coordinator are to establish contact with and confer with every branch of the executive government for the purpose of imposing the policy of coordination and to instruct them in the use of the coordinating machinery. It is not the function of a coordinator to assume any duties for the performance of which other officials are now responsible, but it is incumbent upon him to point out where improvement in speed, efficiency, and savings may be made by coordination, cooperation, or combination, and to insist that the several officials concerned take positive steps to effect the desired result or show conclusively that it is impracticable.

CALLS FOR SOUND POLICIES

5. To inspect under the authority and direction of the chief coordinator all Government purchasing offices, to see that sound practice and business policies are carried out; to expedite emergency purchases and deliveries; to direct postponement of purchases when no emergency exists, and when it appears that the desired material may be obtained from another branch of the Government; to report improper and inefficient methods to the chief coordinator; to recommend combining of functions whenever it may appear practicable.

6. To inspect, under the authority and direction of the Chief Coordinator, Government activities and operations; manufacturing, repairing, transportation, reporting duplication, waste or inefficient use of material, equipment, or personnel to the Chief Coordinator; and to inspect activities in the sale of surplus material and to see that sound practices in governmental policies are followed.

If America is compelled to go to war, every principle I have outlined will be validated as they have been throughout the history of war.

I pray that in the future it will not be said of the United States as it will be said of Britain and France, "They were not ready for war until too late."

Wake up, Washington! National war preparedness is primarily a military as well as a business effort and will fail unless worked out under guiding military principles as well as correct business principles.

The severest penalties of war are reserved for tardiness, and the greatest single cause of tardiness in war is to start preparedness under faulty systems.

Public Works Administration

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM A. PITTENGER

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON EVENING STAR

Mr. PITTENGER. Mr. Speaker, one of the outstanding Federal agencies in connection with efforts to combat the unemployment problem of this country was the Public Works Administration. Many Members of Congress, including myself, have advocated that money be appropriated so that this agency, which officially expired June 30, 1940, could be continued. The Administration has seen fit to abandon this sort of work. P. W. A., so far as I can find out, was efficiently administered and furnished employment to many worth-while people who otherwise would have been continued on the unemployment lists. The following editorial from the Evening Star under date of July 9 is of interest and points out the fine work that was done by the Public Works Administration. The editorial says:

[From the Washington Evening Star of July 9, 1940]

PASSING OF THE P. W. A.

Unless continued by Congress or utilized in some phase of the national-defense program—alternatives for which there is admittedly only a forlorn hope—the once great Federal Emergency Administration of Public Works is destined before many months to pass finally and completely from the American scene of action.

Abandoned by the New Deal after it had performed effectively for 7 years one of the most important functions of the recovery program, the P. W. A. now is to be relegated to the scrap heap.

The handwriting appeared on the wall a year ago when the P. W. A. was snatched from the protective control of Secretary Harold L. Ickes and was merged, for eventual liquidation, in the newly created Federal Works Agency. No one realized better than Mr. Ickes that the White House had pronounced its death sentence. Prior to the transfer he had tried in vain to obtain an authorization from Congress to continue its existence, in some form or other, beyond June 30, 1941, the final date fixed by law for its expiration. President Roosevelt did nothing to encourage him.

When transferred last summer, the P. W. A. had reached the peak of its second huge construction program. It had a trained and experienced staff of 10,400 employees when the ax fell for the first time. Now its staff is fewer than 2,400. The gigantic task charged to the agency is practically complete. True to the mandate given it by Congress, all but a few of the 6,156 projects in its non-Federal program had been completed before the June 30, 1940, dead line. As the remaining projects are put into public use the process of final liquidation will be speeded up. The end is just around the corner.

The reason for the P. W. A. death sentence a year ago was not so much that it had outlived its usefulness, but rather that the New Deal had decided to abandon its costly and none-too-successful "pump priming" efforts. The death sentence was actually passed when the P. W. A. was excluded from the 1941 Relief Act and ignored in all construction plans for national defense. The Work Projects Administration, on the other hand, is destined to play an important role in defense preparedness.

There is no need to recapitulate the outstanding record of the P. W. A. over these years. It has left monuments of public usefulness in practically every county of the United States, and it is to the credit of Secretary Ickes, who was its guiding spirit for 6 of its 7 years, that the record is one of which the Nation can be justly proud.

Intervention in War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER T. BONE

OF WASHINGTON

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 10 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. BURTON K. WHEELER, OF MONTANA

Mr. BONE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an address by the senior Senator from Montana [Mr. WHEELER] before the Peace Action Committee of Missouri at the St. Louis Municipal Auditorium, St. Louis, Mo., July 2, 1940.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

All aid short of war—that is the catch phrase of the day. Behind this smoke screen lies the insidious propaganda of those who do not shrink from leading us down the road to war.

Every organ of propaganda is being employed. Full page ads appear in all the major newspapers. The voices of speakers and commentators blare forth shrilly from the radio. Scare headlines stare at us from the press. America is being bombarded by the interventionists. This is the same barrage that preceded our entry into the last war.

Let us not be deluded by false slogans. We have gone a long way beyond our traditional neutrality. We have even gone so far as to strip our own defenses to provide guns and planes for the Allies in the face of solemn warnings that we are imperiling our own security. And now—Senator PITTMAN—chairman of the Senate Foreign Relations Committee emerging from the White House, hints at pooling of our Navy with that of the Allies.

Yet these measures do not satisfy our warmongers. First they wanted us to do everything short of war. Now it is intervention; soon it will be men as well as materials. What is "short of war"?

As used by Mr. Stimson, it includes opening our ports to the warships of Great Britain. He, as a former Secretary of State, well knows this is not an act short of war—this is war. "Short of war" is like getting your shirt tail caught in the clothes wringer. You can't pull it out suddenly while the wringer keeps turning.

These "measures short of war" satisfy no one. Europe has already begun to upbraid us. Our warmongers tell us that we must take still further steps, "even if we risk war by so doing." This last phrase was used by the President of Harvard University. It does not, however, express the sentiment of the student body, those who will do the fighting. A professor at the same university was more frank. I quote: "Today, more than ever, I ask, why short of war?" This man says openly what his fellow interventionists are thinking.

The pleas of the war-aid committees, of the propagandists, of the amateur strategists, and of the frightened international bankers, all follow the same pattern. Few dare to demand a declaration of war now. First, they say, send planes. Then follows a demand for guns, ships, and munitions. Next, the American taxpayer's money. Having gone this far, they beg us to draft our young men and rush them to the blood-soaked battlefields of Europe. Once having taken the first step—these are the moves that inevitably follow to plunge us into war.

The arguments that are dinned into our ears over and over again have a familiar ring to many of us. They are the same old arguments that were used by those who led us into the last war. Indeed, by a horrible mockery, some of the same men are making the same pleas now that they made in 1917.

I call your attention to a statement made in the Senate about one of the most active propaganda agencies in the United States—the Committee to Defend America by Aiding the Allies. This is the committee that has spent thousands of dollars to place full-page advertisements in the leading newspapers of the country. It is now deluging the country with copies of a book full of such propaganda as—I quote:

"At the moment it is the first line in France and England, in vital peril, which we must support * * *. We must * * * repeal the legislative restrictions that impede such help."

A Senator said—I quote:

"Let us see the background of this committee—18 prominent bankers met secretly on the 29th day of April in New York to set up this committee."

The Senator went on to say that this secret meeting was called by the former legal adviser of the British Embassy in the last World War. Among those who attended the secret meeting were a leading member in the House of Morgan and the principal attorneys of the Morgan law firm. Apparently the same millionaires who helped drag us into the last war are back again at the same old stand with the same old slogans.

And who else do you think was there—I am reliably informed it was none other than that great liberal Republican—did I say Republican?—Wendell Willkie.

Incidentally, on May 4 of this year, Mr. Willkie used this language—I quote:

"If the totalitarian states prevail the odds are very substantial that we shall have to meet them in armed conflict * * *."

And on May 28 he added—I quote again:

"England and France constitute our first line of defense * * *."

If England and France are our first line of defense—then, of course, we should be in the war now.

I do not subscribe to the views of this man who is the new leader of the Republican Party—a belief that we must inevitably go to war with any nation. That, to me—is a defeatist attitude—the attitude of a day and age long gone. Why should any nation attack us?

War does not solve any problem—nor correct any injustice—nor build a better human race. War is not inevitable and it is shocking that a great political party now presents as its hope for America one who believes that war is inevitable.

It is significant that these men who are urging war upon us are not young men. They are not the men who will be in the trenches. There is no agitation for war among those who actually did the fighting last time—nor among those who would have to fight this time. Letters and petitions are pouring into Washington from the colleges imploring the Government to take no steps that will put us into war.

This same insistence for peace was recently expressed by the national commander of the American Legion when he told a group of Legionnaires that ex-service men not only believe "we can stay out of this war but we demand of the President and Congress that they keep us out."

A post of the Veterans of Foreign Wars recently published a pamphlet containing this statement, I quote:

"We will have war if we continue to meddle in Europe's conflict. We know this is true because it happened to us in 1917. Shall we continue to follow our old footprints down the road to war?

"The result of the last war should make us cautious. The sod on the graves of our dead is still fresh and the hospitals are still filled with our wounded. The curses of our ungrateful Allies still ring in our ears when we remind them of their loans. The unemployed are an unsolved problem of the depression caused by the war. The cost of the war is still written in red ink on the ledgers of our Treasury."

It is bad enough when, ignoring the wishes of the people, war hysteria is deliberately whipped up by men of wealth, by men with international financial interests and obligations, by men whose thinking derives from Wall Street rather than Main Street. It is unfortunate indeed that such men are willing to lend their names, prestige, and pocketbooks to campaigns inciting us to war. But it is alarming when members of this group are invited into the Government itself and are entrusted with the grave responsibilities of high Cabinet office.

Ten days ago the President sent to the Senate the nominations of two men—one to be Secretary of War and the other to be Secretary of the Navy. Henry L. Stimson, whose appointment was proposed as Secretary of War, is an eminent Wall Street lawyer of advanced years. Mr. Knox, like Mr. Stimson, is a Republican and was the unsuccessful Vice Presidential candidate in 1936. Those who listened to his speeches during that campaign or who have read his editorials in his newspapers know that he not only has denounced bitterly every single progressive policy and achievement of the present administration, but also our national administration, from the President down.

Since the outbreak of the present war both of these gentlemen, whose personal integrity and honesty are unquestioned, have been leaders of the interventionists. Indeed, Mr. Stimson has been said to have been among that group of bankers and Wall Street men who met in secret to launch the propaganda committee to aid the Allies.

The proposal to place responsibility for preserving our peace and superintending our armed forces in the hands of Messrs. Stimson and Knox cannot be reassuring to those who have watched their participation in propaganda campaigns which are conducting us along the path which leads to war. Peace-loving people cannot fail to take notice of the grave significance of these appointments at this particular time.

I cannot better state the alarm with which many view this apparent change of policy than in the words of Ernest K. Lindley, the Washington writer who has always been close to the administration and has sometimes been considered its newspaper spokesman. He said, when the appointments were announced, "It is by no means certain that their inclusion in the Cabinet will not hinder instead of strengthen national unity; Mr. Stimson is 72 years old. Although he knows the War Department, or knew it 30 years ago, he obviously is not the person to put driving force into the rearmament program or to reorganize the Army. He is not new blood. He is an old symbol. Mr. Stimson symbolizes policies which were, and still are, deeply distrusted by a great regiment of American opinion, policies which could never muster the support of more than a minority of the American people. There is scarcely another man who, because of his past record, would be more likely than Mr. Stimson to reopen old cleavages in the field of foreign policy."

What is the meaning of these appointments? Have these men been summoned from outside the administration because of their peculiar knowledge of the Army and Navy, or because they have been advocating direct intervention? Has our policy of peace been changed to a policy of war?

These appointments ought to be particularly pleasing to the warmongers. But what comfort can they give those of us who are not willing to retreat from a program of aid to the underprivileged—of jobs for the 10,000,000 jobless Americans and assistance for all those who are ill-fed, ill-clothed, and ill-housed? What is to happen to all our great plans for reconstructing happy and useful lives for these millions of people? Our thoughts are being turned toward war at a time when we ought to be thinking more than ever of making democracy work in America.

A few years ago the Senate munitions investigating committee laid bare not only the sordid, behind-the-scenes story of the last war but revealed plans already formulated for the conduct of the next one. The committee found that "the price of a war may be actual operating dictatorship" in this country.

These predictions are not remote possibilities; they are very real threats to our democracy. The St. Louis Post-Dispatch, in a public-spirited editorial, called attention to a recently issued report of the Senate Naval Affairs Committee. Prepared by a group of hard-headed realists who deal daily with the problem of building battleships and destroyers and guns, this report states that for the United States to go to war would mean a tragic sacrifice of the Nation's liberties and assets.

The committee declared that the United States is not prepared to give concrete help to any nation by intervention and that we would only jeopardize our own welfare by doing so.

This country is the last great democracy, the final outpost of liberty, Christianity, and civilization. We will remain the stronghold of free government in the world if we keep our heads and hold fast to the cardinal principle that our first allegiance is to America and to our own people.

Make no mistake about it—I am for national defense—so strong a national defense that no aggressor would think of challenging us in this hemisphere. In these days when the nation with the most guns and bombs and tanks and planes ruthlessly imposes its will on weaker states, it is the height of folly to sit idly by. But American defense should be based on military and economic protection of the Western Hemisphere—not on the quixotic idea of policing the world.

Many people believe that the defeat of the Allies would have a depressing effect on our economy. Undoubtedly the United States would be forced to readjust its foreign trade. Any wise policy of national defense must encompass defense against economic penetration.

We cannot permit Nazi militarism to follow Nazi economic domination of this or any other nation in the Western Hemisphere. Barter trading employed by Germany is a serious challenge to our Pan-American trade. It may become the economic foot in the South American door. We, as a nation, pride ourselves on our efficiency and ingenuity. Recognizing the problem, we can and will find the solution. We are the richest nation in the world—we can tighten up our belts, we can work a little harder, some of those who want to get us into war might eat a little less and still preserve democracy, and the lives of our boys.

An administration spokesman, Senator PEPPER, of Florida, presented to the Senate a seven-point program, which has an ominous warning. It proposed, in the name of saving democracy, to wipe out everything that justice, freedom, and liberty mean to Americans.

If we accept this, or proposals like it, we would find ourselves in the grip of a dictatorship as complete as any in the world. To one man would be given the absolute power to suspend any law on the statute books; to take persons under custody; to suspend debt limitations; to conscript men, women, and children into a war machine under forced labor; to wipe out labor unions; to commandeer property; and to dispose of our credits, materials, and resources.

Such proposals are repugnant to freedom-loving Americans. They are as dangerous to the principles of democracy as they are to human liberty. We have seen enough of dictatorships in the modern world to look on the creation of a dictatorship in our own country, even in wartime, with abhorrence.

What assurance can be given that power once handed over for the duration of a war, will be returned unabused when the emergency is over? War, as we have seen, creates dictators, it never deposes them. We must ask ourselves, Is this war our war?

Who is better qualified to answer than our American Ambassador to Great Britain, the Honorable Joseph P. Kennedy. He has said—I quote:

"There is no place in this fight for us. It's going to be bad enough as it is. As you love America, don't let anything that comes out of any country in the world make you believe you can make a situation one whit better by getting into war. * * * There is no reason—economic, financial, or social—to justify the United States entering the war."

If Ambassador Kennedy's words are not authoritative enough, let us look at the words of our President himself. At Chautauqua on August 14, 1936, Mr. Roosevelt stated:

"If war should break out again in another continent let us not blink the fact that we would find in this country thousands of Americans who, seeking immediate riches—fools' gold—would attempt to break down or evade our neutrality."

If this was true in 1936 it certainly is true today. Those who attempt to break down or evade our neutrality may be doing it for love of democracy, but I agree with the President that they are seeking fools' gold instead. In 1936 the President said:

"The effective maintenance of American neutrality depends today, as in the past, on the wisdom and determination of whoever at the moment occupy the offices of President and Secretary of State.

"Industrial and agricultural production for a war market may give immense fortunes to a few men," the President added, "but for the Nation as a whole it produces disaster. It was the prospect of war profits that made our farmers in the West plow up prairie land that should never have been plowed, but should have been left for grazing cattle. Today we are reaping the harvest of those war profits in the dust storms which have devastated those war-plowed areas. It was the prospect of war profits that caused the extension of monopoly and unjustified expansion of industry and a price level so high that the normal relationship between debtor and creditor was destroyed."

The President has said these things well. Let us not now depart from his injunction.

The time has come to call a halt. The people of this country either want war or they do not want war. There is no sentiment in this country in favor of the United States entering this war. Therefore, I say, let not those in positions of authority—whether public or private—justify warlike acts and statements by the hollow and meaningless cry "short of war." Let us be done with these "Yes" and "No" gentleman who say "No" to war but "Yes" to provocative acts which lead to war. Bellicose statement after bellicose statement—belligerent step after belligerent step—these lead down the rungs of the ladder into the awful abyss of war as certainly as night follows day.

The greatest defense against nazi-ism is a working democracy. (Just as a nation, so a world cannot remain half free and half slave.) Europe will rise to throw off the shackles of nazi-ism if we preserve ourselves as the living example of civilization and humanity. An inspiration in the mind of man is worth a million troops. Let us make this hemisphere economically sound and immune to insidious economic penetration and we need not fear any eventuality.

After Europe has settled its bloody quarrels, and we have put our defenses in order, the world will look to and need the contribution which we can make toward the job of reconstruction. In the meanwhile, if we must make war, let us not make war on men, but let us make war on poverty.

Plain Economics

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 10 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

ARTICLE BY JOHN T. FLYNN

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the RECORD an article written by John T. Flynn, entitled "Plain Economics." The article deals with the matter of the slowness of naval expansion, and refers to the bill introduced in 1937 by the Senator from Washington [Mr. BONE] for the immediate expansion of Government arsenals, and so forth.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

PLAIN ECONOMICS

(By John T. Flynn)

NEW YORK, July 10.—The day does not pass that someone in Washington does not blame someone else for America's being defenseless. In fact, almost every day some Democratic statesman rises to damn the Republicans for opposing the President's armament plans.

And now former Navy Secretary Edison uncorks a blast that Congress was responsible for the slowness of naval expansion and the lack of proper facilities to that end.

Now, as a matter of fact, there is a little history here worth repeating. In 1931–32 the Hoover administration appropriated $707,500,000 for national defense and in 1932–33 provided $667,000,000. But this seemed a tremendous menace to the Democrats.

In the platform of 1932, on which the President was elected, appeared a plank declaring for national defense but only on a careful survey of all the facts in order "that the people in time of peace may not be burdened with an expenditure fast approaching $1,000,000,000 a year."

In other words, the expenditures of President Hoover, which never got beyond $707,000,000 in a year, seemed a menace to the Democrats and they pledged themselves to protect the people from the growing burden.

Now of course a candidate runs on his party's platform without approving everything in it. But in this case Mr. Roosevelt, running for President, read this plank with approval—singled it out—in several of his national addresses during the campaign. I am informed by men who were then on the inside that he wrote that plank and had it put into the platform.

To make good on that pledge, one of his first acts was to cut defense appropriations to $479,000,000 in 1933–34 and $533,000,000 in 1935. Thus, 2 years after Hitler came into power the President himself, whom many consider a militarist, was holding defense expenditures below the Hoover level. Now, the Democrats, who denounced the Republicans for spending too much on national defense, are denouncing them for not spending enough.

This is recalled, of course, not in support of either the Democratic or Republican position, but merely to emphasize the amount of purely political twaddle that makes its way into this talk.

Now as to Mr. Edison. Back in 1937 Senator BONE—who has bitterly opposed the administration's policy of foreign meddling, but has believed in the defense of this country—introduced a bill for the immediate expansion of Government arsenals and for the creation of a huge stock of jigs, dies, tools, and machine fixtures sufficient to tool up private plants in case of emergency. He recognized then that the machine-tool industry—at that time idle—was a bottleneck.

This bill went to the Army and Navy, where it was turned down. Private industry, they said, could take care of the situation if an emergency arose. Now it appears neither private nor Government facilities are adequate to arming this country in less than several years.

The Annenberg Case

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 10 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

ARTICLE BY WESTBROOK PEGLER

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an article on the Annenberg case by Mr. Westbrook Pegler, appearing in his column Fair Enough, published in the Washington Post of today.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Washington Post of July 10, 1940]

FAIR ENOUGH—THE ANNENBERG CASE

(By Westbrook Pegler)

It will be hard to find anywhere in the underworld of the United States a more vicious and dangerous example of ingratitude to the generous Nation which opened her arms to the oppressed peoples of the Old World than Moses L. Annenberg, who has just been sentenced to 3 years in a Federal prison for failure to pay the income tax on the greatest individual easy income in the country.

Annenberg came to America from East Prussia as a little boy, the son of an immigrant refugee from the persecution and limitation of opportunity which drove millions to the United States. His father became a peddler and junk dealer, and Moe himself, as a boy, sold papers on the corners of the turbulent, uncouth prairie capital, Chicago. He had a talent, carelessly described as genius, for organizing business and became rich in more or less legitimate activities in the circulation and publishing departments of the newspaper industry.

But his character was low, cunning, and criminal, and, not satisfied with the wealth that poured in from his newspaper activities, he organized a monopoly over the dissemination of horse-race results in league with the underworld of crime and politics. This monopoly fed race results to a vast illegal system of gambling joints in more than 200 cities of the United States and Canada, and these joints corrupted government and the courts, worst of all in that Chicago where he had first sampled freedom of opportunity which he never would have enjoyed in Germany.

Moe Annenberg's greed for money and his cynical ingratitude to the United States were such that he was willing to corrupt the form of government which gave him his chance to become a rich and powerful man. He was so greedy and ungrateful that, having participated in that corruption of the system which endowed him with unaccustomed rights and human dignity, having undermined the stability of that system, he even stole, by withholding them, the taxes which he knew he should have paid into the National Treasury for the support of that system and its defense against foreign enemies, including the very nation which now has reduced his people to subhuman status. It has been argued in his defense that he did not know he was withholding his taxes. His affairs were so large and the interrelations of his companies were so entangled that his business outgrew his bookkeeping.

That, however, is only his squeal. He was shrewd enough to form those corporations, and to outwit the underworld in building his monopoly, and the very character of this dirty business of his was such as to prove that he had no feeling of respect or gratitude for the form of government which had suffered day by day and year after year from his activities. Not merely from the added burden of taxes which was placed on other Americans but from the very real and perceptible impairment of the democratic system, all Americans suffered from the greedy rascality of this ruthless master ingrate.

His worst offense was one that cannot be charged in an indictment under the American laws. It is a moral offense. His worst offense was the damage to public confidence in the city government and faith in the courts and in the efficiency of democratic government which was wrought by the operation of his evil business.

Of the thousands of clients who subscribed to the race news purveyed by his racket only a negligible few legitimate news publications were legal. Generally speaking, his news service existed for and by corruption. Most of his clients were bookmakers or poolrooms operating in violation of the law and by the connivance of corrupt mayors, judges, prosecutors, city councilors and State legislators.

In Chicago, where he first practiced the freedom of opportunity which America gave an oppressed immigrant, Moe's influence was most destructive, for in Chicago the outlaw gamblers came to have an influential if not dominant voice in the city government. And in proportion to the rise of their influence so the faith of the people in popular government declined.

No bigot ranting from pulpit or soapbox—not Fritz Kuhn himself, of the anti-American bund—has been a worse enemy to the dignity and well-being of the Jews in the United States than Moe Annenberg. He could have been a conspicuous example of decency and gratitude to America, but it just wasn't in him.

Quo Vadis?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GERALD P. NYE

OF NORTH DAKOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 10 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Mr. NYE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial entitled "Quo Vadis?" published in the July 13, 1940, issue of the Saturday Evening Post.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Saturday Evening Post of July 13, 1940]

QUO VADIS?

This is written on June 10. With no notice to the American people or to the Congress that is supposed to interpret their will, this country entered the war 4 days ago. Stranger than the fact was the passive acceptance of it.

While the Senate was debating, with intent to kill it, a resolution that would have conferred upon the President of the United States certain extraordinary powers, the President seized those powers and involved this country in the European conflict by an act of physical intervention.

This he did by sanction of his own will. The Congress did not know what he was going to do and debated it after the fact. The people, whose war it will be, first read it in newspaper headlines.

What we now write is to complete the record. We have no idea what the next consequences will be or what will have happened by the time these words appear. But as in time to come it may be bitterly remembered, so now be it said that in the one hundred and fifty-first year of its existence the house of constitutional republican government was betrayed, even as the builders feared. Unawares to the people, the exalted Executive principle could involve them in war. We dare to look at the truth and to ask why the house of our fathers had to be half surrendered before it was attacked. We do not here touch the question of whether or not we should go to the side of the Allies. What we are saying is that if the American people may be involved in a world war unawares and without a specific act of Congress, then much else has happened to them of which also they are unaware.

We do not believe the people had ever thought of going again to the battlefields of Europe. They had been misled to think this country somehow could put forth its economic strength and not itself become involved. That is what they were thinking when they were polled on whether we should be giving more aid to the Allies. The idea that we could help to destroy the aggressor in Europe and not get hurt was a propagated phantasy and produced on many minds the hypnotic effect that may or may not have been intended.

To accomplish his purpose, it was necessary for the President to outwit the law. First was a statute, enacted in time of peace, permitting the Military Establishment to sell to any foreign government with whom we were at peace on a certain date surplus munitions and war materials for which there was no other market, and to exchange motor vehicles, airplanes, engines, and parts for new and similar equipment. When that statute was written, nobody could have dreamed that it would ever be used by the President as a pretext for opening this country's arsenals to either side in another World War.

Secondly, it was necessary to beat the prohibitions of international law and especially article VI of the Hague Convention of 1907, to which this country put its name, which is still in force, and which reads: "The supply in any manner, directly or indirectly, by a neutral power to a belligerent power, of warships, ammunition, or war material of any kind whatever is forbidden."

Observe here the very strict distinction. The private citizen of a neutral country may sell arms and war material to a belligerent power; that is permitted. American industry, acting privately, could sell airplanes and guns to the Allies. But for a government to do it is an act of intervention. The government that does it is no longer neutral. It has taken part. It is in fact at war.

The President of the United States could not himself, of his own will, declare war. Only the Congress has the constitutional power to declare war. But he hit upon a device for getting the country into the conflict without declaring war.

As Commander in Chief of the armed forces of the United States, he declared the Navy to have a surplus of airplanes at a moment when there was a panic of anxiety over the shocking inadequacy of the country's air defenses. As Commander in Chief, he ordered the Navy to deliver this alleged surplus of planes back to the factory they came from in exchange for new planes yet to be made—and this under a previous stipulation with the airplane factory that as fast as it received the planes from the Navy it would hand them over to the Allies.

We had no surplus of airplanes; so far otherwise, we very urgently want more than we are yet able to make for ourselves. Nor were these obsolete planes, for if they were, of what use could they be to the Allies in battle? Thirdly, then, the make-believe that in the end it became simply a transaction between the private American airplane industry and the Allies, because the Navy, on delivering the planes to the factory, quit title to them, was only clever, and far beneath the dignity of a great people.

The next day it was guns. As Commander in Chief, the President would declare obsolete or surplus a lot of United States Army guns, including thousands of the 75 mm.'s the French were greatly in need of, sell them to American gun makers, who would sell them at once to the Allies, undertaking to replace them later in the American armory out of new manufacture.

That day, as reported in the New York Times, "In his press-conference discussion of national-defense plans President Roosevelt refused the role of prophet when asked how far this Government was prepared to go in supplying the Allied Powers with guns, ammunition, and aircraft." And how about bombs to go with the bombing planes? That question was asked because only the Government itself manufactures the bombs. Therefore there could be no subterfuge of turning back bombs to private manufacturers in exchange for new and better bombs later. The reporters could not quote the President directly at this point. The New York Times reporter wrote: "It was remarked, however, that the law does not require surplus munitions to be returned to the factory whence they came, but merely specifies that they may be exchanged for other munitions." Which means, if it means anything, that the President was thinking the Government could manufacture bombs to go with the airplanes, sell them to somebody who would sell them to the Allies, and itself take anything in exchange.

Then what of warships? What of turning warships back to the shipyards that made them on an undertaking by the shipbuilders to sell them to the Allies and make new ones for the United States Navy? The reporters asked the President that question. The New York Times reporter wrote: "He explained that he had been unable to get to that question, so far."

How far on this line would the Government go? Only the President could say, and he declined to be prophet.

What else might the Government do? If the people would know that, let them read the cryptic words of newspaper reporters writing under the censorship imposed upon the White House press conference.

What a text is there. Government by Executive inspiration. War by Executive impulse.

We shall survive the war. But how? As a government of the people, by the people, for the people? Or as a state that has embraced in the New World what it had wished to destroy in the old?

For it is war. Since the first week of June this country has been in fact at war with Germany. Take it in simple fact. Suppose we were at war and a government that had been neutral in form, but not in feeling, suddenly opened its arsenals to our enemy, exactly as we have opened ours to the Allies.

Would we regard it as an act of war? We would. What would we do about it? We would declare war on that government, and if for strategic reasons not actually at once, then certainly in our hearts and minds, for a future settlement.

If it should turn out that to strip this country of armaments and send them to Europe at a moment in history when our existing power of national defense was pitifully inadequate and the crisis in Europe was such that no one could say how many hours remained of the British Empire, or that the aggressor might not win, capture the Allied fleet and dictate a peace before enough American aid to turn the battle against him could possibly arrive—if it should turn out that this had been a tragic blunder, beyond recall, then the leader who had done it might wish that his page in the book of fame would refuse to receive ink, for it would be written of him there that in his passionate zeal to save civilization in Europe he had forgotten his own country.

Idaho—the Rocky Road to Statehood

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN THOMAS

OF IDAHO

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 10 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

ARTICLE FROM FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY BOOKLET PUBLISHED AS PART OF GOLDEN JUBILEE OBSERVANCE

Mr. THOMAS of Idaho. Mr. President, on July 3 this year, 1940, my State, the grand State of Idaho, celebrated its fiftieth anniversary of statehood, following a half century of steady growth and progress of which the people of Idaho are justly proud.

In view of this important commemoration of a proud and historic occasion, Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the Appendix of the RECORD a brief historical sketch of Idaho during the years between 1860, when gold was discovered, and 1890, when President Harrison signed the admission bill. This sketch is taken from a fiftieth anniversary booklet recently published in Idaho as a part of the golden jubilee observance.

There being no objection, the sketch was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

THE ROCKY ROAD TO STATEHOOD

On July 3, 1890, word flashed across the country that Idaho had been admitted to the Union. President Harrison had affixed his signature to the admission bill. Idaho belonged to that great family of commonwealths which are united to constitute the world's most progressive and enlightened Nation.

There was mighty and thankful rejoicing in that year of 1890. A dream of many years was being realized. A new star was being added to the Stars and Stripes.

There is rejoicing again in this year of 1940—the golden jubilee year. Fifty years of glorious statehood! Half a century of progress and advancement! All sections of the State have ample cause to celebrate.

The much-desired goal of statehood was not easily won. The path traveled by the Territory was long and rocky. Worth and merit had to be fully established before admission could be had to the sovereign family of States.

Idaho's march toward an importance which was ultimately to demand the attention of the Statehood Committee began in the year 1860, or 30 long years before the dream of statehood was realized.

In that momentous year Capt. E. D. Pierce, a stout-willed man with the courage to brave wilderness dangers, led a group of hardy gold-seekers into the Nez Perce Indian country along the Clearwater River and founded an industry that was to lead the way in Idaho's march to statehood.

For some years prior to 1860 rumors of gold had been drifting out of the Clearwater region. Trappers and fur traders reported gold in the hands of the Indians, used for bead work and ornaments. Members of Capt. John Mullan's road-building crew started whispers moving, causing the brave captain much anxiety lest they desert him.

Gold, gold, gold! In carefully guarded tones men passed the information on. The Indians frowned, but there was no halting the whispers. Gold in Idaho; gold in the Clearwater; gold on the Salmon; gold!

The Nez Perce met the white men at the border of their country and turned them back. They kept the region free of gold-seekers until 1860, when Pierce's party arrived. They met Pierce and turned him back, too, threatening him and his men.

Pierce turned back, down the Clearwater, but he did not give up. From a friendly group of Indians camped at the water's edge, he learned that there was a secret route by which he could avoid the Nez Perce and reach the country he wished to visit.

A romantic and appealing story is told of how, after all the braves of the friendly group had refused to act as guide because of fear of tribal reprisals, a young woman who knew the country well volunteered to lead Pierce's party by the secret route. Her offer was accepted, and she comes down to us in history under the name of Jane Silcott.

Eluding the Indians, Pierce's party gained the Clearwater country and wintered at Canal Gulch, where traces of yellow metal were found. The following spring the gravel bars of that section began their astonishing yield of the golden harvest which was to make the Idaho Territory known over the world as the new bonanza of the West.

Pierce's discovery might well be said to constitute the first step of the fledgling territory toward statehood. Golden Jubilee is indeed an appropriate name for our 1940 celebration.

As frequently happens in gold stampedes, important events fairly tumbled over each other in the lusty hectic era following Pierce's discovery.

Lewiston sprang into being at the junction of the Snake and Clearwater, and by the summer of 1861 had a 3,000 population, mostly miners, teamsters, soldiers, tinhorn gamblers, and the camp followers who flock to every gold find. Five hundred gold-mad men were in the Pierce camp.

From all points of the compass the rush to Idaho started. Gold was there and men would have it.

Having tasted success at Canal Gulch, the prospectors swept aside the objections of the Indians and launched a hundred different searching parties into the surrounding wilderness. Gold had been found and they were confident that more could be found. Nothing could keep them from searching, not even the warnings of Army officers who feared Indian uprisings.

In quick succession came the cries of additional discoveries. Overnight magical new names arose from the wilderness—Orofino, Elk City, Baboon Gulch, Florence, Warren, Idaho City, Placerville, Pioneerville, Oro Grande, and others. And those who were determined to be first on the new diggings charged like mad from place to place through the rugged mountains.

Thus it was that within the space of a few roaring, lusty years the Idaho Territory developed from an unknown wilderness to the scene of a thriving industry which brought the area into a rank of first importance among the Nation's gold-producing districts. A sturdy, bold people, the type needed to conquer a harsh, wild land, had been attracted to the region.

Idaho's gold was doubly important to the Nation because of the opportune time at which it became available. When Pierce made his discovery, the country was tight locked in a deadly rending Civil War.

Gold pouring into the mints of any young, growing country is always welcome, but doubly so if it happens that the treasury of that nation is depleted by the necessities of an army in the field of combat.

The theory had been advanced by more than one historian that the gold from Idaho during the Civil War was an important factor in turning the tide of battle in favor of the Union. If so, certainly Idaho's statehood was richly deserved.

But the roaring decade of the sixties was one in which the residents of the Territory thought about little besides gold. Money in the form of yellow dust flowed freely. There was no law except that which the miners made for themselves, no judgments save those of the rough-and-ready miners' courts. A ready gun was the first and frequently the last authority. Possession was 10 points of law. Life as a whole was of such intensity that the citizens had little time to worry about such things as recognition and statehood.

The Civil War ended. The period of reconstruction in the South began. One year rolled by on the heels of another. Then the miners awoke one day to the realization that the supply of gold which only a short time before had seemed inexhaustible was steadily diminishing. Camps were being worked out and abandoned. Lusty, roaring villages became deserted clusters of silent, empty buildings. The noisy, boisterous placer miners, who needed to see the color of gold in each day's work, took themselves away, rushing on in the endless search for new El Doradoes.

The doldrums of the Idaho gold boom had arrived. As is inevitable with all gold booms, it had collapsed. Word went around through the camps and to the world that Idaho was worked out; that the gravel bars had been harvested of their golden treasures and nothing was left.

Worked out. For them, yes. The sun was setting on the hectic, unstable day of the gold pan and rocker. Electric power, dredges, deep shafts, and treatment of complex ores were in the future. The day of lode mining as a long-life stable industry had not yet dawned.

The gold hunters began to depart. The streams of people that had been coming into the Territory dwindled to mere trickles. Streams and gulches that had been teeming with activity became deserted save for the vanguard of Chinese and prospectors who still pottered around, clinging to hope deep-rooted by the fabulous finds of the past.

Business suffered seriously during this period, the decade of the seventies. Farmers, attracted to the fertile valleys by the demand for fresh vegetables, found their markets, yesterday so clamoring and insistent, disappearing. Merchandise was soon rusting on merchants' shelves. Teamsters and packers found their services no longer required. For a period, during these quiet years, the Idaho Territory seemed likely to slip back into the state of uninhabited wilderness that had maintained prior to Pierce's discovery.

During these years the importance of Idaho as a State diminished. The stream of precious metal no longer poured from her gravel bars and hillsides. The crisis of the Civil War was over and the problems of reconstruction crowded the fate of the distant western Territory out of the Washington scene. The popular theory was that all that was left in Idaho was bears, Indians, and abandoned gold camps—and Congress had no use for any of them. No one except the farmers and merchants and sawmill operators left stranded by the receding wave of placer miners was interested in what became of the Territory.

Thus we find that for a few years around 1880, after placer mining had practically ceased and before ore mining had gained stability, the Idaho Territory was on the verge of lapsing into its original state of wilderness.

But fate had other things in store for the Gem State. In 1882 a militant free-thinker by the name of A. J. Prichard made new gold discoveries on what is now Prichard Creek, a tributary of the north fork of the Coeur d'Alene River.

Prichard hit upon the idea of using his new-found wealth to establish a colony of friends who had similar ideas with regard to religion. He therefore wrote letters describing his find and inviting other free-thinkers to the Territory to share in his discovery.

"I would like," he wrote, "to see as much of this go into the hands of liberals as possible, and also to see them build a city where they can have their own laws and enough of this vast mining region to support it, which they can do if they will go at it cool and work together."

But regardless of religious beliefs men are all much alike underneath, and knowledge of a new gold discovery does not long remain secret. Soon the miners of the northwest and Canada heard of the Prichard Creek find and the rush began. Once more Idaho began to assume her rightful place of importance in the eyes of the Nation.

When the miners learned that most of the valuable claims at the new diggings were in the hands of the liberals, who were mostly wheat farmers from the East and Middle West, they revolted against Pritchard's scheme of colonizing the area and wholesale claim-jumping began. Pitched battles between the miners and the free-thinkers served to further accentuate the need for duly-constituted authority. Congress began to take notice again. Law and order were necessary if the region was to produce its fullness of wealth, and gold was the one thing that could make an impression upon the harassed lawmakers in Washington.

Although considerable gold was taken from the Coeur d'Alene region in the eighties, the real importance of Pritchard's discovery was not the yellow flakes in the gravel bars, but rather the general impetus to mining which, within the decade, was to result in the finding of lead, zinc, and silver ores.

Discovery of these lode deposits marked the beginning of great underground enterprises which have yielded up hundreds of millions of dollars to be poured into the channels of Idaho industry and commerce. It proved the foundation for a mining industry which has been of tremendous economic importance to the State for 60 years.

The famous Bunker Hill & Sullivan mine was discovered in 1885. The gross value of its ores during the succeeding 55 years has been some two hundred million dollars. Its operations are one of the foremost industrial assets of the State.

Credit for the Bunker Hill discovery is given, in a romantic and novel story, to a truant Spanish burro, afterward known as Kellogg's Jack, and to this day looked upon as a sort of a patron saint of the Coeur d'Alene mining industry.

The importance of the Bunker Hill was obvious at a glance. Men began to look less for gold and more for the dark galena ores. Other finds were made, in other places. Silver City grew into a mining camp of importance. Veins of high-grade galena were located in the Wood River district near the towns of Ketchum and Bellevue.

Now that men knew what they were looking for, discoveries came thick and fast, not of gold but of rugged galena outcroppings—hard, dark quartz in which the lead silver minerals glistened. It was obvious then that Idaho was to be the scene of a great mining industry and men began to build for permanence. In this rock there was the wealth that would provide pay rolls, that would build homes and communities and cities, that would pay taxes and stimulate trade and commerce.

Mines started making names for themselves. In addition to the Bunker Hill & Sullivan, there were the Tiger, the Poorman, the Hercules, the Frisco, the Morning, the Minnie Moore, the Hecla. These mines and others were to continue as steady producers for decades to come, and the income from them was put to work developing the district.

Once more feeling the glow of prosperity, the residents of the Territory began to yearn for the respectability of statehood and a strong insistence for recognition developed. They believed that Idaho merited full membership in the Union.

Back in 1890 any district producing ten to fifteen million dollars annually in valuable metals could demand respect and attention. Congress began to listen. Idaho asked for statehood, and she backed her request with a showing of industrial responsibility that could not be disputed. Her great mines hummed with activity; her agricultural and lumbering industries were prospering; her people were alert and vigorous. The future was bright. Idaho was ready for the duties and responsibilities of a State.

At last the Congress agreed. The bill was signed. Thus it was on July 3, 1890, that the end of the rocky Territorial road was reached and Idaho, fortified by 30 years of mining importance, was admitted to the Union, a free and sovereign State.

Third Term for President Roosevelt

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH F. GUFFEY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 10 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

AN OPEN LETTER TO PRESIDENT ROOSEVELT FROM THE PHILADELPHIA RECORD

Mr. GUFFEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an open letter addressed to the President of the United States by the Philadelphia Record under the heading, "You are drafted, Mr. President."

There being no objection, the letter was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AN OPEN LETTER

YOU ARE DRAFTED, MR. PRESIDENT

Hon. FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT,
President of the United States.

DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: You are drafted for defense.

You must obey the call of your country, just as must millions of your fellow citizens, who stand ready to give whatever service they are best fitted to perform.

You are best fitted to be Chief Executive in this emergency. By your great ability, your high courage, and fine humanity you have won the confidence and love of the overwhelming majority of us who are eager to help you protect this country in the present crisis.

But above and beyond your outstanding qualification for the Presidency are two special and immediate reasons why your retirement at this time would be dangerous not only to the safety of the Nation but to civilization throughout the world.

Strengthening defense is the most pressing task which faces this Nation. A change of administration is bound to slow up this program.

If you accept the nomination at the Democratic convention, your reelection will be assured, as will the uninterrupted continuance of the defense projects which you have initiated. The American people are too wise to change horses in the middle of a stream.

On the other hand, if you should refuse to accept the nomination, the candidate who had your endorsement would probably be elected. But there would be enough doubt as to the outcome to slow up all planning for the future, not only in Congress but also in the War and Navy Departments, where your Secretaries must assume the responsibility of many vital and momentous decisions.

If you were not as well qualified as you are, still it would be the most obvious wisdom that you should continue in office so that this country could concentrate on defense rather than on politics during the next 5 months

Your nomination, and your nomination alone, would give the people as well as your executives the assurance to carry on without fear of change in policy and personnel

Of course, the Republicans will put on a spirited opposition campaign, as they should But with you as a candidate the political temperature of the Nation will be normal no matter how much ballyhoo the utility lobby generates Important as are the practical advantages of an uninterrupted Federal administration, there is a still more compelling reason for your candidacy.

Ideals of human dignity and decency which have been developed through the ages are now threatened. Perhaps because we have not lived up to those ideals, the world is engulfed by a scourge the like of which has not visited it since Genghis Khan laid waste half of Europe.

You have become world's champion of civilization.

The civilized world looks to you for spiritual leadership. To retire now would be to chill the hearts of liberty-loving people in every corner of the globe. It would be to play right into the hands of the powers of darkness which afflict mankind today. No matter who took your place it would be a let-down which might prove disastrous.

We believe Republican candidate Wendell L. Willkie to be a sincere and patriotic citizen. We believe he thinks he is telling the truth when he says he is under no obligations.

But, we also know that no one can take high office without having his policies pulled and hauled by his supporters. The men who gave money and were personally active in Willkie's pre-convention campaign, the same men who will lavish money on his coming campaign, are bitter foes of the principles and purposes of the New Deal.

Judging by its platform and keynote speeches, the Republican Party is swallowing the whole New Deal program hook, line, and sinker. Ostensibly candidate Willkie will carry on where you left off, only adding a little Republican efficiency in administration of collective bargaining, wage and hour regulations, work relief, etc.

But, even if Willkie is sincere, can we expect him to withstand pressure of the friends who put him into office—men who have expressed vindictive hatred of you and all for which you stand?

No camouflage in Willkie's support. Wall Street, which heretofore played politics by proxy, comes out in the open for direct action. Through Willkie, Wall Street wants to control the Federal Government.

This financial element places profit before principle. The same elements in Great Britain preached appeasement and in France accepted the totalitarian yoke.

Much as we respect Wendell Willkie, the interests which are backing him, and which ultimately will dominate him, give lip service to democracy while they secretly yearn for return to the plutocracy which controlled the United States before you took office. This plutocracy would undo all you have accomplished for the forgotten man.

More than 8 years ago the Record called for your nomination by the Democratic Party. Since then we have given you loyal, though sometimes critical, support. Therefore we believe the Record has earned the right to call itself your friend.

As a friend, we are loath to demand from you this further sacrifice. You have earned a rest. We cannot blame you for desiring return to private life. Eight long years of complex problems and mounting crises has weighed heavily upon you.

Yet there are times in the lives of both men and nations when personal preference, even individual right, should give way to national need.

If the United States of America needed you 8 years ago—it needs you even more today.

We need your experience and your wisdom. We need your sanity and your courage. We need the leadership which you alone can give us.

That the American people want you for a third term is demonstrated by every index of public opinion. No American since Abraham Lincoln has so won the hearts of his countrymen.

Mr. President, the Nation waits your word.

PHILADELPHIA RECORD.

Why I Am An American

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ELBERT D. THOMAS

OF UTAH

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 10 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

ADDRESS BY J. REUBEN CLARK, JR.

Mr. THOMAS of Utah. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD an address delivered on May 29, 1940, by the former Under Secretary of State J. Reuben Clark, Jr., under the auspices of the Sons of the American Revolution over radio station KSL at Salt Lake City, Utah, and printed in the Children's Friend for July 1940. I make this request because the address echoes the soul's aspiration of every true American who from study or experience has learned to know his Government and to appreciate its worth.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

I am an American because I believe in a government of law and not of men, and in a national allegiance to high principle and lofty ideal instead of to a personal sovereign.

I am an American because I believe in a government with three distinct, separate branches, each mutually independent of the other with no power of delegation or appropriation of rights or powers by any one to or from any other.

I am an American because I believe that government must derive its just powers from the consent of the governed and that branches of government and officers shall have such powers and such only as shall be given by the people, because I believe that the assumption by branches of government or by officers of rights or powers not specifically conferred upon them is usurpation, and because impeachment or other trial lies against any officer who so usurps rights or powers not specifically conferred.

I am an American because I believe in the greatest possible measure of self-government, and because I believe in a federal system of government which keeps local affairs in the hands of local governments.

I am an American because I believe in a Bill of Rights which places wholly beyond the reach of lawful government certain matters affecting life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, and specifically the right of freedom of conscience and worship, the right of free speech and a free press, the right peaceably to assemble and petition government, and the right to gain and hold property without molestation except by due process of law.

I am an American because under our form of government the people of the United States have made a progress never before made by any other people in the world in an equal time during the whole period of recorded history.

I am an American because standards of life and of living of the entire American people are far beyond those enjoyed by any other people in any part of the world, either now or at any other time, which is a living testimony and evidence of the kindly beneficence of our free institutions.

I am an American because this Nation has no scheme or plan of conquest, because it has respect for the rights of other peoples and of other nations, because it promotes justice and honor in the relationships of nations, because it loves the ways of peace as against war, as shown by the repeated peaceful adjustment of its own international disputes, because it has conquered the land greed which so afflicts the nations of the world, as demonstrated in Cuba and the Philippines.

I am an American because my country abolished slavery after it had become deep-rooted and because men still are free to work, and are secure in the enjoyment of the products of their labor.

I am an American because I firmly and earnestly believe that the Constitution is an inspired document designed by our Maker to set up a government which would make sure and secure the rights set forth in the Bill of Rights, and particularly the right of freedom of conscience and worship.

I am an American because I believe that the destiny of America is to be the abiding place of liberty and free institutions and that its own practice and enjoyment of these blessings shall be to the world a beacon light which shall radiate its influence by peaceful means to the uttermost parts of the world, to the uplifting of all humanity.

Trade Treaties and National Defense

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. THOMAS D. WINTER

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

ADDRESS BY JOHN H. CONNAUGHTON

Mr. WINTER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address, sponsored by the National Grange, delivered over the National Broadcasting System, in a Nation-wide hook-up, on July 9, 1940, by the Honorable John H. Connaughton, general counsel for the National Association of Hot House Vegetable Growers and special counsel for the Vegetable Growers Association of America:

Ladies and gentlemen of the radio audience, as general counsel of the National Association of Hot House Vegetable Growers, and as special counsel for the Vegetable Growers Association of America, and speaking under the auspices of the National Grange, I desire to publicly challenge a statement made by Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, in his address over this radio network; May 19. Upon this occasion, Mr. Hull said of reciprocal-trade agreements:

"It has brought marked benefits to all groups of our population, and to all sections of the country, without inflicting injury on any one."

This statement was made in connection with a purported analysis of the reciprocal trade agreement policy, and upon the occasion of the celebration of Foreign Trade Week. Mr. Hull beclouded the issue by misinterpretation of the facts and the conclusiveness of the proof which was produced at the hearings on the continuance of these reciprocal-trade treaties, which were held before House and Senate committees of the Congress, to which he referred, and sought to detract the attention of the American people by the use of war hysteria.

As a lawyer representing the great American vegetable-growing industry, I filed for consideration of the appropriate committees of the Congress, in opposition to the resolution to extend this reciprocal trade agreement authority, many sworn affidavits of responsible persons and American concerns who are actively engaged in the vegetable-growing industry.

These affidavits clearly and definitely stated that vegetable-growing concerns, with a long history of successful operation in the vegetable-farming industry, had lost large sums of money since the enactment of the Reciprocal Trade Act and negotiation of the Cuban trade agreement. Their loss ran into millions of dollars. These affidavits recited a history of struggle of vegetable growers, long in business, and how they had lost to the Cuban vegetable grower using cheap peon labor. Some vegetable concerns filed affidavits showing that the import of Cuban tomatoes had driven them out of the tomato-growing business entirely. Large hothouse-vegetable plants have been abandoned and torn down because they could not compete with imported tomatoes from Cuba.

Instead of analyzing the evidence produced before these committees, which Mr. Hull might have concluded supported his statements, he spent most of his broadcasting time in discussing the present unnatural trade situation resulting from the present European conflict. This needs no proof; it is a self-evident fact. To undertake to shape a trade-agreement policy on such unstable and unchanging conditions would be abject folly. When these hearings were being conducted in the Congress, we were led to believe that this would not be done, and that no treaties were contemplated under present conditions. We were told that we should be ready when this war is over, "to make treaties right and left," to avoid another war.

It now seems that this intention has been abandoned. Referring to the trade agreement power delegated to the President, Mr. Hull says:

"The renewal of the Trade Agreements Act for another period of 3 years was an immensely important step from the viewpoint of both the immediate and the long-range interests of our country."

We vegetable growers do not believe that the negotiation of trade agreements should be considered at all during the present world war. There are other and more effective methods of dealing with the trade problems incident to this situation, which it is not my intention to discuss. The demand for war materials, food products, and so forth, is an unnatural one and cannot be the basis of lasting treaties. These problems should be dealt with by the elected representatives of the people in the Congress in a temporary manner and not by the executive department alone.

We feel that it is of immediate importance for the American Nation to prepare through an adequate defense program and it should be done honestly. We should give a dollar in genuine defense for every dollar spent and pledge to the American people that the program will be free from political logrolling and political job juggling. It is rank lack of patriotism to mix politics with a national-defense program.

We American vegetable growers and American farmers are interested in the manner in which national-defense money is expended, as we bear a large share of the tax burden, which goes into it. We do not begrudge one dollar honestly spent for national defense, but we do deplore the expenditure of $7,000,000,000 for national defense and nothing to show for it.

The vegetable-growing industry and the agricultural industry in general constitute the first line of defense in any war. No war can be successfully conducted without sufficient food and clothing for both the soldiers in the field and the civilian population at home. We cannot prepare for national defense by creating conditions which build up agriculture in Cuba and other foreign countries, and stifle the American farmer. We cannot give our American market to the Cuban vegetable grower and expect to have vegetables to feed our soldiers in the event of war. Nor can we expect to take our own people off the pauper, beggar, and the relief rolls of the Federal Government if we destroy our American farmer through unfair peon competition. Unless we protect agriculture in peacetime, by giving it the American market, the American farmer will be a pauper or on the beggar and relief rolls of the Federal Government when you need him to raise food in an emergency. Other American food-producing industries are also suffering from this disregard of facts by our treaty and tariff makers.

Through a wide difference in the cost of production and a most unfair low tariff, canners of crab meat in Russia and Japan are taking the American canned crab meat market away from the crab meat canning industry in the United States.

Then, since Secretary Hull has said that "no one is injured by this program," we assume that he means agriculture also. We say that the present reciprocal trade agreement program has penalized agriculture more than any other industry. The executive department of the Government entrusted with this authority, has reduced tariffs on agricultural products which we are already producing in this country in large quantities and upon some of which we already have a large surplus.

There was a conflict of testimony, as Mr. Hull infers. When this condition arises, we must then analyze the testimony to determine the proper conclusion. In analyzing testimony, we first must appraise our witnesses and determine their fairness or lack of fairness, if any such appear, their interest in the subject matter, their ability to testify upon the matter under investigation, and from all of these considerations determine where the greater weight lies and give credit accordingly.

Who said no one was injured by reciprocal-trade agreements? Cabinet members, Government department heads, and lesser subordinates of the administration, which administration was determined that this authority should be renewed. In fact they consumed one-third of the printed record of these congressional hearings.

Now, let us see who testified against the reciprocal trade agreement program. They were large reputable farmer organizations, representing millions of men who make their livelihood in this pursuit; stock raisers, vegetable growers, citrus growers, and others who bear on their economic bodies the scars made by these reciprocal-trade treaties.

The National Grange, one of the largest and most reputable general farm organizations in the United States, vigorously protested against this policy. Mr. L. J. Taber, master of the National Grange, said in part before the Finance Committee of the United States Senate:

"Since the act was passed, the exports of agricultural products have been reduced and the importation of competitive farm products has been increased. The general effect of reciprocal treaties, and the legislation itself has had a depressing effect on the agricultural price level, and reduced farm income."

Mr. O. Keith Owen, president of the National Association of Hot House Vegetable Growers, said:

"The reciprocal-trade agreement with Cuba has flooded the United States with cheaply grown tomatoes and cucumbers and has caused enormous losses to the hot house and outdoor vegetable-growing industry. Many hot-house plants throughout the United States have been torn down or abandoned during this period."

Who is entitled to the greater credit under such conditions? Is it the academic technical adviser under pay of the administration asking for the enactment of this program, or the men who feed you and me, and supply our daily needs?

These men, fresh from the fields of honest toil, may not be able to analyze technical figures and statistics, but they know the relationship of cause to effect, as it touches their lives and pocketbooks.

Our American farmers may not be able to put a "doctor of science" description upon the injury he has received from competing with cheap peon labor that wears only a breech cloth, and no shoes, and lives on a few cents a day, but he knows that he cannot compete with peon and coolie labor and win, he is concerned with the health of his American employees and with feeding Americans clean wholesome vegetables, but the employees of the Federal Government are the authority for the statement that we do not know what the health conditions of the vegetable workers in Cuba are. Our Federal authorities tell us that they rely on inspection of tomatoes and other vegetables at the port of entry in the United States. We believe that the American people do not care to eat vegetables handled by syphilitic peons even if they are purified a hundred times. Consumer organizations and women's clubs should look into the health conditions under which imported vegetables are raised at the source, and if that cannot be done, exclude these foreign food products entirely.

Then, to further analyze the conclusiveness of this evidence as to the effect of trade agreements, 25 Democrats and 3 Farm-Labor Members of the House of Representatives joined the Republicans in voting against reciprocal-trade agreements, believing that many groups had been injured. In the Senate, 18 Democrats, 2 Farm-Labor, and 1 Progressive joined the solid Republican vote against this unfair treaty program. This treaty legislation only carried by 5 votes in the Senate, and 48 votes in the House.

A change of 3 votes in the Senate, or 25 votes in the House would have defeated this. When you consider that there are 261 Democrat votes in the House, and the administration with all of its patronage and other political power could hold but 236 of them for this policy, and that there are 69 Democrat votes in the Senate, and this same force could only hold 51 of them for this pet impractical administration program, this certainly indicates that Congress did not believe that the evidence was as conclusive as Secretary of State Cordell Hull said it was.

The Vegetable Growers Association of America will hold their thirty-second annual convention in Philadelphia, Pa., August 26 to 29, 1940, at the Hotel Bellevue-Stratford. I urge every vegetable grower and every vegetable consumer to attend this convention and hear further discussion of this important subject.

In conclusion, let me suggest to the American farmer, vegetable grower, fruit grower, stockman, wool grower, and others who were ignored by the Congress when you testified before their committees that this reciprocal trade treaty program has seriously injured you, that you demand an accounting of your Senator and Representative as to how he voted on this trade-treaty legislation. If they do not believe you when you testify before their Congressional committees, then it is time to get someone in Congress in their places who will respect what you say you need to prevent going bankrupt and making your employees clients of the Federal beggar and relief rolls.

Show these candidates for election to the Congress, by your vote, that you do not forget, and cannot, and will not be deceived. If you believe you are right, then organize yourselves to vote to protect your rights.

American Industry Speeds Up To Meet Totalitarian Pace

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. KENNETH McKELLAR

OF TENNESSEE

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Wednesday, July 10 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

ARTICLE BY THE ASSOCIATED PRESS

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. President, I receive many letters decrying our slowness in preparing for any armed attack that might be made upon us. The writers of many of these letters seem to feel that proper efforts are not being made to prepare ourselves as rapidly as possible.

A day or two ago the Associated Press printed an article showing what efforts are being made by our private war industries in the matter of preparation, and I ask that this article may be published in the Appendix of the RECORD.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

UNITED STATES SPEEDS UP INDUSTRY TO MEET TOTALITARIAN PACE—MEN, MONEY, AND MACHINES POURED INTO GIGANTIC TASK OF REARMAMENT

American enterprise is beginning to give the world its answer to these questions:

Can the United States, by democratic methods, accomplish what the totalitarian nations have done by conscription?

How fast can men, money, machines, and mass production do the job of rearmament?

Joplin, Mo., replies: "Powder plant doubling capacity by August 1." Minneapolis says: "Machine manufacturer increasing capacity 100 percent." Indianapolis reports: "Tank manufacturing firm starting to expand." Buffalo says, "Aircraft plant doubling floor space and pay roll."

Washington responds with an outpouring of millions in cash, and lays aside billions more for the job. Big business, in the person of Big Bill Knudsen, takes command of spending.

Army arsenals plan a 7-day week. Navy yards start hiring 15,000 men.

Taxis jam the avenue in front of the War and Navy Departments and the Federal Reserve Building where the Defense Commissioners are housed.

Businessmen, brief cases ready, crowd around the information desk of the Commission, roam the limitless corridors of the War and Navy buildings.

Four groups confer interminably—Army, Navy, Defense Commission, and businessmen.

"We are now in the what-do-we-need stage," says a Defense Commission aide. "How far are we going? Will it be preparedness or total effort? Our basis of action is not completely defined."

Meanwhile, buying begins. In 10 days the Commission places $360,000,000 worth of Army and Navy contracts—$36,000,000 a day—with more to come.

Gen. George G. Marshall, Chief of Staff, says, "Each order for critical items of matériel, where it can be absorbed by industry, promotes the broadening of the base of production and stimulates the rapidity with which such articles can be turned out."

ARMY STARTED WITH $47,000,000

Here are some of the things which the Army, Navy, and industry, without waiting on the recently created Defense Commission, have done in broadening the production base:

First, the Army. It started the congressional season with a modest grant of $47,000,000 for critical supplies.

In the list were such things as 131,789 semiautomatic rifles which it hoped to acquire by June 1942; 744 new antitank guns, to be delivered in June 1941; 144 new 90-millimeter antiaircraft guns, September 1940; and 392 light tanks, June 1941.

That list was compiled only last May 1. Today it's wholly out of date. Congress has since provided nearly a billion dollars for new Army equipment, not including planes, for which a 50,000 goal has been set.

Col. James H. Burns, procurement expert in the War Department, says: "Three important steps have been taken to increase productive capacity:

"1. The placing of large orders with arsenals and commercial plants. * * * (Congress has provided millions for 'large orders.')

"2. Creation of additional capacity to fill the gaps and deficiencies of present productive capacity. * * * (The Government is putting up perhaps $432,000,000 to expedite arms production.)

"3. Preparation of existing industries through planning and through educational orders and factory plans for the further production needed for a more extensive effort. (Thirty million dollars is forthcoming for industrial mobilization.)

ADDITIONAL CAPACITY NEEDED

"But," says Colonel Burns, "if we intend to prepare this country for a major national-defense effort within the next 2 years, a further step is vitally necessary, we must start at once the creation of additional capacity * * *."

Capacity is "negligible," he says, in such items as ammunition, fire control, tanks, armor, airplanes, and engines. Capacity for high explosives is twenty to thirty million pounds a year, as compared with one hundred million at the end of the World War. Aircraft capacity, doubled in the last year, must be doubled again or trebled to reach 50,000 planes a year.

For such a major effort, Colonel Burns told Congress, $558,000,000 should be spent on ordnance plants, $35,500,000 on chemical warfare plants, $5,500,000 on Quartermaster Corps plants, and $364,000,000 on aircraft factories, a total of $963,000,000, of which $597,000,000 would be needed for tools and equipment.

The moment Congress passed an 11-percent naval expansion bill this spring, the Navy was ready to launch the program. It was given 68 ships to build and expects to see them all afloat early in 1944.

MONEY BOTTLENECK ELIMINATED

Now the program has been expanded again, and Congress has approved a plan for nearly doubling the Navy's tonnage and making it in 6 years the greatest fleet the world has ever seen.

When asked by Congress what the principal bottleneck in naval shipbuilding was, Rear Admiral Samuel M. Robinson promptly said, "Money." Next he put labor, and third, facilities.

The money is assured now by a $4,000,000,000 authorization for doubling of the fleet.

Before that stunning amount was even whispered navy yards were ordered to proceed to a two-shift basis, with three shifts in view, and to add 15,000 men to their civilian forces of 28,800 within 3 months.

It would take 9 months "to get the full effect" of three shifts, said Admiral Robinson, but "we will be feeling the effect of it from the beginning."

DUPLICATION SAVES BUILDING TIME

With ample money, he said, the Navy could cut 6 or 7 months from the 4 years it takes to build a battleship. On some ships, he added, it also could save 8 months by duplicating ships already built. Duplication, he added, "is an integral part of the new program."

Also an integral part was the authority to negotiate contracts for ships without waiting months for competitive bids—authority which retiring Secretary of the Navy Edison gained from Congress in the last week of his term, after 3 years of trying.

As for facilities, the 8 navy yards and 7 civilian yards in the United States now have 62 ways which are being or have been used for the construction of warships. There are 11 for battleships, which take 4 years to build; 17 for cruisers, 3 years; 25 for destroyers, 2 to 3 years; and 9 for submarines, 2 to 2½ years.

AIRCRAFT CARRIERS PLANNED

Among the 200 ships in the $4,000,000,000 program might be 9 battleships, 5 aircraft carriers (which require battleship ways), 24 cruisers, 122 destroyers, and 22 submarines.

Present yards cannot now build so many ships in 6 years. However, the Navy soon expects to have $250,000,000 to stimulate ship production by purchasing and financing new equipment for yards.

In addition, the naval expansion bill was planned to provide for new gun factories placed safely inland and for increased armor plate construction.

President Roosevelt indicated that some of the construction money itself would go into expanding facilities.

Private industry was tied up with the Government activity in a thousand ways. War orders from Britain and France had given it a head start in expanding to meet military and naval needs.

Striding through the ice-cool corridors of the white marble palace that the Federal Reserve occupies, tall, broad, and ruddy William Knudsen symbolized the new link between Washington and the industrial cities with their smoke-smudged plants.

SELF-SEALING TANKS TO BE BUILT

From those cities last week came messages like these:

Baltimore: Glenn Martin division just equipped to manufacture self-sealing gasoline tanks for airplanes.

Indianapolis: Marmon-Herrington, makers of all-wheel-drive vehicles, tractors, and tanks, to double floor space. Allison Engineering erecting large airplane-motor plant.

Milwaukee: Kearney & Trecker, milling-machine firm, sending much of its output to aviation factories, has finished $1,500,000 expansion, increasing capacity 100 percent; doubling pay roll.

Joplin, Mo.: Atlas powder plant to double capacity August 1.

Buffalo, N. Y.: Bell Aircraft doubling floor space and pay roll for manufacture of interceptor airplanes. Curtiss Aeroplane manpower doubled in past year; further expansion expected.

Cincinnati: Durable-goods and machine-tool industries, centering in this area and lower Miami Valley, spending upward of $1,000,000. Aeronautical Corporation of America, which moved from Cincinnati to Middletown to gain 100 percent more floor space less than a month ago, planning another 100-percent increase to permit output of 2,500 light planes a year.

WATCH PLANT MAKES FUZES

Newport News, Va.: Newport News Shipbuilding & Drydock expects additions to its 11,000-man pay roll.

Chicago: Elgin Watch tooling to produce time fuzes for shells, beginning at end of year.

Detroit: Automobile men study airplane engines for production-line handling.

Charleston, W. Va.: Renovating naval ordnance plant. Expanding Kanawha Valley chemical plants. International Nickel adding $250,000 machine shop at Huntington.

Nashville, Tenn.—New $1,000,000 aviation manufacturing corporation plant now employs 400, with 300 in training and expects to increase to 1,000; can make 90 light observation planes a month, besides commercial ships.

Chicago—Twenty-six plants start enlargements costing $6,500,000.

FORGING FACILITIES INCREASED

Newark, N. J.—Wright Aeronautical Corporation newly opened plant to turn out 1,000 plane motors monthly now employs about 10,000.

Pittsburgh—Mesta Machine Co. completing $1,000,000 enlargement of forging facilities.

Memphis, Tenn.—Du Pont $20,000,000 powder plant, financed by Allies, under construction; to include 100 buildings covering 2,400 acres.

Hartford, Conn.—Pratt & Whitney (engine) division of United Aircraft spending $8,000,000 on expansion. Pratt & Whitney division of Niles-Bement-Pond Co., machine-tool firm of Hartford, recently built $2,000,000 building, adding 1,200 new workers. Colt Fire Arms just leased 100,000 square feet at Hartford to accommodate increased business.

Seattle—Navy pushing $4,500,000 drydock at Puget Sound to completion within a month. Builders working around the clock also on another drydock there.

Los Angeles—Aluminum Co. of America tripling plant to turn out castings, forgings, and rivets for airplanes. Aircraft factories expanding.

The Kind of Man Willkie Is

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks by including an editorial from the Oregonian, Portland, Oreg., of July 2, 1940, entitled "The Kind of Man Willkie Is." The editorial follows:

[From the Oregonian, Portland, Oreg., of July 2, 1940]

THE KIND OF MAN WILLKIE IS

The invaluable asset in politics is a personality that clicks with the citizenry. More than all else this was the advantage in recent years of that Federal administration which has been called, though lately with weary disillusionment, the New Deal.

The Republicans now have one of these rare and effective vote getters as their own in the person of Wendell Willkie. Party leaders did their best to avoid taking him over, but the enormous personal popularity of the candidate, so recently developed, was not to be evaded. And Wendell Willkie took them over, horse and foot, at Philadelphia.

Some of us think he is going to take over the country, too. Drop a spark in a ripened prairie, and the swift flame races to the skyline in an incredibly short space of time. Such fires have been stopped by plowing and backfiring, sometimes, but where is the furrow to be plowed against Wendell Willkie, and what is the backfire? Already we have witnessed a political phenomenon without parallel in major American history. It will sweep on.

It will sweep on because—to mix metaphor a trifle—the Republican nominee is as natural and easy as an old shoe. He entered our political life, and unwittingly, by a side door, talking American common sense in language direct, simple, and friendly. They hustled him up to the front, not unwillingly, and it was the voice of the people that spoke through the final party ballots in the convention.

It isn't often that the people find a candidate entirely after their own hearts. Even an honest nature will be tempted to strike a pose for political effect. Less fortunate sincerity frequently seeks to assist its ends by phrase-making intended to excite or gratify the popular ear. But the popular eye is critical and the popular ear acute, and something lacks in the process of utter conviction. Nothing lacks in the instance of Wendell Willkie. This nominee radiates naturalness and sincerity that are unmistakably genuine.

By the dog-eared usages of precedent some candidates in the past have retired for the night as the ballots were being counted, professing a serenity, come what might, that could have been suspected as arrant flapdoodle. Wendell Willkie did not dissemble his lively and virtually boyish interest in what was happening in the convention hall. He stayed up to listen to the radio, while he followed the balloting in his room in the Benjamin Franklin. There was an entire absence of pretense.

When he knew that he was nominated someone asked him where he would choose to receive the formal notification. And he said that he wanted this honor to come to him on the steps of the Indiana high school where he used to lead a debating team. He wanted to taste the experience to the full, and the way to do that, in his opinion, is to be notified at the old high school among the folks of his boyhood. Being natural beats political sagacity all hollow sometimes.

General Johnson is said to have pioneered with the observation that the secret of Wendell Willkie's charm—yet "charm" isn't the word at all; "likability" is better—is that Willkie likes everybody. It is a trait which few men of vigorous character and worth-while opinion ever possess. Usually its possessor is penalized by a lamentable lack of force of character. But that isn't true of the Republican nominee, who has this encompassing liking for people without any sacrifice of individual force, and who always has had it. Nor is it anything that can be imitated convincingly or counterfeited so that it will pass current. One has it or one does not have it. And Wendell Willkie has it.

You can think of one other American political figure who had it and who became President—but you shall think of him for yourself. Of late years there has been too much of this comparison of the public men of the present, and flatteringly, with the great public men of the past. But still every pot stands on its own bottom. We are willing to wager that the Republican nominee has in his own right, and abundantly, the quality we call "what it takes."

The best thing about Wendell Willkie, the attribute that should and may make him our next President—it being conceded that he has the requisite qualifications—is that he rings true. He is sound as a dollar. Maybe that phrase is a little unfortunate. Anyhow, the Republican nominee is sound as a dollar used to be.

I ask leave to extend my remarks by including an editorial from the Portland (Oreg.) Journal, July 3, 1940, on the subject of the Democratic candidate and the third-term mystery. The editorial follows:

[From the Portland (Oreg.) Journal of July 3, 1940]

WHO'S TO BE DEMOCRATIC CANDIDATE FOR PRESIDENCY CANNOT BE ANSWERED WHILE THIRD TERM REMAINS MYSTERY

Less than 2 weeks intervene until the Democratic national convention opens in Chicago, and the country faces a political situation that may be unprecedented.

There can be no dominant candidacy for the Democratic presidential nomination while President Roosevelt keeps his attitude toward the third term a mystery. The longer the time goes, the nearer the 15th, opening date of the convention, approaches, the less is the mystery, but not the shadow on other candidates.

A whole group of factors are combining to push the President toward a third-term nomination. Let's list them, briefly:

The pressure of international emergency.

The formidability of the Republican ticket.

The personal challenge by Republican nominee Willkie that he will be satisfied, only, to "meet the champ."

The President's solicitude to expand and continue the New Deal program, and his lack of confidence in any leadership but his own.

Put these together, and then add another that may be as impelling as any, namely, that by playing the sphinx the situation has got out of Roosevelt's control. He has waited too long.

Only a little while ago it appeared that the Republicans must wait until at least 1944 for any real hope of victory. Now, with the swift focusing of events that characterizes the times, the lines are being drawn for major conflict, not only between parties but between ideas of government. And the gauntlet lies at the feet of "the champ."

I also wish to extend, as a part of my remarks, the article written by Walter Lippmann under date of July 3, in which he comments on the nomination of Mr. Willkie and its bearing on the third-term controversy. Mr. Lippmann's article follows:

AS WALTER LIPPMANN SEES IT—WILLKIE NOMINATION SHATTERS ALL THIRD-TERM ARGUMENT

WASHINGTON, July 3.—By the nomination of Wendell Willkie the Republicans have removed foreign policy and national defense from the arena of partisan politics; therefore, there has disappeared the reason which would have compelled Mr. Roosevelt to run for a third term and the only reason which would have justified this departure from American tradition.

It will soon be evident, I believe, that the Nation has been saved from an internal disaster of disunion and demoralization which would have paralyzed the Government in the face of the mounting external dangers in the Pacific, in South America, and in Europe. For had the country been subjected to a 4 months' campaign fought on the issue of foreign policy and the third term the result could only have been tragic and ruinous.

Nothing was plainer after the first 3 days at Philadelphia than that only the nomination of Willkie could unite the Republican Party and provide a means by which the Nation could be united. The struggle over the platform proved that conclusively. The platform is a hash of meaningless words because Willkie's opponents tried to draft a platform which would make it impossible for the convention to nominate him.

Thus the platform had to be meaningless because the party was divided and the opposing factions were deadlocked. If, then, the convention had failed to break the deadlock by nominating Willkie, his supporters would have been profoundly disaffected and in one way or another great masses of them would have turned silently away from the party and even openly to the Democratic Party.

Under these circumstances the stage would have been set perfectly for a third-term nomination at Chicago. It would have been evident that Mr. Roosevelt was by far the strongest candidate that the Democrats could nominate. He would have had behind him not only almost the whole of the Democratic Party, but to a very large number of Republicans he would have represented, whatever their other feelings about him, the only available candidate who understands the world we are living in.

The rule against the third term is a rule which ought never to be broken except when the vital interests of the Nation are at stake. There would have been a very large number of Republicans and conservative Democrats who would have felt that the vital interests of the Nation are at stake, and that the rule had to be broken because the alternative to Mr. Roosevelt was a candidate who could not be depended upon to understand and then to protect the vital interests of the country.

Yet obviously it would have been appallingly dangerous to enter a campaign which saw Mr. Roosevelt running for a third term against a disrupted Republican Party and amidst partisan clamor about the most delicate and explosive issues in foreign affairs That is what the country has escaped because of Mr. Willkie's nomination.

Now it is no longer necessary for Mr. Roosevelt to accept the nomination which the Chicago convention will offer him. No one can now pretend that Mr. Roosevelt is the only Presidential candidate available who understands the national interest and is determined to organize the country to protect its national interest. On the other hand, it is evident that if Mr. Roosevelt now accepts a third nomination, he will have injected into the campaign an issue which will divert and divide the Nation at a time when unity is indispensable.

It is only reasonable to suppose that the logic of the new situation will be clear to Mr. Roosevelt, and that as a matter of principle and of personal inclination he will choose not to run again. As a matter of principle how could he justify a campaign for a third term against a candidate who, on the paramount issues of the day, has the same fundamental principles and convictions?

To run again now would be to descend from being President in a great moment of history to being a partisan candidate.

Mr. Speaker, on yesterday Gen. Hugh S. Johnson, writing in his daily column, had the following to say with reference to the Democratic nomination for President, which I ask leave to extend in these remarks:

ONE MAN'S OPINION

(By Hugh S. Johnson)

This nominating speech could, but won't, be delivered at Chicago.

My friends and fellow Democrats as our peerless leader, Franklin D. Roosevelt, has so often urged, what this country most needs in this world crisis is national unity. It needs a declaration like that of another great Democratic President in a similar peril. Said Woodrow Wilson: "Politics is adjourned." This principle of our party began with its beginnings.

Thomas Jefferson said at another time, when Europe's wars threatened us: "During the throes and convulsions of the ancient world, during the agonized spasms of infuriated man, seeking through blood and slaughter his long-lost liberty, it was not wonderful that the agitation of the billows should reach even this distant and peaceful shore; that this should be more felt and feared by some and less by others; and should divide opinions as to measures of safety; but every difference of opinion is not a difference of principle. We have called by different names brethren of the same principle. We are all Republicans (Democrats); we are all Federalists (Republicans)."

Fellow Democrats, in our great defensive preparations we need as never before that ancient democratic principle of political unity against a peril to us all.

But the forms of unity alone are not enough. United action requires great leadership of all Americans—not leadership merely of a hodgepodge of differing pressure groups, made bitter against other groups by real or fancied grievances or made servile by lavish special privileges or threats to withdraw them.

No. We must have a leadership on which all men of good will and high patriotism can unite and follow willingly and enthusiastically—not for group fear or favor but to draw us all close in one compact and mental appeal to Americans of all ranks and conditions that, when his standard is raised, people will flock to it because they cannot find it in their hearts or minds to do otherwise.

We need something more. Our battle front in this phase is in our fields and factories, in our arsenals and shipyards. Our front-line soldiers are now industrial workers and industrial management. We need a leader, proved in practice, who can manage our unparalleled economic strength for the greatest effort in its history in defense of our native land. We cannot command confidence in this on any uninterrupted record of failure in this field. We need a great liberal with an uninterrupted record of success.

Our party has done its best in its two-term fight toward progress and social justice. We have accomplished wonders. But we have made great blunders and left grievous wounds rankling. We have sown some crops of class hatreds and sectional resentments. These may have been unavoidable, but our leadership in this somber hour cannot be designed to aggravate or fail to cure them. It must be competent to hold the principles of all our proved advances and at the same time to soothe and heal the scars of our fratricidal wars.

This party has a Democrat who fits these specifications of our greater need as a glove fits a hand. I propose a Democrat who has a shining record as a great liberal in a post where being a liberal was far more difficult than it ever was for any of us—a Democrat with an unbroken record of managerial success in all great undertakings and not an unbroken record of failure; a Democrat who has just been given the most spontaneous and universal expression of mass popular confidence, approval, and affection in our time; a Democrat of proved justice, fairness, sympathy, and understanding of the problems of all our peoples; a Democrat of the most typically American career, philosophy, conduct, and achievement since Abraham Lincoln. I propose a Democrat by heredity and conviction, Wendell Willkie.

If the Republicans had sense enough to nominate such a Democrat, why haven't the Democrats?

The Forest Service In the State of Oregon

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

LETTER FROM LYLE F. WATTS, REGIONAL FORESTER FOR THE NORTH PACIFIC REGION

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask leave to extend my remarks by including a letter from Lyle F. Watts, regional forester for the North Pacific region, addressed to me under date of March 16, 1940, setting forth the work of the Forest Service in my section of the country. The letter follows:

UNITED STATES DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE, FOREST SERVICE, NORTH PACIFIC REGION,
Portland, Oreg., March 16, 1940.

Hon. HOMER D. ANGELL,
House of Representatives, Washington D. C.

DEAR MR. ANGELL: I take pleasure in transmitting to you a copy of the Report for 1939 of the Chief of the Forest Service. In this report Mr. Silcox mentioned briefly the responsibilities which have been assigned to the Forest Service and the activities in which it is engaged. I should like to amplify his statements insofar as they refer to the Pacific Northwest and the State of Oregon.

The four Columbia River Basin States have about half the softwood saw timber in the country. Two-thirds of this timber is west of the Cascades. Over 348,000,000,000 feet of it are in Oregon, which has more timber than any other State. In 1938 its production for the first time was ahead of that of any other State, although the cut of 3,790,896,000 board feet was less than that in 1929, the peak year. Washington was second. Oregon and Washington supply the United States with about one-third of its wood products. The wood supply in this area is a matter of national, as well as local, importance.

The timber supply in northern Oregon is also a matter of local concern. Logs tributary to the Columbia River market are becoming scarce. Clatsop and Columbia Counties are getting cut out. The Tillamook fire was a heavy blow to mills in the Portland area. Logs are being brought from more distant sources, and the mills around Portland face the disadvantage of a log haul that is continually getting longer.

This local shortage of timber cannot now be prevented, but a good deal can be done to keep the timber industry in Oregon supplied with raw material. The 10-year average for area burned annually on State and private lands is 265,796 acres, which would make a strip of townships reaching from Portland nearly to Jefferson. The State and private protection agencies have been strengthened, but the hazard is also being increased by public use and the growth of the area of logged-off lands. A much stronger protective effort seems to be a requirement.

In 1938, protection of State and private forest areas cost $790,672. Of this amount, $126,336, or 16 percent, was contributed by the Federal Government under the terms of the Clarke-McNary Act. It has been suggested that 16 percent participation by no means expresses public interest and obligation in forest protection in Oregon.

During the past two decades the western pine beetle killed about 15,000,000,000 feet of ponderosa pine in Washington and Oregon, chiefly in Oregon. During the same period losses of pine from fire and windthrow were less than 1,000,000,000 feet; the cut of all the mills in the pine type was about 17,000,000,000 feet. About 1919 the hemlock looper killed a township of old growth fir in Tillamook County; in 1929 to 1932 it killed 200,000,000 feet of timber in Pacific County before it was stopped. In 1934 the hemlock sawfly damaged about 60,000 acres of timber in the Santiam drainage. Other big losses can be mentioned. These epidemics can be controlled or modified, but they are beyond individual effort and are a public matter. The proposal that protection from insects and disease should receive Federal cooperation like that given protection from fire under the Clarke-McNary Act has merit.

Forest lands in Oregon are held by about 27,000 different owners. Most of these lands have little or no value for any purpose other than raising timber, and holding small tracts after they have been logged while the new crop acquires value does not attract many owners. It is understood that over a million and one-half acres have reverted to the counties for taxes, in spite of the forest-tax law. State law provides for the acquisition of this land by the State Board of Forestry and a small start has been made. This land is definitely off the tax rolls and is not of a kind that is likely to reenter private ownership. The counties are seldom in a position to manage it advantageously. Its acquisition and management as State forest is probably the best way of disposing of it. The Fulmer Act is intended to give Federal assistance to States in assembling and managing State forests, but there is no provision to make it effective.

State, private, and Federal agencies are pioneering in the conversion of virgin forests to managed forests. It is a project of the highest importance to the residents of the region. The work of the Forest and Range Experiment Stations is indispensable in developing the methods that are most likely to be successful. Their work covers every phase of land use—logging and milling practice, forest protection, range management, flood control, and so on.

For several years the Forest Service has been studying the possibility of sustained-yield management in each of the major operating areas in the North Pacific region. Seventeen analyses have been made and in seven instances private concerns have taken the action appropriate for putting their operations on a sustained-yield basis.

Along the national-forest boundaries in a number of localities, private and public stands make logical units capable of sustaining continuous operations advantageous to both parties. Assurance of access to national-forest timber would be a strong inducement to owners to plan stable operations, but under present legal restrictions this assurance cannot be given.

The forest survey was authorized by the McSweeney-McNary Act in 1928 and started about 10 years ago. It is intended to be an inventory of the national timber supply, dependent industries, depletion and growth. The field work is about half finished; compilation of the data that has been gathered, about one-half finished. Many years will be required to complete the project at the present rate.

The 1939 fire season was difficult. Spring and part of the summer were drier than any on record; some of the driest periods were accompanied by strong winds; a number of violent lightning storms occurred. In one 48-hour period 822 fires were started on 19 of the national forests in the region. The area of national-forest land burned was held to about 49,000 acres in Oregon, 58,000 in the region.

The use of crews of experienced woodsmen, selected for endurance and skill with woods tools and trained in what is known as the progressive method of fire-line construction, was developed. The crew traverses the location selected and at intervals each member makes a short sector of fire line, then moves ahead. With proper organization the line is completed when the last man has passed. The construction of held line per man-day was greatly increased, and I believe that this method, if extended, will decrease suppression costs and area burned.

Experiments were also made in delivering one or more skilled fire fighters by airplane to fires so located that ordinary means of travel will consume several hours. Especial training and equipment to prevent accidents are, of course, employed. Airplanes were used to deliver supplies to camps when other transportation was too slow. The radio laboratory has built several types of portable instruments that have been adopted by many other protective agencies. The smoke chaser's two-way unit weighs 9 pounds.

The drought which has continued for over a decade has decreased the national forest ranges' grazing capacity and the number of permitted stock has of necessity been correspondingly reduced. In 1939, the number of cattle grazed was 71,926; of horses, 2,468; of sheep, 460,622. The number of permits issued was 1,252 in Oregon, 1,722 for the entire region. In 1935 the number of cattle was 84,081; of horses, 2,762; and of sheep, 569,111. Undoubtedly more intensive management of the range would increase its capacity.

Wildlife management is conducted in cooperation with the State game commission and the Biological Survey. Overstocking of the Murderers Creek winter range is being corrected by adjustment of the bag limit. Mule deer overpopulation on the Fremont Forest along the California line is receiving attention. Some areas in the national forests are being stocked with beaver.

The use of the national forests for recreation is increasing. The latest reports show 1,078,049 visits. Their average duration is 2.6 days. About 100,000 of these visits were for hunting, 350,000 for fishing, 130,000 for winter sports. Use for recreation has about doubled in 5 years. Interest in winter sports has shown the greatest growth. In the same period the number of visits increased from 3.3 percent to 13.1 percent of the total attendance. A great majority of the campers and picnickers use the forest camps built by the Forest Service and the C. C. C. Without these camps, which are made safe from fire, use of the woods during the summer would be restricted, and accommodating such great numbers of people without pure water supplies and sanitary facilities would be impracticable. Under the office of lands, 2,421 special-use permits were in effect, 1,120 of them free.

Timber sales have not yet returned to the high point of 1929, but are increasing. The cut in 1939 was 217,371,000 board feet. Receipts were $503,136. The average price per thousand feet was $2.34. Of the 1,561 sales, 892 were to residents at cost, 669 were commercial sales. There were 3,735 free-use permits issued. Land acquired by exchange for timber amounted to 27,315 acres.

Timber in private ownership is more accessible and of better quality than that on the national forests and pressure to realize on it is heavy. The cut on the national forests is small in comparison to that in the rest of the State, but as the private stands are depleted this public timber will be of greater importance in the States' economy. Private forest lands, of better quality and greater production capacity than that on the national forests, will probably be of major importance, both in the local and the national forestry program. No doubt recognition of this situation prompted the Secretary of Agriculture in his statement to the joint congressional committee to advocate increased public cooperation with the owners of private forest land, and forest regulations to the extent that the public interest requires it.

A complete account of the forest situation in the Northwest cannot be given in one letter, but if I can be of assistance in furnishing additional information on any phase of this subject, I shall be most glad to do so.

Very sincerely yours,

LYLE F. WATTS,
Regional Forester.

Quo Vadis?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. DANIEL A. REED

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE SATURDAY EVENING POST

Mr. REED of New York. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial, appearing in the July 13, 1940, issue of the Saturday Evening Post:

[From the Saturday Evening Post of July 13, 1940]

QUO VADIS?

This is written on June 10. With no notice to the American people or to the Congress that is supposed to interpret their will, this country entered the war 4 days ago. Stranger than the fact was the passive acceptance of it.

While the Senate was debating, with intent to kill it, a resolution that would have conferred upon the President of the United States certain extraordinary powers, the President seized those powers and involved this country in the European conflict by an act of physical intervention.

This he did by sanction of his own will. The Congress did not know what he was going to do and debated it after the fact. The people, whose war it will be, first read it in newspaper headlines.

What we now write is to complete the record. We have no idea what the next consequences will be or what will have happened by the time these words appear. But as in time to come it may be bitterly remembered, so now be it said that in the one hundred and fifty-first year of its existence the house of constitutional republican government was betrayed, even as the builders feared. Unawares to the people, the exalted Executive principle could involve them in war. We dare to look at the truth and to ask why the house of our fathers had to be half surrendered before it was attacked. We do not here touch the question of whether or not we should go to the side of the Allies. What we are saying is that if the American people may be involved in a world war unawares and without a specific act of Congress, then much else has happened to them of which also they are unaware.

We do not believe the people had ever thought of going again to the battlefields of Europe. They had been misled to think this country somehow could put forth its economic strength and not itself become involved. That is what they were thinking when they were polled on whether we should be giving more aid to the Allies. The idea that we could help to destroy the aggressor in Europe and not get hurt was a propagated phantasy and produced on many minds the hypnotic effect that may or may not have been intended.

To accomplish his purpose, it was necessary for the President to outwit the law. First was a statute, enacted in time of peace, permitting the Military Establishment to sell to any foreign government with whom we were at peace on a certain date surplus munitions and war materials for which there was no other market, and to exchange motor vehicles, airplanes, engines and parts for new and similar equipment. When that statute was written, nobody could have dreamed that it would ever be used by the President as a pretext for opening this country's arsenals to either side in another world war.

Secondly, it was necessary to beat the prohibitions of international law and especially article VI of the Hague Convention of 1907, to which this country put its name, which is still in force, and which reads: "The supply in any manner, directly or indirectly, by a neutral power to a belligerent power, of warships, ammunition, or war material of any kind whatever, is forbidden."

Observe here the very strict distinction. The private citizen of a neutral country may sell arms and war material to a belligerent power; that is permitted. American industry, acting privately, could sell airplanes and guns to the Allies. But for a government to do it is an act of intervention. The government that does it is no longer neutral. It has taken part. It is, in fact, at war.

The President of the United States could not himself, of his own will, declare war. Only the Congress has the constitutional power to declare war. But he hit upon a device for getting the country into the conflict without declaring war.

As Commander in Chief of the armed forces of the United States he declared the Navy to have a surplus of airplanes, at a moment when there was a panic of anxiety over the shocking inadequacy of the country's air defenses. As Commander in Chief he ordered the Navy to deliver this alleged surplus of planes back to the factory they came from, in exchange for new planes yet to be made—and this under a previous stipulation with the airplane factory that as fast as it received the planes from the Navy, it would hand them over to the Allies.

We had no surplus of airplanes; so far otherwise, we very urgently want more than we are yet able to make for ourselves. Nor were these obsolete planes, for if they were, of what use could they be to the Allies in battle? Thirdly, then, the make-believe that in the end it became simply a transaction between the private American airplane industry and the Allies, because the Navy, on delivering the planes to the factory, quit title to them, was only clever, and far beneath the dignity of a great people.

The next day it was guns. As Commander in Chief, the President would declare obsolete or surplus a lot of United States Army guns, including thousands of the 75 mm.'s the French were greatly in need of, sell them to American gun makers, who would sell them at once to the Allies, undertaking to replace them later in the American armory out of new manufacture.

That day, as reported in the New York Times, "In his press-conference discussion of national-defense plans, President Roosevelt refused the role of prophet when asked how far this Government was prepared to go in supplying the Allied Powers with guns, ammunition, and aircraft." And how about bombs to go with the bombing planes? That question was asked because only the Government itself manufactures the bombs. Therefore there could be no subterfuge of turning back bombs to private manufacturers in exchange for new and better bombs later. The reporters could not quote the President directly at this point. The New York Times reporter wrote: "It was remarked, however, that the law does not require surplus munitions to be returned to the factory whence they came, but merely specifies that they may be exchanged for other munitions." Which means, if it means anything, that the President was thinking the Government could manufacture bombs to go with the airplanes, sell them to somebody who would sell them to the Allies, and itself take anything in exchange.

Then what of warships? What of turning warships back to the shipyards that made them on an undertaking by the shipbuilders to sell them to the Allies and make new ones for the United States Navy? The reporters asked the President that question. The New York Times reporter wrote: "He explained that he had been unable to get to that question, so far."

How far on this line would the Government go? Only the President could say, and he declined to be prophet.

What else might the Government do? If the people would know that, let them read the cryptic words of newspaper reporters writing under the censorship imposed upon the White House press conference.

What a text is there! Government by Executive inspiration. War by Executive impulse.

We shall survive the war. But how? As a government of the people, by the people, for the people? Or as a state that has embraced in the New World what it had wished to destroy in the Old?

For it is war. Since the first week of June this country has been in fact at war with Germany. Take it in simple fact. Suppose we were at war and a government that had been neutral in form, but not in feeling, suddenly opened its arsenals to our enemy, exactly as we have opened ours to the Allies.

Would we regard it as an act of war? We would. What would we do about it? We would declare war on that government, and if for strategic reasons not actually at once, then certainly in our hearts and minds, for a future settlement.

If it should turn out that to strip this country of armaments and send them to Europe at a moment in history when our existing power of national defense was pitifully inadequate and the crisis in Europe was such that no one could say how many hours remained of the British Empire, or that the aggressor might not win, capture the allied fleet and dictate a peace before enough American aid to turn the battle against him could possibly arrive—if it should turn out that this had been a tragic blunder, beyond recall, then the leader who had done it might wish that his page in the book of fame would refuse to receive ink, for it would be written of him there that in his passionate zeal to save civilization in Europe he had forgotten his own country.

Are We Benefited by Trade Agreements in South America?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FRANK CARLSON
OF KANSAS
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1940

Mr. CARLSON. Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State recently created a new Division of Commercial Treaties and Agreements in place of the former Committee on Trade Agreements. In a statement announcing this change the Secretary stated:

> Far from signifying an abandonment or weakening of the trade-agreements program, this administrative change is intended to strengthen and make more efficient our efforts.

Is it not about time we face the facts as to how beneficial these treaties are?

I am submitting a table showing the increase in export trade in four trade-agreement countries and four non-trade-agreement countries of South America. It is interesting to note that our trade to the four trade-agreement countries for the first 5 months of 1940, as compared to 1939, increased 47 percent, while our export trade to the nonagreement countries increased 114 percent.

Exports to South America

Exports including reexports	5 months ending May—		Increase	Percent
	1939	1940
Total exports to South America	$114,528,000	$194,413,000	$79,885,000	69.7

National Aviation Day

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD
OF CALIFORNIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1940

SUGGESTED PROGRAM BY NATIONAL AVIATION DAY ASSOCIATION, INC.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I wish to present the following which is a suggested program for celebration on National Aviation Day, and which in my opinion is a very splendid program that should be supported throughout the entire Nation.

SUGGESTED PROGRAM FOR CELEBRATIONS ON NATIONAL AVIATION DAY
AUGUST 19, 1940

When Congress, at the suggestion of the National Aviation Day Association, Inc., by Public Resolution No. 14, passed on May 11, 1939, recognized and designated August 19, of each year, as National Aviation Day, it not only commemorated the invention of the airplane, but also the birthdate of Orville Wright, only living father of aviation.

Since the historic flight of the Wright Brothers, at Kitty Hawk, N. C., on December 17, 1903, it cannot be denied that aviation has made tremendous progress. It is true that military necessity, perhaps, spurred research and technical advances, but aviation has made great strides in civil life as well, and now air transportation is rapidly blanketing the entire earth. Indeed, it is not unreasonable to assert that aviation today is at about the same stage, industrially, as was the automobile in 1910—on the threshold of its greatest period of development.

The growth of the industry now is being greatly accelerated. The manufacture and maintenance of giant air liners, undoubtedly, will be greatly increased and expanded, and with greater speed and more safety factors. Every nation will be covered by a criss-cross of air-transportation lines and stratoplane clippers will navigate the trackless lanes of all oceans.

AMERICA'S STAKE IN AVIATION DEVELOPMENTS

As this is written America is making titanic efforts to recapture supremacy in manufacture of planes. Because of war clouds and threats therefrom stern necessity dictates that the United States immediately construct essential factories and equipment and train personnel, so as to be on equal footing, at least, with any and all other nations.

At this time of uncertainty it is perhaps unwise to venture predictions but, on the basis of present conditions, it seems reasonable that from $500,000,000 to $2,000,000,000 will be expended in the United States within the next year or two for aviation.

(NOTE.—As this goes to press the Army, Navy, and civil-aviation appropriation bills, alone, authorize expenditures of $543,413,779.)

Giant factories are being built, or, are in the blueprint stages, and all present aviation facilities are being greatly expanded. Modern airports, dotting every State, and touching every important city, are being built, or, will be built, and, surely, these will be laid out with a view to establishing a distinct pattern of closely knit air line communications, from coast to coast.

Other industries—manufacturing tools, dies, parts, and other matériel, are, and will also expand activities, in direct ratio of aviation requirements of the moment, including road building machinery, the rubber industry, radio and telephone communications, building material, including glass, brick, stone, concrete, wood, sheet iron, steel, etc. All these, and others, will share in the impetus of aviation's forward thrust.

AVIATION'S BIRTHDAY

The National Aviation Day Association, Inc., has communicated with all Governors of States and Territorial possessions, advising them of the official nature of the celebration of National Aviation Day, and, also has conferred with many organizations, and individuals, including Members of Congress, heads of patriotic and veterans' organizations; civic, trade, technical, and other groups, as well as representatives of women's organizations.

All have expressed approval of the general purposes for which National Aviation Day was created, by Congress, and an overwhelming majority pledged their active support to make these celebrations nationally significant.

Members of Congress have assured our association that they will, gladly, avail themselves of the opportunity to participate in local celebrations, and are holding themselves ready, on call.

For the purpose of suggesting possible means of making their assistance effective, the National Aviation Day Association, Inc., respectfully tenders its program to all those interested, including Governors of States and Territorial possessions, mayors and other national and local public figures.

PROCLAMATIONS

We suggest that the President's proclamation, outlined below, be given wide publicity by release through the offices of Governors, mayors, and other public officials:

"National Aviation Day

"By the President of the United States of America—A proclamation:

"Whereas the development of aeronautics in recent years has been so rapid that aviation in its many phases has come to exert a profound influence on the course of events throughout the world; and

"Whereas American initiative and industry have contributed greatly to this development and should be encouraged to continue such contribution in order that the United States may retain its outstanding position in the field of aeronautics; and

"Whereas Public Resolution No. 14, Seventy-sixth Congress, approved May 11, 1939 (53 Stat. 739), provides:

" 'That the President of the United States is authorized to designate August 19 of each year as National Aviation Day, and to issue a proclamation calling upon officials of the Government to display the flag of the United States on all Government buildings on that day, and inviting the people of the United States to observe the day with appropriate exercises to further and stimulate interest in aviation in the United States': Now, therefore,

"I, Franklin D. Roosevelt, President of the United States of America, do hereby designate August 19, 1939, and August 19 of each succeeding year, as National Aviation Day, and call upon officials of the Government to display the flag of the United States on all Government buildings on that day, and invite the people of the United States to observe the day with appropriate exercises to further and stimulate interest in aviation in this country.

"In witness whereof I have hereunto set my hand and caused the seal of the United States of America to be affixed.

"Done at the city of Washington this 25th day of July in the year of our Lord 1939, and of the independence of the United States of America the one hundred and sixty-fourth.

[SEAL] "FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

"By the President:

"CORDELL HULL,

"Secretary of State."

Governors of States and mayors of cities may well issue an official proclamation, declaratory of the day. For illustration, below is copy of the proclamation issued by Gov. E. D. Rivers, of Georgia:

"STATE OF GEORGIA,

"EXECUTIVE DEPARTMENT,

"Atlanta.

"By the Governor:

"Whereas the United States Congress, by joint resolution passed on May 11, 1939, recognized and designated August 19, 1940, the birth date of Orville Wright, to commemorate the invention of the airplane, and to provide for Nation-wide celebration of that date as National Aviation Day; and

"Whereas the invention of the airplane, and its development throughout the years, have meant much to the progress of our Nation and our State; and

"Whereas Inventor Orville Wright has made a great contribution to economic development by giving to the world its fastest mode of transportation, and deserves much credit for this feat: Now, therefore,

"I, E. D. Rivers, Governor of Georgia, do designate August 19, 1940, as National Aviation Day in the State of Georgia, and I call upon all citizens of our State to participate, wherever possible, in events scheduled for that day sponsored by the National Aviation Day Association, Inc., or by other groups of individuals interested in aviation, for the purpose of honoring a great American through expressing appreciation of his contribution to the world.

"And it is so ordered this the 2d day of May 1940.

"(Signed) E. D. RIVERS,

"Governor."

MILITARY UNITS

Where desirable, Governors, or other public officials, may call upon commandants of Federal Army posts, or naval, marine, or Coast Guard establishments, requesting detail of service bands or other units of our armed forces to participate in such celebrations.

This also applies to the National Guard, which, of course, is under jurisdiction of the Governors themselves. If the National Guard has an aviation corps, then, a still more appropriate demonstration may be staged, including forms of mock combats or other aero exhibitions.

PATRIOTIC ORGANIZATIONS

The G. A. R., U. C. V., Legion, Veterans of Foreign Wars, United Spanish War Veterans, Disabled American Veterans of the World War, Army and Navy Union, Military Order of the World War, Society of the Cincinnati, Reserve Officers' Training Corps, and other organizations and auxiliaries thereof are naturally interested in a patriotic celebration of the type of National Aviation Day and would no doubt respond to any official call.

Fraternal orders, including B. P. O. E., L. O. O. M., F. O. E., the Shrine, Knights Templars, and other Masonic orders, the Knights of Columbus and affiliated bodies, B'nai B'rith and other organizations interested in the preservation and advancement of American interests also would likely participate if called upon.

CIVIC, TRADE, AND OTHER GROUPS

Chambers of commerce, both senior and junior, boards of trade, commercial clubs, Rotary, Kiwanis, Lions, Civitans, and other similar groups doubtless would support local celebrations.

WOMEN'S ORGANIZATIONS

The interest of women in aviation is very keen, and is growing daily. Congress itself has taken note of this fact, as evidenced by the joint resolution recently introduced in the Senate by Senator HATTIE CARAWAY, of Arkansas, and in the House by Representative EDITH NOURSE ROGERS, of Massachusetts, and which reads as follows:

"National Aviation Day

"[Remarks of Hon. EDITH NOURSE ROGERS of Massachusetts, in the House of Representatives, April 23, 1940]

"Mrs. ROGERS of Massachusetts. Mr. Speaker, today I am introducing a resolution authorizing the recognition of American women's interest in aviation, and directing their attention to, and urging their cooperation with, the coming Nation-wide celebration of National Aviation Day on August 19, 1940, and for other purposes.

"Whereas the development of aviation, both as an important industrial asset and as a strong arm of our national defense, is vitally essential to the welfare of our country; and

"Whereas by Public Resolution No. 14, approved May 11, 1939, at the suggestion of the National Aviation Day Association, Congress recognized and designated August 19, 1940, the birth date of Orville Wright, as National Aviation Day, and further provided for Nation-wide celebration of that date; and

"Whereas the patriotism of American women from the very inception of our Republic has been the inspiration of lovers of liberty—respected and admired the entire world over; and

"Whereas today American women have a double interest in the advancement of aviation: First as a potent means of defending their homes against invaders; second, as an increasingly important industrial factor, contributing to the pay rolls and thus aiding recovery and maintaining prosperity: Now, therefore, be it

"Resolved, That in recognition of American women's interest in aviation, Congress directs their attention to and urges their cooperation with the coming Nation-wide celebrations of National Aviation Day on August 19, 1940."

By all means Governors, mayors, and other public officials should call the foregoing to the attention of all women's organizations in their respective States, and cities, including local units, General Federation of Women's Clubs, National League of Women Voters, National Woman's Party, Business and Professional Women, American Association of University Women, etc.

COLLEGES, UNIVERSITIES, HIGH SCHOOLS, ETC.

August 19 falls during the vacation period, when most students are away from school. But, by calling upon the heads of institutions of learning, it may be possible to bring about some sort of celebration in which school units take part.

In this connection, it is suggested that it would be very appropriate if such schools would undertake essay contests relative to the progress of aviation. Data is available in most school libraries on the historical aspects, at least, and there might be, in some instances, opportunities for reenactment of the scenes attendant upon the first flight, at Kitty Hawk, or other feats worthy of commemoration.

HIGH-SCHOOL CADETS AND BOY AND GIRL SCOUTS

Unquestionably, aviation has first place in the hearts of the younger generation today, and if high-school cadets, Boy Scouts, and Girl Scouts are called upon to participate in National Aviation Day no doubt they would enthusiastically accept the invitation. A number of ways are open for their activities, among which might be model airplane contests, including flights of both motored planes and gliders; demonstrations of radio communications, heliographing, etc.

DEDICATION OR REDEDICATION OF AIRPORTS

The attention of Governors and mayors is respectfully directed to the possibilities of dedication of various airports. In view of the large number of fields now under construction, doubtless, it would be possible to arrange dedication ceremonies for these on National Aviation Day—next August 19.

It does not matter whether or not these are entirely new airports, or old ones simply being enlarged and improved to fit the needs of the times. In many instances, as yet, no official name has been bestowed upon such fields, or perhaps the fields might appropriately, be renamed. In any event, it would be eminently appropriate to hold dedication rites, on August 19.

This should be done in all States, and we respectfully suggest to Governors, mayors, and other public officials that they immediately investigate and determine what fields could be thus covered, and arrange suitable programs for each.

AIR-MAIL CACHETS, ETC.

In many instances, in view of the great public interest in philately, the foregoing suggested dedications, or rededications of airports, on August 19 might well be made the means of having a cachet. The expense of this is practically negligible, it being only the cost of the rubber stamps itself, and publicity for such cachets can be easily arranged through the various philatelic societies, and their official organs.

Our association will gladly furnish additional information on above, if requested.

NEWSPAPERS

It is especially requested that all newspapers be advised as to any and all activities undertaken by public officials, pertaining to Aviation Day celebrations, and the National Aviation Day Association would appreciate copies of any such statements furnished the press.

RADIO

National Aviation Day, as a means of radio celebration, is a "natural." Interested sponsors at local stations could well arrange skits of, say, 15 minutes' duration, in which the characters enact the Kitty Hawk flight, or other stirring recollections of aviation history.

Ace flyers, including air-mail pilots, could be brought before the microphones and interviewed as to "My Greatest Thrill in the Air," etc.

AIR MAIL AND POSTMASTERS

All postmasters are requested to give special attention to air-mail phases in the period leading up to and culminating in National Aviation Day. In this connection, the National Aviation Day Association has requested Postmaster General Farley to declare and proclaim the period from August 18 to August 24, inclusive, as National Aviation Week, and it is possible that this action will be taken.

Mailing associations should be contacted through postmasters and advised to participate in air-mail week and National Aviation Day celebrations.

AIR EXPRESS

The growing importance of air express as an important means of transport also offers opportunities for cooperation on the parts of interested groups. They can well point out to the public, as well as business groups, the desirability, for example, of shipping certain types of perishables and other commodities which must have quick handling and marketing.

CONCLUSION

The National Aviation Day Association wishes to take this opportunity to thank all those who have pledged their support. Herein the association has endeavored to suggest practicable ways and means of successfully enlisting public interest in National Aviation Day by providing celebrations therefor.

Naturally many other means of education and entertainment will present themselves. In certain cities, local groups are already planning the holding of monster air expositions, air races, and other forms of aerial entertainment, on National Aviation Day.

It is hoped the foregoing will enable those interested to coordinate their plans and activities, so that every State in the Nation will be represented in this all-American observance and commemoration of what our association believes to be:

"Aviation—the greatest mechanical art since the Age of Pericles."

Youth's Opportunity and Responsibility

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RALPH E. CHURCH

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

ADDRESS BY JAMES SCOTT KEMPER, PRESIDENT, CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES

Mr. CHURCH. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by James S. Kemper, president of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, delivered June 20, 1940, before the annual meeting of the United States Junior Chamber of Commerce at the Mayflower Hotel, Washington, D. C.:

YOUTH'S OPPORTUNITY AND RESPONSIBILITY

I was very happy to accept your invitation to be with you today. I had the pleasure of introducing your immediate past president, Phil Ebeling, at our annual meeting. I thoroughly enjoyed what he had to say and I hope I shall fare as well at his hands and yours today. The Chamber of Commerce of the United States has a very real interest in what you are doing. And I have a deep personal interest in the young men of America and in the part they play in the topsy-turvy world in which we live.

At the moment our thought of domestic problems is shadowed and diverted by the grim specter of the war abroad. The French capitulation has shocked and upset all of us. But we do have some very important and serious American problems of which we cannot afford to lose sight. There are dangers from within that threaten our way of living quite as much as dangers from without.

Materially, we have prospered greatly. We enjoy more comforts and more luxuries, have better educational and recreational facilities than any nation in the world.

The humblest citizen, if American-born, still can aspire to the Presidency. The mechanic of yesterday is the head of a great automobile industry of today. The steerage passenger of yesterday now heads a great radio business. The clerk in the insurance office rises to the presidency of his company. The student who worked his way through school becomes the head of a great university. And so it is through all the ramifications of our national life. It is your job and my job to protect the system that made these things possible just as it is our job to protect against the invader from without.

You will have come here to attend this meeting have evidenced by your attendance and by your support of the junior chambers that you do have a real interest in public questions. You have taken advantage of the opportunity your organization and its constituent members affords to do something unselfishly for your fellows.

The acceptance of this opportunity carries with it a very definite responsibility. If your leadership is not intelligent, if your decisions are not sound, if your thinking is not calm and sane, then your leadership will be worse than of no avail.

RESPONSIBLE LEADERSHIP

To me the saddest picture in national life is that of a person in a responsible public position who has the qualities of leadership, who has the ability to influence the thinking of his countrymen but who uses that power and that ability in a way that is unworthy of the high trust his position implies.

There has been this type of leadership in our country. Leadership which has made personal or political-party advantage a primary consideration. Leadership which has encouraged class consciousness and class hatred. Leadership which has deliberately confused issues to achieve selfish ends. Leadership which posed as liberal but which actually was illiberal and intolerant.

Thinking about this talk and in an effort to forget for the moment the problems that currently beset us, I sat down the other evening and read some pages from the diary of my grandfather's grandfather. He was a young itinerant minister who in 1783 went from Virginia to Ohio to preach the gospel to the widely scattered settlers of the Ohio Valley. I always am moved by the simple story of his day-by-day work riding on horseback, as he did, 15 miles or more daily, stopping along the road to visit a sick settler, or to baptize a baby, or to have a word of evening prayer with such neighbors as could be brought together. But what stirred me most was the evidence of his complete lack of discrimination with respect to race or creed. For days at a time he did not see a single member of his own denomination, and yet in his errand of mercy and comfort he served where opportunity offered or need existed.

To him as in the eyes of his Maker each had a soul and all were equal. That indeed was the view of the signers of the Declaration of Independence when just a few years before they declared: "All men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable rights, that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness"; and "that to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed."

Nothing there to suggest domination of one class by another. Nothing there to suggest that an employer should not be permitted to counsel with his men on any problem that may concern them. Nothing there to suggest that the state and not its people should be supreme.

Abraham Lincoln understood this. The other day when I was in the capitol of the State of Illinois I stood before his statue and on it read these words of Lincoln's: "If there is anything that the whole people cannot entrust to anyone but themselves, that thing is the preservation and perpetuity of their liberty and their institutions."

THREAT OF ABSOLUTISM

Do you think that if we had followed Lincoln's advice we should have accepted the increasing amount of regimentation that now so vitally affects our freedom of opportunity? I don't. And I say to you that unless we are alert to the dangers that face the people, if this Government which is supposed to be our servant, becomes our master, then we may find on a day not so far distant as we might assume, that the state has become the absolute ruler of our lives and our destinies.

Some have spoken slightingly of the "horse and buggy" days. My view is that the philosophies of those days well might be our guide today. I never have believed that honesty, fair play, or good sense could be achieved by legislation. On the contrary, I hold to the view that there should be in our laws no "musts" and only those few "must nots" which are necessary for the protection of life and property and the maintenance of an orderly government.

We cannot allow our public thinking to be distorted to the view that a more highly authoritative control by the Government is the means of bringing about a greater good for a greater number. Indeed, history records countless evidences that there is no good for the number or for the individual, if the liberty of the individual is taken away.

With all your vision and with all your energy, I urge that you enlist yourselves, as members of junior chambers of commerce, to the protection of that ideal.

In this connection it is important to remember that Hitlerism was and is a youth movement. Its Italian counterpart likewise was organized around especially trained and fanatically devoted groups under 25 years of age. It was the domination of new blood that has made the German army in the last few months such a formidable machine. Youth training, youth discipline, and youth abstinence from indulgence made possible not only the fighting machine but the organization behind it which provided equipment and supplies. One cannot but speculate on what that same energy and enthusiasm could have produced if directed along constructive lines.

YOUTH'S NEW ROLE

In my judgment, but in a totally different way, the youth of our country has an equally significant role to play in the years that lie immediately ahead.

As I see it, to us of the business world has been committed the giant task of reorganizing and battling for those spiritual and intellectual ideals that feed and sustain our whole American way of life from its forms of government to its methods of free economic enterprise. On the political front it is clear to every thinking person that American Government is functioning in city, State, and Nation with about the same efficiency in relation to its problems that might be expected of an army equipped with bows and arrows, fighting against a body of men armed with machine guns.

We businessmen as a group have been subjected to some rather severe criticism in recent years. Much of it was deserved. But if American business as a whole was as honeycombed with graft or shot through with screwball schemes as is much of our so-called democratic government, then America never could have reached its present world position.

The conclusion of all this is clear. We must join political parties, help write political platforms, and seek to get men in public office who will provide us with something better than "Model T" efficiency in government.

BUSINESS AND POLITICS

I care not to what party you belong. The important thing is to do something about the political situation in your community. It is easy enough to write letters of protest to Congress when something is proposed to which you object. But remember that the place to correct government you don't like is in your own precinct. If you will take an interest in the men who run your party in your own home neighborhood and in the men who are selected as candidates, you will have demonstrated that your activity in an organization like this springs from hearts that believe in America and in American institutions and in our representative form of government.

I'll admit that some of these things seem unimportant in contrast to the immediate vital issues of preparedness and of the effect upon us of the swift-moving scene in Europe. But for that very reason they should be mentioned because history repeatedly has shown that it is in time of war or threat of war that democratic peoples must be particularly on the alert to protect their rights.

Complaining about water that has flowed over the dam ordinarily doesn't do much good, but I think it can be said and properly, too, that if those in control of our Government had given one-tenth of the time to a wise expenditure of the billions we have voted for preparedness that they have to building up political machines through Government spending, our Nation today would be in an infinitely better position. And this without reference to the fact that a large part of the billions we have spent for work relief easily could have been used for preparedness and with a much better effect on the morale of our citizenry.

LESS TALK, MORE ARMS

The events of the past few weeks have made it perfectly clear that any assistance we have given or could have given the Allies probably would have had little if any effect upon the outcome of the present hostilities. That being the case, I submit to you that ordinary prudence would seem to indicate that you and I well might say: "Let's have done with saber rattling at least until we have removed the dust and cobwebs and rust from our sabers."

In this situation, the position of the chamber is that we should have adequate defense against any aggressor. For many years our committee on national defense, in cooperation with the military authorities in the Government, has urged the importance of preparedness. We believe that in proceeding with this new program we should act sanely and that means taking full advantage of the mistakes made at the time of the last war and in our more recent military program.

Supplementing our committee on national defense, I shall report to the board of directors of the senior chamber at its meeting tomorrow, the organization of a national-policy council. The personnel of this council largely has been determined with a selection of outstanding men in each field. This council will cover those important aspects beyond the purely military phase.

Amongst these are production, finance, construction, transportation, subversive activities, national economy, taxation, merchant marine, natural resources, price levels, agriculture and flow of capital. Barring handicaps of Government creation, this committee and others associated with it can promptly and effectively put into motion the great business machine of America in full and hearty cooperation with agencies of Government.

NONPOLITICAL DEFENSE

But business and industry cannot do its part of the job unless Government will clear the track of bureaucratic red tape, selfishness, and the desire for independent action. Our great need, particularly as applied to the Army, is equipment and supplies. Their procurement is not a political job. What the situation requires is business ability, initiative, and common sense, backed by authority that will permit immediate action.

You will agree that we cannot afford to be niggardly about the cost of preparedness. But, we do have the right to know that these added costs will not be wasted. And we can insist also that the objectives be made clear to all of us.

For the past few weeks we all have been shocked and distressed by what is going on across the Atlantic.

We entered the last World War with the highest of motives. We wanted nothing for ourselves and made that perfectly clear to everyone. We thought we were entering a war to outlaw wars and rule by force. We were going to make the world safe for our kind of government.

RECURRING EUROPEAN WARS

Let's consider for a moment just what happened. Forty-three years had elapsed following the conclusion of the Franco-Prussian war of 1870–71. During that period there were 12 comparatively minor conflicts. Since the conclusion of the last World War, 1914–18, there has been no period of a year when the nations of the world all were at peace. Almost before the ink was dry on the Treaty of Versailles, Europe's age-old struggle was resumed.

And now the thought in the mind of every American is, What part, if any, should we play?

It seems to me that in endeavoring to find the answer we well might go back to Washington's advice in his Farewell Address, and, in the light of our experience since his day, endeavor to determine the course we now should pursue. I quote:

"Excessive partiality for one foreign nation and excessive dislike of another cause those whom they actuate to see danger only on one side.

"Real patriots who may resist the intrigues of the favorite are liable to become suspected and odious while its tools and dupes usurp the applause and confidence of the people to surrender their interests.

"Europe has a set of primary interests which to us have none, or a very remote, relation. Hence she must be engaged in frequent controversies, the causes of which are essentially foreign to our concerns."

Until 1917 we followed Washington's advice except for the War of 1812, when we were not the aggressor. And because we followed his advice, our forefathers were able to devote their thought and energy to building America.

CALM JUDGMENT ESSENTIAL

But it is difficult when we read the stories that come to us daily from Europe not to let our emotions overpower our reasoning. Much will be said on the radio, and much will be printed in the newspapers that unless we are careful will inflame our passions and cloud our judgment.

Here's a simple example of the sort of thing that goes on. A few days ago one of the leading American newspapers under its first page war news summary carried this press dispatch entitled "Seize Spy with United States Maps." The article read, "Arrest of a spy suspect possessing United States maps of potential military value was disclosed today by Atlanta police." Just as a matter of curiosity I wrote to a friend in Atlanta and asked him for the facts. This was his reply: "I have investigated the attached through Government sources and find that there is nothing to it. Actually, while the man did have a foreign accent, the only maps he possessed were ordinary road maps which he had picked up at a nearby oil station."

MASS PSYCHOLOGY

I yield to no one in my devotion to this country and to the principles for which it stands. But there comes a time when the test of good citizenship is not determined by whether one follows the crowd. My Scotch grandfather indelibly impressed upon my memory this philosophy: "When you see most of your associates or most of your contemporaries or competitors in business or most of the people in the country headed in one direction, go off by yourself in some quiet place, preferably the sort of place where you can commune with nature, and ask yourself this question—'Why are they going in that direction?—Is it the right direction?' And then he added, 'My boy, you will be surprised to find how often it is not.'"

And because I never since childhood have forgotten that advice, I now, in considering with you the serious problems that confront us, ask myself and ask you, "Are those who think the preservation of our country is dependent upon American participation in this war properly appraising the situation and would such participation best serve the interests not only of our own country, which always should be our primary concern, but the interests of the world in which we live?"

As I get the picture, opinion is divided on the question as to whether eventual American participation is inevitable. But the great mass of our countrymen are not convinced that war for us cannot be avoided.

OUR FIRST DUTY

One thing is certain. We must be calm. That will be no easy task, because the tug on our heartstrings is strong. But it is not too great a task, if we dedicate ourselves to the proposition that our first responsibility is the preservation of this, our country.

Arm we must, and in such a way that no aggressor will dare attack us. But never must we lose sight of the fact that history, and our children and grandchildren will hold us to strict account for any unnecessary spilling of American blood.

Speaking for myself, I can conceive nothing more destructive to America and to American institutions than for us to engage in Europe's present war. Participation by us would add to our already staggering debt—a burden that would so adversely affect our national economy that we would closely approach, if indeed not actually experience, complete economic collapse.

If national bankruptcy which resulted in many countries of central Europe after the World War were repeated here, it surely would open the door for one-man government, call it dictatorship or receivership, as you will.

And if we did this unthinkable thing—destroying the flower of our youth and wasting the savings of our citizens—who would there be to bind the wounds, who would there be to extend aid and help of the type we so generously gave after the last war, who would provide food for those who were hungry, who would fight pestilence and disease, and who would have the means with which to reestablish business and industry and agriculture and provide jobs for labor in the countries whose normal functions were completely disorganized by the ravages of war?

No, my young friends, sympathize though we all do with the Allies, our answer to the saving of representative government is not through American participation in this war. It is more likely that for us it might bring exactly the opposite result.

You young men gathered here today are the flower of the crop of American youth. In your hands lies in a large measure the destiny of America. You are devoted to your country and to its institutions. You would rise as a man to defend America against foreign aggression. You will not be so influenced by emotional appeals that it will be impossible for you to appraise the really vital issues of the situation.

Thank God that you are realistic—that you do require the reasons behind the policies that are suggested to you. And thank God that you have ability and clearness of vision.

Hysteria has no place in this picture. America is not at war. If we think and act calmly and sanely we may be saved its awful toll. That is my prayer today.

STATEMENT AND POEM FROM THE MOORHEAD (MINN.) COUNTRY PRESS

Mr. BUCKLER of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement and poem which was inserted in the Country Press of Moorhead, Minn., by Mr. Peter Nordby, in its issue of Thursday, June 27, 1940. It is as follows:

[From the Moorhead (Minn.) Country Press of June 27, 1940]

MOORHEAD, MINN., June 26, 1940.

DEAR EDITOR: According to magazine reports, Princess Juliana, from Holland, made the following statement after she arrived in Canada with her children: "Speak not to me of pity. Pity is only for the weak."

Will you please make room in your paper for the following poem under the title "Pity and Preparedness"?

PITY AND PREPAREDNESS

Speak not to me of Pity. Pity is for the weak.
The maimed, the crippled, the helpless, the unprotected, the meek.
The lone lamb bleats for its mother,
Devoured at the Gray Wolf's Feast.
The Battle rages throughout the world,
By man. by Bird and Beast.
The lion leaps at the tall Giraffe,
The snake at the fledgling lark;
And at night you can hear the Jackal laugh
As he stalks through the forest dark.
Mars strikes at the tear-stained cheek of Christ,
Then pierces His gentle side.
The things of Life we most highly prize
Are shackled and crucified.
Speak not to me of pity,
For pity I do not crave.
If I cringe or yield but a dying inch,
Then pity a weakling and slave.
Speak not to me of pity,
The world does not understand.
It forgets the weakling who loses
And covers his blood with sand.
Speak not to me of pity,
Of pity the world has none.
An empty pail in an empty well,
Under a desert sun.

But speak to me of the blessing
And strength of the cold blue steel,
And the driving power in a steady hand
That a tyrant's beast may feel.
Yes, speak to me of power,
And the will to strike if I must,
For home, for Beauty, for childhood,
For Liberty's sacred trust.
And if I go down by the ruffian's hand,
And my breast by assassin is bared,
Then Pity me not, but rather say,
"He was weak and caught unprepared."

OPEN LETTER FROM AVIATION DEFENSE ASSOCIATION

Mr. FADDIS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following open letter of the Aviation Defense Association:

AVIATION DEFENSE ASSOCIATION,
Washington, D. C., July 4, 1940.

To all Patriotic Citizens of America:

Dr. Orville Wright, the first man to fly a heavier-than-air power machine, acknowledged receipt with thanks of the Honorable J. RANDOLPH'S extension of remarks in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of February 28, 1939, in his letter acceeding to our request to use his birthday, August 19, for the national observance of Aviation Day, and expressed regrets that the anniversary of his brother Wilbur could not be used.

Out of respect to his desire, we hope that National Aviation Day will be celebrated in his honor and in memory of his brother "the fathers of flight."

It is fitting and proper on this Fourth Day of July to extend our greetings to Dr. Wright and to Senator Claude Pepper and Representative J. H. Peterson for placing our original resolutions, Senate Joint Resolution 53 and House Joint Resolution 134, and later Senate Joint Resolution 111, Seventy-sixth Congress, first session, to establish August 19 as National Aviation Day, as well as to the following Representatives who sponsored similar resolutions: A. C. Anderson, William A. Ashbrook; [1] Frank Carlson, N. M. Mason, M. J. Maas, J. A. Martin,[1] M. J. Merritt, J. Randolph, J. A. Shanley, J. H. Peterson, H. R. Sheppard, R. M. Simpson, J. J. Sparkman, J. Voorhis, and M. C. Wallgren.

We also desire to thank Senators R. R. Reynolds and M. Sheppard and Representatives H. N. Routzohn, T. A. Jenkins for their able assistance and more especially Col. John H. Jouett, president, Aeronautical Chamber of Commerce of America, as well as the 66 Senators and 215 Representatives who signed our congressional petition for August 19.

One hundred and sixty-five members of the National Aviation Forum signed similar petitions last February and Mr. G. R. Wilson, chairman, and Mr. Charles F. Horner, president, N. A. A., assured me that they would lend their full support for the celebration; later on March 12, Mr. Wilson wrote: "You have a thoroughly comprehensive view of what measures are sound and necessary and patriotic," and urged me to take the lead to launch my own individual campaign "to make America first in the air in every respect."

The future peace and safety of our Nation demands that we all unite to meet this requirement.

AVIATION DEFENSE ASSOCIATION,

The Passage of the Hatch Clean-Politics Bill Will Strengthen Our Democracy

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CLARENCE J. McLEOD

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

Mr. McLEOD. Mr. Speaker, I am wholly in favor of the proposal to extend the Hatch Act, and I urge that it be made a law without delay.

It is repugnant to every principle of a free people that a public officer be permitted to use his official authority to influence the outcome of any political campaign. When a public official uses his official authority as a means of influencing the electorate, he is using the power vested in him by the law for the service of all the people, and this power should never be diverted for a partisan purpose. He holds that office to serve the people, not his own selfish ends.

During the first session of this Congress we enacted legislation which prohibited pernicious political activity on the part of employees of the Federal Government. The purpose of the pending bill is to extend those same provisions to State employees whose employment is made possible through the use of funds from the Federal Treasury.

The law prohibiting pernicious political activity among Federal employees, although it has been in effect little over a year, has proven itself to be a real and potent safeguard against nefarious political practices. It should by all means now be extended to State employees.

The merits of this bill have been widely discussed, both in and out of Congress. Throughout these discussions and arguments it has been quite obvious that there is nothing objectionable in the entire bill for those who are sincerely interested in good government. There is not a single Member of this body who can, in sincerity, get up here and say that the American people do not want shameful political evils abolished from cur elections.

May I ask why a little group within the New Deal has continuously fought the passage of the Hatch bill? The measure is admitted by all students of government to be a notable step in the direction of free government by the people. Yet this group exerted great effort to keep this bill from even reaching the floor of the House.

There should be no question of partisanship on this issue. Surely it cannot be that the two great political parties of our country will refuse to join in protecting our polling places. Can it be that a little coterie of New Dealers realize that their position is so insecure with the American people that they must resort to questionable methods at the polls to perpetuate themselves in power? Must they browbeat the electorate with the threat of withholding public-works funds, threaten employees with loss of their job if they don't vote as directed, or literally blackmail Federal and State employees in order to keep themselves in office?

Surely the elections of 1938 have not been so soon forgotten. You surely recall when purging with public funds was the order of the day. If you do not remember, let me assure you that the American people, not only remember, but are insistent that it not occur again.

And as for the misuse of public office in the 1936 elections, let me quote the distinguished Senator CARTER GLASS, of Virginia. He said:

> The last election was carried by people who were getting favors from the Government, people who were subsidized by the Government, people who were on relief rolls.

When a man's livelihood is affected by his political convictions there can be no denying that these convictions will be tempered, consciously or otherwise, to the pleasure of those who are dispensing favors from the Public Treasury. This tyrannical hold on a large part of our population who must look either to the State or Federal Government for assistance is the antithesis of democracy. It is actually destroying the process of democracy, and when you have destroyed the process you have destroyed the country.

We must be more alert than ever during these trying times for those things which will in any way tend to obstruct or destroy the operation of our American institutions.

It seems incredible, but it is manifestly true, that certain groups within the administration refuse to place the welfare of our country above their selfish political aims. The passage of the second Hatch bill will go far in curtailing pernicious political activity and will allow the electorate to have full and complete freedom at the polls without fear of reprisal from some entrenched bureaucrat.

During the past few days we have heard much about cooperation, coalition, joint action, harmony, common cause, and unity. It appears that those who cry so loudly for cooperation can only see the need for cooperation when their own selfish political interests are served. All of the grave problems facing the American people are not found in the sphere of foreign affairs and national defense. There is also a home front. There is ever present the task of preserving and protecting our American institutions.

We are dealing with a fundamental problem of our form of government. It is a question of the right of those who do not hold public office to be free from the domination and control of those who hold administrative public office. It is a question whether a man may cast his ballot as he chooses and answer to his conscience, or cast his ballot at the direction of some political overlord.

We have seen the way whereby Hitler received 98 percent of the votes of the so-called electorate of Germany. As I recall, that was quite some time ago, and it was the last election that has been held there. We know also the manner in which Stalin receives his overwhelming votes of confidence. We know, in both instances, it has been due to pressure upon the populace by their government officials. It is this procedure and this process that I am fighting against. We want no army of petty officeholders directing the people of this country as to how they shall cast their ballots.

The very idea of citizens receiving ultimatums as to how they were to vote was so repugnant to the principles of American freedom that the people demanded and got action. The Congress in response to the will of the people enacted a bill prohibiting those pernicious practices among Federal officeholders. Now, the people are asking that the act be extended to State employees who are paid from Federal funds.

You will, indeed, mistake the feeling of the people on this question if we do not clear up this situation by passing this bill.

At this time, as never before, we must fight relentlessly for the protection of those democratic processes which are the very lifeblood of our Republic.

The force that will most certainly destroy the foundations of our democracy and pollute the stream from which it flows is the corrupt use of public funds in the attempt to control and affect the source of our freedom. Officials in Federal and State positions should execute the duties of their offices and let the public—not the political officeholders—run elections. Let the people, not the political stooges, determine the elections.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

Mr. THOMAS F. FORD. Mr. Speaker, I wish to go on record as unqualifiedly supporting the proposed surplus-profits tax. For Congress to adjourn without passing this legislation would be a breach of trust. With billions voted for national defense, to make this country and this hemisphere safe from attack by Hitler or any European combination, unequaled opportunities for profiteering at the expense of the public become possible. Only by prompt and decisive action can this be prevented.

PREVENT DEFENSE PROFITEERING

To make our defense program the means of creating a new horde of millionaires, while the people sweat to pay for their profiteering, would be a national disgrace. Nothing would tend more to undermine the faith of the people in their own democracy. In preventing such profiteering, we shall also strengthen the confidence of the rank and file of Americans in our Government and in our system. And we shall help to undermine the principal appeal of the subversive groups and "fifth columnists" in our country.

I have actively supported the President's defense program and have unhesitatingly voted for every appropriation and every tax bill necessitated by this defense. I am convinced that it is essential for the United States to build up such impregnable defenses as will enable us to prevent aggression on this hemisphere. I favor spending billions for this. It is unthinkable that we should expose ourselves to attack by Hitler and his system. The speedier we can prepare the more secure we shall be against attack. In the meantime I favor aiding the Allies by all methods short of war.

TWO-OCEAN NAVY IMPERATIVE

We have good reason to believe that our Navy before the summer closes will be the largest and most effective single Navy in the world. When our defense program is completed, we intend having two such navies, one for the Atlantic and one for the Pacific. I am strongly advocating the construction of the most powerful coast defenses that engineering skill can devise for the Pacific coast.

Frankly, while I am opposed to war, I shall enthusiastically support the expenditure of billions for our national defense, but I shall never vote to send an American expeditionary force to fight in Europe.

JOBS FOR THE UNEMPLOYED

I consider there is a second line of defense, as important as that which is giving us tanks and aircraft, bombers and naval vessels, fortifications, and munitions of every kind. This second line of defense is the expansion of the social-welfare program. Spending enormous sums of money for defense while leaving enormous numbers of our people in poverty and despair is unthinkable. If we can afford armament, we can afford an expanded program for social betterment. The fact is we can afford both.

A major objective of the defense program should be to open jobs for our unemployed. This can be done, not by lengthening the workweek of those regularly employed but by shortening it. This can be done, not by introducing more and more labor-saving machinery, but by using our manpower to its fullest capacity, including men of middle age.

The first objective in a democracy is certainly to promote the general welfare. That is why at this time all who hate poverty, in the midst of plenty, slums crowded with unhappy and hungry Americans, the existence of surplus foods that our people need and cannot have because they have not the money—all who hate these and who believe, as I do, that such things are a denial of democracy—are determined to march forward and not back along the social front.

EXPLOITATION MUST NOT RETURN

Of course the people are not going to turn the country over to a corporation executive whose only interest throughout his strikingly successful career has been profits for the few at the expense of the many. It seems incredible that we who have fought for the Tennessee Valley power enterprise should live to see a great political party nominate the ringleader of the opposition to that enterprise. Yes, a utilities tycoon is actually nominated and is actually asking the rank and file of Americans to vote for him for President of the United States.

It is unthinkable that the people will "fall" for this. They know that under such a leader all New Deal measures would be thrown into the discard. Once more business would be free. To do what? To profiteer, to exploit, to issue watered stocks and sell them on a stock market "freed" from restraints; to create a boom followed by a panic in which once more the middle class would lose their savings and their security.

We will have nothing of this. We must go forward in creating a better America. We must continue the effort to make democracy really work for the benefit of all.

We can do it. We can bring about a far more reasonable distribution of income; we can cut out most of the profiteering and still make business worth while; we can pay decent wages and cut the workweek; we can give better training to our young people and then see to it that they get jobs; we can take on some real responsibility for our middle-aged people whom industry rejects; we can provide adequate old-age pensions—and we can do all this without making our people soft, despite former President Hoover's fears on this score.

SOCIAL PROGRAM MUST BE EXPANDED

We must not let the defense program stop the equally important progressive program for the opening of opportunity. There is just one way to safeguard all that we have won and to insure other and greater advances against unemployment and poverty.

That way is to continue an administration that can be depended upon not to let the common people down.

I have in my four terms in Congress supported all progressive legislation. I have supported the W. P. A., the C. C. C., the N. Y. A., the increase of Federal aid to the blind and handicapped, and I have opposed all cuts in these activities so essential to our welfare. I think we should spend more money for adult education, for child welfare (including provision of school lunches) and for public health. By increasing such services we reduce poverty and disease, which are just as costly, and we add to the happiness and efficiency of the people.

To defend our country against the aggressors, we need national unity and faith in our leaders. We need a President who can be depended upon to protect the Nation against foreign and domestic enemies, to uphold our civil rights and to continue the attack on poverty and unemployment. Such a President will have to march under the Democratic banner.

Of course, the one best man for President is the one whom the American people have twice elected by overwhelming majorities, first in 1932 and again in 1936.

Under Franklin Delano Roosevelt we can move forward with confidence and with a renewed feeling of faith in democracy and its greatest exponent, the United States of America.

Britons Call Americans Yellow, United States Woman Engineer Relates

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY

ARTICLE FROM WASHINGTON TIMES-HERALD

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article appearing in the Washington Times-Herald, July 10, 1940, entitled "Britons Call Americans Yellow, United States Woman Engineer Relates."

This, in my opinion, is a very timely observation and should serve as a warning to the pro-British propagandists in the United States, who are not satisfied with stripping our national defense by way of aid to carry on their blood business, but boldly and emphatically insist that American boys be sent across the ocean to fight their battles.

The observation of this American business woman corroborates the impression many of us have formed from actual contact with the aristocrats of Britain in this country and abroad.

[From the Washington Times-Herald of July 10, 1940]

BRITONS CALL AMERICANS YELLOW, UNITED STATES WOMAN ENGINEER RELATES

NEW YORK, July 9.—Vivien Kellems, woman electrical engineer, was back today from a tour of Europe, convinced that the best course for the United States is noninvolvement in a war which she sees as purely a bloody dispute between business rivals.

Miss Kellems is a $50,000-a-year president of a firm which manufactures a shell lifter, and it was to discuss an order from the British that she went to London. She found, she said, that the British upper classes hate Americans and yet are trying desperately to get us into the war.

"The English caste system is as hide-bound as that of India," she said, "but it is cracking. For the first time the lower classes are beginning to murmur. This has scared the upper classes to death. They are fighting for their lives, and they despise us for not helping them."

She said that in London she frequently heard the remark:

"We'll hold out as long as we can, and then we'll let the two yellow races, Americans and Japanese, fight it out."

At a luncheon attended by Lady Chamberlain, sister-in-law of former Prime Minister Neville Chamberlain, she heard Lady Kemsley read letters from persons replying to a request for contributions to war charities.

Miss Kellems said she remembered most strikingly a letter which said the writer felt no obligation to contribute to alleviate a situation caused by an incompetent government.

After the luncheon, several persons asked Lady Chamberlain:

"How does your brother-in-law feel about conditions now?"

"When Lady Chamberlain replied," said Miss Kellems, "her voice was dangerously sweet. 'I don't know,' she said, 'I haven't seen him in a long time.'"

France's surrender cost Miss Kellems' firm hundreds of thousands of dollars, but she said her only regret was that France had been defeated.

"War isn't my business," she said. "I came home convinced the European war was none of America's business. Why should we shed blood for a people who hold us in contempt? They call us yellow. England says she is fighting for democracy. Believe me, there are no lofty ideals to save.

"The issues are mixed, but they are far from being quixotic. It's for money, for trade, and not for democracy, that they are killing one another, on the one hand. On the other, there is this battle of the classes, this frantic struggle on the part of the aristocrats to survive."

Ambition Which Didn't Quibble

EDITORIAL FROM THE PONTIAC (MICH.) PRESS

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Pontiac (Mich.) Press of July 1, 1940:

[From the Pontiac (Mich.) Press of July 1, 1940]

AMBITION WHICH DIDN'T QUIBBLE

An Associated Press dispatch yesterday from Aberdeen, S. Dak., shed an illuminating light on the character of Wendell Willkie. It also lent emphasis to the oft-repeated contention that there are chances left in America for the boy who will work at any kind of labor and at any kind of a price, so long as the job is on the square. While he was locating a chance to work in the Dakota harvest fields, Willkie, big, powerful, willing, and possessing a smile that made an immediate hit, supported himself by washing dishes in an Aberdeen restaurant.

Willkie hasn't been afraid to get dirt on his hands, nor timid about grease on his overalls. As a youth he was a worker, with never an idle hour in his day. He wasn't maintained in luxury by a millionaire father while he was getting his law-school education. He made his own way by indomitable traits of character that made his later extraordinary rise in the business world possible. He possesses force and character and virility in a most amazing degree. Standing six feet one with a massive head and muscular body he is a striking example of perfect physical manhood. He radiates strength and determination and his unconquering spirit is disclosed by the tossing back of his tousled black hair when he starts to speak, and by the sparkle in his eye and the firm set of his determined jaw.

The American people always have admired a boy who wasn't afraid to wash dishes.

America's Maturity

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES P. McGRANERY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

ADDRESS BY FRANCIS BIDDLE

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Francis Biddle, before the Philadelphia Forum, March 7, 1940:

We are, of course, still a very young race measured in the years of our national existence; and young, comparatively speaking, in the years of our existence on American soil as a people. And in considering this question of national age, we are unique among nations, for our racial roots are as ancient as any, and far more varied. They run back into the origin of peoples young and old. Yet our American characteristics are youthful and recent, not dissolved in any dim prehistoric mist, or confused and untraceable; but, as it were, set down before us as fresh as yesterday and as definite as we have insight to understand them. Of course, only some have formed with clear enough outline to permit satisfactory generalization. Most perhaps are inchoate, seen in present direction, but not at all certain in outline. But that will always be as long as this new Nation is fresh and vigorous and, therefore, too uncertain and expansive to catch or to retain in any mold of definition, full of ferment and the stirring and effervescence of changing life.

I have spoken of us as a young nation, and that is almost a sort of sanctified form, to speak of us as a "young" nation. But tonight I should like to speculate from another and less obvious approach. It is so easy to skim from this placid assumption of youth the vaguely irritating virtues and vices which have for so many years, sometimes a little awkwardly, formed an all too transparent cloak to a pervasive sense of inferiority, our naïveté, our pioneer resourcefulness, our practicality, our sentimentality, passion for written morality, contempt for art, nervous tension, idealism. The list is more familiar than it is accurate. But it will be more interesting, I venture to think, to leave these easy clichés and consider whether there are signs that we are maturing, which involves a comparison of values, dipped, as it were, in history. I do not propose to be tiresome by first seeking a definition of maturity. The outline of my meaning will appear as we begin to consult our preferences. But I have definitely in mind a conception which can be read only in terms of national aspiration and a national approach to that aspiration—not European maturity, or that of any race whose dreams run in our blood, but the growth and flowering of our own racehood into a stuff which is ours—American.

I have come to a conviction that recently we have matured with singular rapidity as a race. There are, I am inclined to think, evidences of this maturing in several and widely diversified fields. Whether it has come fast—suddenly and in the last few years—or merely seems to us to have done so, so that the quickness of the change lies only in our consciousness, I am not sure. The war has accelerated it. The time would appear to be no longer than a generation, or at most two—I suppose it has been gradual. But, looking back over a period of time, say 30 years ago, the change seems to me to be very great. I shall try to describe as accurately as possible what I have in mind.

It is a little difficult to find a word for one striking quality of this new maturity. Sophistication perhaps suggests it, but is neither complete nor quite accurate. Nor has it the sound of an American word. I can discover the best example of what I mean in the turn our humor has taken. I don't mean because it is streamlined; that is a matter of fashion, and changes with the times. But I suspect that it is riper, perhaps, even if more incisive, also more tolerant. It is altogether a more finished product than it was 30 years ago. A comparison of the New Yorker to Life or Judge, vintage of 1910, will illustrate. The range is broader and more deep. There is a more complete understanding of the American self that is being laughed at. The fun is in the situation itself, in the drawing which hardly needs a text and is no longer merely an illustration of a story. We may sigh a little that it has lost a kind of funny innocence, but at least it has grown up.

And how humor tells the story of change strikes the very note of race itself. Could anyone but an Englishman have given us that famous drawing in Punch, during the Great War, where two charwomen are talking, one with a great black eye, and the other says to her: "Yer calls yerself a 'onest woman, with that black eye and yer 'usband at the front!" Or that priceless expression of the essence of the Irish approach, when, after a scuffle with the Black and Tans, an old woman had been knocked down in the crowd, and a young sergeant picked her up in his arms, carried her to a bench, and set her down gently to rest. You can almost see her, looking up gratefully, crying a little, as she stutters out her thanks to the Protestant: "Sure and when you are roasting in hell I'll be giving you a drop of water!" For what is altogether French, universal perhaps, but French in its import and human cynicism, there is Daumier's famous lithograph of the wretched, emaciated prisoner in the dock before the judge, who asks him: "You had means of existence; what did you do with them?" And the poor defendant answers, "Mon Dieu, Your Honor, I existed with them."

To illustrate what I mean about American humor, take the drawings a few years ago in the New Yorker of two heads sticking out of manholes, or perhaps truck drivers, and one head says to the other, "Did you read H. L. Mencken's article in the Mercury this month?" Of course, you cannot do that justice without seeing the two heads. Julian Huxley told me, a few years ago, that behind every Punch in each London club at breakfast was now propped a New Yorker. What a relief that must have been to get all that lovely American fun, safely ensconced, as it were, behind the good, solid, English humor about housemaids, and rich Jews from the city trying to hunt, and fresh young subalterns, and crusty old recruiting sergeants, and all the rest of it.

A little on the same order was Art Young's famous drawing in the Masses of a workman talking to his wife at the end of a hard day, and she says: "I don't see why you should kick, working in a nice, cool sewer all day, and me bending over this hot stove." The old Masses and the Liberator and the New Yorker had the quality in common of laughing at real foibles. Mr. Peter Arno's types are no less a savage attack on the smugness of our particular American bourgeois than Boardman Robinson's lampoons of 20 years ago, even if they stem from very different social convictions.

A consciousness of our own national strength and integrity, the self-confidence of maturity, has become evident, particularly since the Great War. That is shown in a number of ways. The inspiration for American painting today lies no longer in Rome or in Paris, but in America herself. American themes fill American canvases—the hard foreground of our industrial civilization, drab, perhaps, but none the less powerful, elevated railroads, factories, the cruel rush and violence of strikes, the pealing death of great, ugly American-Victorian houses, angular cattle starving in the Dust Bowl, the lean and arid American types, sharecroppers, hunkies, dagoes, wops, our tremendous skies and horizons, barrooms, and the human, vulgar sprawling of the beaches. You get, I like to imagine, not only our American theme, but the angle of the shrewd American eye watching it all, no longer turning inwardly to find only the reflection of a pale European classicism, but looking steadily at the sights at its own door.

Young students today want to spend their Guggenheims in Chicago, or New Orleans, or in the Indian land of the Southwest, not in the countries of Europe, which once were their inspiration. Then you heard it said, and not so many years ago, that no artist could live in America. Today no American artist can afford to live elsewhere. For we have discovered that art thrives and is nourished not on art, however great, but in life itself, and that an artist can best express the struggle of his own race and the feeling and shape of his own hills. Turgenev, who lived so many years in Paris, used to say that at certain intervals he had to go back to Russia to keep his genius from drying up.

This awareness of our own power I count as a sign of maturity. It is as if we had suddenly stopped imitating others, content to find our own ways by ourselves. It has given us a definite national consciousness, integrated us as a people, banished a lurking sense of inferiority which had always been accompanied by a defensive impulse to brag, and to raise our voices. Of course, I do not mean that the boasting and stridency has disappeared. But I think we are less callous, less conscious of our sprouting manhood, surer of ourselves and therefore less imitative of others. The very tone of our national voice has stopped changing.

"Live your life"—thus runs a western motto—"so that you can look every damn man each day in the eye and tell him to go to hell." Colonel Streamer was laughing at the same sort of provincial but sturdy pride, when he wrote:

> "The land of the brave and of the free,
> Where you're as good a man as me
> And I'm a better man than you * * *"

It is an ancient quality, this pride of independence. Lewis Mumford quotes the oath sworn by the subjects of the King of Aragon: "We, who are as good as you, swear to you, who are not better than we, to accept you as our king and sovereign lord, provided that you observe all our liberties and laws; but if not, then not."

In letters, too, as well as in painting, we turn to American themes and to our own story. There has been an immense revival of interest in American history, and American biography is devoured by the public. For a number of years the form and structure of our plays have broken away from the classic French influences and from a rather feeble imitation of contemporary English. Today the American theater is a vigorous expression of national themes and aspirations. And we have learned to laugh publicly at the funny people who govern us. Witness Of Thee I Sing, and more recently Leave It To Me. And if the ability to laugh at ourselves is an indication of growing up, surely those lovely lady garment workers have proved it to the hilt in Pins and Needles.

The novel, I venture to think, is on the whole an accurate index of modern life, and in the contemporary novel today we find the same indication of a more developed consciousness of our own environment and problems. We have but to compare the mild correctness of William Dean Howells to Look Homeward Angel or the Grapes of Wrath, with the intense awareness implicit in these two books of the American destiny.

American artists are no longer day-dreaming, building little sentimental arcadias in which to escape the tough and ugly facts littered about their feet. The impulse of the American artist to escape did not, I am convinced, arise so much from the crudity and ugliness of those same facts as from his own inability to face them. His ancestor had come to the new country to be free from the ancient culture which bound him to Europe. But as the trees were felled and the pastures cleared and the frontiers pushed away the memory of that culture took an unsubstantial but dear place in his mind. The longing of the spirit was in retrospect, feeding on memories. The standard was of the past, looking back to the form since the substance was too dim for memory to recreate. Pioneer thinking, American thinking, necessarily became timid and conservative, based on a culture of which the roots had been cut, and replaced by a violent and adventurous foreground, and no relief of familiar racial background.

How could the artist help suffering? He remembered, or remembered what he had been told, and imitated and tried to get away; and his nostalgia produced little that was native or vigorous. There were of course many striking exceptions, men who found inspiration in their own present, who were free from the influence of a past which was never really their own—Walt Whitman, Melville, Eakins, Winslow Homer, Mark Twain. And even they often felt the influence of an alien and disturbing culture which would not let them be themselves. Van Wycke Brooks has pointed out Mark Twain's dependence upon the point of view as to what was correct, expressed by his wife and by William Dean Howells, who tried to prevent him from publishing Huckleberry Finn as something common and unworthy of his genius. What kept Twain from becoming a greater, more universal satirist, Brooks felt, was his timorous pioneer fear of middle-class public opinion.

Since the rise of Fascist Germany, and more particularly during these last months of the war, I detect another characteristic of our national attitude which has flowered up quickly to the surface, but which for that reason is no less permanent. I refer to the passionate hatred of authoritarian creeds, and the profound insistence on freedom to speak and to vote and to live as we please. This is far more than lip service to an outworn creed, or the repetition of some ancient dogma. We have been profoundly shaken and troubled by what has occurred in the totalitarian states, although there is much confusion as to the causes which have brought these things about. We ourselves are engaged in an immensely important struggle to offset the inequalities and disharmonies which a blind and ruthless industrial development has apparently caused. We have come to realize that the democratic processes, negatively conceived, left to themselves, will solve nothing, but will themselves disappear before the directed forces which today oppose them, and which, like evil genii spring from the monstrous confusion of mechanistic living which we have permitted to surround and dominate our lives. We should not identify the increase of Government power with the loss of individual liberty. One may, but need not, accompany the other. It is not the power in itself that is the test, but the fields in which it is exercised and the ends for which it is used. For the strong arm of government may be thrust out to protect freedom of worship, of the press, of assemblage—or it may be used to suppress and destroy those things which we hold precious. An authority cannot be held oppressive which is drawn against crimes that the community has declared to be such, if that community is itself based on an honest suffrage and a respect for minorities. But where the police of the state is used, under cover of the protection of property or keeping the peace, to give expression to class prejudices or religious hatreds, government becomes a vehicle of suppression and death. Democracy must be a tool, a way of living, as well as an ideal. It cannot be passive in an active world.

Our growth to maturity in what I shall call social thinking, for want of a more convenient phrase, is still chaotic and undisciplined. We are too near the frontier to rid ourselves of the dislike of control and the contempt for community activity which most of the rest of the civilized world has long ago accepted. The test of our growth, the mark of our manhood as a Nation in the immediate future, will be, in my opinion, our ability to accept as an inevitable condition of our world today the certainty that more freedom for the human spirit must and inevitably will be accompanied by a greater regulation and control of those things which tend to smother that freedom; and that our problem is not to resist government, but to use it for our own ends and for whatever common purpose we can build together. For government, however it is expressed—National, State-wide, local, or regional—is but a common purpose and a common will. It is not something outside ourselves, or alien to our ideals. It is what we make it. We can despise our Government, and make it feeble, and a thing of contempt, incapable of coping with these forces which we have bred, and watch them destroy our society because we are not strong enough for united effort. Or we can knit it into something strong and honest, and subservient to our own desires. But we may be sure of this that whatever way we treat it, our attitude toward our Government will do much to condition its quality and to shape its course. If we were not always calling it inefficient, in a sort of scornful game, it would have less chance of becoming so. If we were prouder of its great achievements, more would be wrought to meet our pride. We can create in it a splendid living energy from our own insistent dreams; or we can narrow it to as small a compass as the definition of our own dislike.

Lewis Mumford in The Culture of Cities has spoken of the most critical problem of human society today as that of diminishing the role of the power state and enlarging the role of the service state. "The real alternative to the empty political patterns of the nineteenth century lies," he writes, "not in totalitarianism, but in just the opposite of this: the restoration of the human scale in government, the multiplication of the units of autonomous service, the widening of the cooperative processes of government, the general reduction of the area of arbitrary compulsion, the restoration of the processes of persuasion and rational agreement." Examples of service government today are found in the work among farmers by the Department of Agriculture to effect crop control; the widely diversified services of the T. V. A. in the Tennessee Valley basin; and, in the international field, reciprocal-trade agreements.

I have discussed our national maturing in terms of an individual, but the analogy is an over-simplification and may be misleading. By maturity I do not mean to imply any particular level of civilization, but simply the sloughing off of a childish state of mind, the emergence from the day dreaming of magic formulates into a world of reality. Nor do I wish to imply that we are living in that world today. But we are nearer to it, and our youth, disillusioned about the past, skeptical of the present, are nearer to maturity than the older generations. I do not see signs that they have lost any of the zest for life which is sometimes the price of aging. On the contrary, they see better than we did what they want, they are more conscious of realities, the threadbare ancient symbols like patriotism and honor and humanity will no longer betray them as they betrayed us. They are perhaps tragically dislocated, but they are far better equipped than we for making over the world as it must be made over.

In the maturing process to which I have referred, I do not think that the homespun American virtues have been lost or forgotten; they have been cleansed, no doubt, and have emerged tougher, more universal, less literary as we have grown into a nation. And of late we have become doubly conscious of them. In a poem called Plain Chant for America, published last August in the Ladies Home Journal, Katherine Garrison Chapin has beautifully expressed something of the American dream:

"For the dream unfinished
Out of which we came,
We stand together,
While a hemisphere darkens
And the nations flame.

No dark signs close the doors of our speaking,
No bayonets bar the door to our prayers,
No gun butts shadow our children's eyes.

Freedom is salt in our blood and its bone shape;
If freedom fails, we'll fight for more freedom—
This is the land, and there are the years.
When freedom's a whisper above their ashes
An absolute word cut on their graves.

Let them remember that here on the western Horizon a star, once acclaimed, has not set;
And the strength of a hope, and the shape of a vision
Died for and sung for and fought for,
And worked for,
Is living yet."

Mr. GIBBS. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following:

Be it resolved by the Altamaha Post, No. 26, American Legion, Department of Georgia,

First. That the United States of America furnish the British all necessary aid in the form of supplies such as food, ammunition, airplanes, destroyers, and tanks, or anything they need except our Army or Navy.

Second. That this Government refrain from sending men to fight on foreign soil unless the United States becomes in danger from invasion.

Third. That our Army and Navy be increased to sufficient strength to protect the Western Hemisphere.

Fourth. That the sale of arms and ammunition to aliens be stopped and that all aliens be forbidden to possess arms or ammunition.

To have all American citizens put in the positions that are now held by people that are partial to any foreign governments who want to undermine our form of government; also not to allow anyone to speak over the radio that tries to undermine our Government because it does not correspond to the government of foreign nations that they believe in.

The Geyer Amendment

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE M. GRANT

OF ALABAMA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

Mr. GRANT of Alabama. Mr. Speaker, I wish it were possible for me to discuss this amendment in full. However, the limited time does not permit such a discussion. If the time were available, I would be glad to go into the constitutionality of this infamous piece of legislation. I think it is sufficient to say that the proponents hope that if the amendment is enacted into law that the Supreme Court of the United States will uphold it on the theory that it is a so-called liberal measure. I do not agree with this, because the qualification of voters is a matter that rests entirely in the hands of the sovereign States.

Voting is not a right, it is a privilege that can be granted or withheld by the States. Regardless of the constitutionality of this measure, we should look to its motives and see what is behind it. I think that we will all agree that it is a thrust at the South. I am not arguing the right or feasibility of poll tax, but the American doctrine of State rights. Of course, the proponents may claim that any means to obtain an end is proper. If poll taxes should be abolished in the States where they are now required, why not let each State settle its own internal affairs? Several of the Southern States have abolished the poll tax. Talk about this being a democratic measure, I say that it is very undemocratic. It has no place in a republican form of government. Let us here and now decide whether we want to abolish all States and have a totalitarian form of government where every citizen must look to Washington.

The proponents of this amendment are unsound in their argument. They talk about a democracy. Does Germany, Russia, Italy, and many other countries that might be named, have a poll tax? No, they do not.

Let us see just how fair the proponents of this measure are in attempting to put this amendment across. A charge has been made upon this floor from time to time that some Members from the South were elected by a small number of votes. Anyone with any degree of intelligence about political history in this Nation knows that elections in the South are decided in the primaries. Few of the Democrats go to the polls in general elections except Presidential elections. Yet a Democrat has offered this amendment.

How many times have you found the Democrats of the South attempting to interfere in the local affairs of other States? In my own State, for instance, there is a requirement that a nominee receive a majority of the votes cast in an election. Some of the States in other parts of the Nation nominate and elect their Congressmen upon a plurality basis. It is possible that many of the Representatives here today are here because they received a plurality vote. It is entirely possible that Members can be elected from those States where they only receive a small part of the total vote cast. Yet do you hear any of us trying to change your method of election? You do not.

This amendment is introduced at this time under the guise of having something to do with clean politics. It has nothing whatsoever to do with it. Politics are as clean in States where the poll tax is collected as in States where it is not. The privilege of voting is not derived from the Federal Government but from the respective State governments. No one has claimed before this measure came up that voting is a right. Voting is a privilege, and it is a privilege that the respective States can grant or withhold at their discretion.

If you pass this amendment, why in the not-too-far distance cannot Washington say we have decided that the States have no say-so and let us abolish voting altogether? I love my State; I am not afraid of all of its citizens voting, but I am afraid of the motives behind this bill. These crusaders who take a holier-than-thou attitude should first sweep the yard around their own front door.

Why this amendment at this time? I will tell you the reason. The sponsor of this amendment has a bill now pending of like nature before the House Judiciary Committee. Hearings have been held upon this bill, and it is realized that the type of testimony given by witnesses before that committee was not any too impressive. I do not say that this applies to all of these witnesses, as there were some well-intentioned and misled witnesses, but I do say that many of the witnesses were members of radical organizations. The spokesman for one organization saw fit to attack southern Members of Congress and to charge that if this bill were law that they would not be in Congress. He made a most uncalled-for attack upon the distinguished gentleman from Virginia who heads the Merchant Marine and Fishery Committee of the House, because this gentleman has dared to take the stand that this Government of ours has some right in its own ships. This same organization has recently condemned the President and charged him with preparing to make a "blitzkrieg" because he proposed that the Immigration and Naturalization Service be transferred from the Department of Labor to the Department of Justice. This organization has also charged that the Department of Justice is notoriously antilabor in all of its actions. It has also condemned Congress because it dared bar certain people from W. P. A. relief. It also condemns the registration and fingerprinting of aliens, or any conscription plan.

What other organizations are favoring this plan? The National Youth Congress and its allied organizations, including the Young Communist Movement. I could name other radical organizations that are demanding that the Federal Government attempt to punish the South.

Who else is taking the lead in the States of Alabama, Georgia, and Mississippi for this notorious un-American bill? It is the Communist Party of district 17 comprising these three States. The only letter that I have received from my State requesting that this measure be enacted is from the Communist Party.

What other Member of Congress was attacked in the Judiciary Committee? The distinguished gentleman from Texas who heads the committee on un-American activities. Why? Because he dared to take the lead in a crusade against un-American elements several years ago before many of us realized the condition that we were in. A distinguished gentleman from Georgia was also attacked because he dared rise upon the floor of this House and condemn un-American activities in this Nation. The charge was made before the committee that if the Federal Government would abolish poll taxes in these States these gentlemen would not serve in Congress. I want to say here and now that this is untrue. These gentlemen are rendering a patriotic duty to their country, and I would have no fear of their being elected from any State in the Nation.

This to me is one thing that this Congress should take note of. That witnesses came before a committee of this House and asked that a bill of this nature be passed in order to get rid of Members of this body. If any of you want to vote for this amendment with this idea in view, let me tell you now that these gentlemen will continue to serve their districts, States, and Nation as long as they wish, regardless of any poll-tax measure.

I am not here to argue that the amounts charged for poll tax are the correct amounts that should be charged, but if they are not, there is a way to remedy this, and that is by State legislation. If this measure were adopted, some supporters would later come back and make objection to any educational requirement that the State might set up. They would, also, make objection against any requirements as to residence in the State before voting. The question of voting is a matter of education and not one of poll-tax requirement.

While men and women are dying and being driven from their homes in other lands and their destinies being brought under a government farther away from home, it is time that we carefully analyze any measure that would further invade our States.

Some people are so afraid that others will not think that they are liberal, they want to say that "I am more liberal than you." I say to you as one who is deeply interested in the future of this great Nation that the adoption of this amendment will not aid the South.

Those from afar who wish to further penalize the South and take this great section under their protective wings would be rendering a greater service to their country during this emergency if they would confine their activities to matters in their own districts, and lend a helping hand in driving from these shores those who do not believe in our form of government.

Mr. Willkie's Repudiation of Republican Members of the Ways and Means Committee on Trade Agreements

OF

HON. JOHN D. DINGELL

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

Mr. DINGELL. Mr. Speaker, I can well understand why my genial friend from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] opposed the nomination of Mr. Wendell Willkie, and, according to newspaper accounts, signed a petition against his nomination. Mr. Willkie, in two recent articles, the April issue of Fortune Magazine, and the Saturday Evening Post of June 22, came out strongly for the trade-agreements program, which some minority members of my committee stated would be an important issue this fall. As a matter of fact, in the Fortune Magazine article Mr. Willkie pays Secretary Hull a compliment on account of his methods of carrying out the trade-agreements program. According to newspaper accounts some of my Republican friends have characterized Mr. Willkie as "just a free-trade Democrat." That might help to elect him President if he did not have so many Republican handicaps.

The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] should not feel lonesome, for the position on trade agreements of everyone of his Republican colleagues on our committee have likewise been repudiated by Mr. Willkie. I am not surprised that the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. KNUTSON] said, according to press reports, that a number of Republicans would be defeated on trade agreements if Mr. Willkie should be nominated. I think the gentleman is right about it.

Of course, they have already begun to squirm and twist and console themselves because they think, and possibly hope, that Mr. Hitler has made trade agreements a dead issue. The reactionary G. O. P. Press has already begun to rationalize that Mr. Willkie sees eye to eye with opponents of reciprocity.

My colleague, the gentleman from Michigan [Mr. WOODRUFF] has also attempted to rationalize and explain away Mr. Willkie's known and recorded approval of Secretary Hull's trade-agreements program. He states:

> It has come almost to be accepted in the public mind that the Republican Party is opposed to reciprocity and foreign trade.

I think the public is exactly right in concluding that the Republican Party is opposed to real reciprocity. Only five Republican Members of the House stood with Mr. Willkie when the continuation of reciprocity was last voted upon.

In the statement of the gentleman from Michigan, Mr. WOODRUFF, appearing in the Appendix of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, p. 4377, he attempts to indicate that Mr. Willkie is opposed to the most-favored-nation principle of those agreements. He emphasized Mr. Willkie's statement regarding "two nations." I want to call attention to Mr. Willkie's statement in Fortune Magazine for April 1940—and I hope he has not shifted his position on such a fundamental question since that time—for he spoke of two countries negotiating an agreement and then significantly said:

This agreement is then extended to apply to other countries too. What could be simpler or more in accordance with common sense? What could be better qualified to benefit us, the people, as a whole?

For the benefit of my colleague and others, I insert the following statement of Mr. Willkie from Fortune Magazine:

Now, obviously, it will not do for one great nation to become a free-trade country by itself. For the United States to erase its tariffs all at once would be ruinous to our people and many of our industries. The present Secretary of State, Cordell Hull, who is wise and temperate, realizes this. And so he adopted the reciprocal-trade agreements as a step toward increasing our foreign business gradually. Under this policy the United States takes up the problem of tariffs with each country separately; lists the products that it would like to export; studies a similar list submitted by the other country; and then a deal is arranged, each country making such concessions as it can with the least possible harm and the most possible benefit to its own people. This agreement is then extended to apply to other countries, too. What could be simpler or more in accord with common sense? What could be better qualified to benefit us, the people, as a whole? Of course, we have to make sacrifices. But the point is that, owing to the way the agreements are negotiated, the sacrifices are always, and should always be, less than the benefits gained. That is, we, the people, profit.

I want to remind those who take the position that trade agreements are out the window, that agreements are still wholly or partially in effect with Finland, Sweden, Switzerland, and the United Kingdom. I want to remind them that the agreement is still in effect with Canada, as well as all of those which have been negotiated with Latin-American countries.

I should like to further remind them that there are still obvious possibilities of opening up trade and lowering tariff barriers in keeping with the principles of this program. Furthermore, the principles of trade agreements will serve as a basis for a better economic peace than was indicated in the Fordney-McCumber and Hawley-Smoot Tariff Acts. So it is a little early to relegate trade agreements to the "heaven of forgotten issues," as Mr. Hoover stated in his speech which apparently relegated him to the "heaven of forgotten politicians."

I challenge the good sense and patriotism of those who are ready to concede a complete world victory to Hitler and who seem willing to surrender, without a fight, to his totalitarian system of trade for America. Secretary Hull, who is not so easily bluffed out of our American system of trade, is taking steps to protect our commerce.

I am glad that my colleague from Michigan inserted at least a part of the foreign trade and tariff plank of the Republican platform in the RECORD. I want to call attention to what a Republican newspaper, the Washington Post, said of this plank which was particularly critical of the way trade agreements have been negotiated.

Particularly inaccurate is the reference to "one-man tariff making." Anyone familiar with the Hull reciprocal trade agreements knows that they were carefully negotiated by experts after hearings and extensive analyses of domestic industries affected. The cause of intelligent debate on vital issues would have been better served if the resolutions committee had concentrated its attention on clarification of its own position on tariffs and foreign trade.

Return of the Wright Airplane to the United States

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HARRY R. SHEPPARD

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, I am introducing a resolution which, in my opinion, has much merit and I feel that the entire membership of this House is vitally interested in aviation, its past, present, and future.

I further wish to call to your attention the notice of an association meeting held in Washington, D. C., Friday, May 31, 1940, by the Wilbur Wright Federal Hangar No. 1, National Aviation Day Association, Inc., which have unanimously endorsed the following resolution with respectful request that favorable consideration be given the contents thereof and signed by Walter Moore Royal, Jr., president, Wilbur Wright Federal Hangar No. 1:

SATURDAY, JUNE 1, 1940.

The national body concurred unanimously with Wilbur Wright Federal Hangar No. 1, and also respectfully request that favorable consideration be given this resolution.

JOHN J. CRIM,
Chairman, National Aviation Day Association, Inc.

Joint resolution

Return of the Wright airplane to the United States of America, to be placed on permanent exhibition, under such conditions as may be jointly approved by Mr. Wright and the Congress.

Whereas the American public has, long since, come to an acceptance of the fact that the Wright brothers were the first to successfully fly a heavier-than-air machine, and

Whereas the symbol of American aviation supremacy—the Wright airplane which made the first flight at Kitty Hawk—now reposes, on exhibition, in a British Museum, and

Whereas war-time conditions abroad, today, render it possible that this plane may be destroyed, or damaged irreparably, by air raids, or other acts of war, and

Whereas American pride requests that this plane be returned to the United States, in order that the present generation and posterity, may have visible proof of the marvelous progress made in aviation, since the historic flight at Kitty Hawk on December 17, 1903: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved, That the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled request Mr. Orville Wright—only living founder of aviation—to arrange to have this first-to-fly plane restored to the United States; to be placed on permanent exhibition, under such conditions as may be jointly approved by Mr. Wright and the Congress.

RESOLUTION OF THE CONNECTICUT NATIONAL GUARD

Mr. SMITH of Connecticut. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following resolution adopted by the Connecticut National Guard at their annual convention held Saturday, June 15, at Hartford, Conn.:

NATIONAL GUARD ASSOCIATION OF CONNECTICUT,
Hartford, Conn., June 15, 1940.

Whereas the present international situation clearly indicates the immediate necessity for expansion of our national-defense program, and

Whereas the availability of the National Guard to serve has sometimes been the subject of comment: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the National Guard Association of Connecticut assembled in its annual convention at Hartford, June 15, 1940, reiterates its entire willingness to render whatever service, wherein competent authority may require; this in keeping with the history and tradition of the Connecticut National Guard.

Service in the Guard has always entailed personal sacrifice on the part of its members but we stand ready now as always and cheerfully to make whatever personal sacrifice this situation may demand.

We respectfully urge that immediate authority be given the National Guard to recruit to peace strength; that every step possible be taken to expedite the full and complete equipment of the National Guard; and if active service is contemplated, the National Guard be given an extended period of field training in preparation for such contingency.

We respectfully urge the Adjutant General of Connecticut to transmit this resolution to all proper persons.

J. M. QUINN,
Lieutenant Colonel, One Hundred and Second Infantry.
RAYMOND WATT,
Lieutenant Colonel, Two Hundred and Forty-second Coast Artillery (Headquarters).

Captain, Two Hundred and Forty-second Coast Artillery (Headquarters), Secretary.

A Few Thoughts on Preparedness

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLARE E. HOFFMAN
OF MICHIGAN
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Wednesday, July 10, 1940

CONSCRIPTION

Mr. HOFFMAN. Mr. Speaker, to Congress shortly will come a compulsory military training bill. It requires the registration of all male citizens between 18 and 65. It directs the President "as soon as possible to select for training and service, such number of men as in his judgment, whether a state of war exists or not, are required in the national interest."

Read that again. Authority in peacetime to draft anyone and everyone between 18 and 65. The first to be drafted undoubtedly will be those between 21 and 31, to serve for such time and in such places and manner as the President may direct.

LOOKING FOR TROUBLE

Do you get what that means? The national administration has been threatening and blustering, warning European nations to stay out of the Western Hemisphere. The press reports Germany has a submarine base in Uruguay. Great Britain is blockading Martinique in the Caribbean. Are soldiers, marines, and the Navy to be sent to drive them out?

With Hitler winning in the Old World and the President pointing out the ease with which even Omaha might be blown to dust, there is every need for preparedness for national defense. Inevitably, that means not only the industrial production of munitions of war, but the training of men.

MILITARY TRAINING

Training of some sort, both industrial and military, we must have. The kind and the amount of training should under no circumstances be left to Franklin D. Roosevelt. He and his advisers are too closely affiliated with subversive groups. Communists and those sympathetic to Communists are no safe teachers for American youth nor guardians of our freedom.

MARCHING OFF TO WAR

First to be conscripted would be the white-collar men, professional men, accountants, clerks; then farmer boys. Under the present plan, the last—workers in essential industries. And here is the viciousness of the present scheme. Many essential industries have been organized by the C. I. O., which, in turn, has many leaders who are either Communists or lean in that direction. They would be the last to go.

While loyal Americans are conscripted, serve for $30 a month and keep, the Communists, their "red" sympathizers and workers in industry would be safe at home, drawing pay as high as $2 an hour, with time and a half for overtime.

JUSTICE TO ALL

If we are to have conscription let us make it universal, and, if you, a doctor, a lawyer, a clerk, a merchant, a farm worker, are to be drafted for military training, then add to the law a provision that will require every factory worker—yes, and every public official, including Congressmen—to serve at their jobs for a like period and for the same pay the conscript draws during his time of service.

NONSENSE? ABSURD?

Do I hear you say? Perhaps. But think it over. It is not as silly as it seems and it certainly would be just and equitable. Neither justice nor patriotism requires the drafting of one man from his home, his business, his community life, to serve this Government, protecting the rest of us, giving him but a nominal wage, while permitting all others to profiteer, either through excessive wages or excessive profits.

SOMETHING OF A SHOCK, ISN'T IT?

To suggest that you and I, who will not be drafted, should take $30 a month and "keep," while our friends and neighbors are taking compulsory military training? But, at that, many of us would prefer to stay at home rather than to endure the hardships of training and the danger of fighting.

PLANLESS SPENDING

Apparently the New Deal theory of spending for the sake of spending is to apply to our national-defense program. The expenditure of $5,000,000,000 has been authorized. This week will see the authorization of another $4,000,000,000 and another request for $5,000,000,000 more is coming. Fourteen billion dollars—fourteen thousand million. Everyone familiar with the situation knows that sum cannot be wisely and intelligently spent within the next 6 years.

The authorization of such expenditures is a sort of a bluff. What we need, before we either authorize or spend additional millions, is a sane plan for spending, which will give us results.

Speaking figuratively, leaves can be raked under a defense program as well as under a "more abundant life" program. The difference is that the latter just wasted our money. Boondoggling with the defense program may cost us our national existence.

That we have already swallowed more than we can digest is evidenced by a multitude of instances. Just one from home. The Benton Harbor Chamber of Commerce writes that it has young men ready for apprenticeship training in aviation; that its many requests to Mr. C. E. Cox, of Chicago, Ill., upon instructions of the Civil Aeronautics Authority have gone unanswered.

Nothing is gained by frightening the Nation, stirring our people up to a high pitch of patriotic endeavor and then leaving them dangling in the air for the want of adequate facilities for training.

OUR DUTY

It is the duty of Republican and conservative Democratic Congressmen to insist that they be advised of what is proposed; that the proposed program be sensible, capable of being carried out, and that those entrusted with its execution be patriotic Americans with but one idea in mind—service to the Nation. To such a duty it is my purpose as a Representative to devote myself.

Greenland From 1898 to Now

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN
OF MINNESOTA
IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES
Wednesday, July 10 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

ARTICLE BY ROBERT A. BARTLETT

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, in connection with our national defense, I find a very able article in the National Geographic Magazine of July 1940, written by Capt. Robert A. Bartlett, who went north with Admiral Peary. The article is entitled "Greenland From 1898 to Now." In the article appears a discussion of this great island in connection with our national defense. Among other things the following statement is made:

The present war (the first World War) has shown us most strikingly how far flung may be the regions having a bearing on the struggle.

Great Britain's coaling station in the Falklands spelled destruction for Germany's squadron of commerce destroyers. Russia's port of Archangel (Arkhangelsk) has been an invaluable gateway for her. Greenland in our hands may be a valuable piece of our defensive armor. In the hands of a hostile interest it could be a serious menace.

This article is written by an explorer who has personally been over the ground with Admiral Peary. I think it ought to be given close attention in connection with our coast defenses. I ask unanimous consent that it be inserted in the Appendix.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From National Geographic Magazine for July 1940]

GREENLAND FROM 1898 TO NOW—"CAPTAIN BOB," WHO WENT NORTH WITH PEARY, TELLS OF 42 YEARS OF EXPLORATION IN THE ORPHAN ISLAND OF NEW AERIAL AND NAVAL INTEREST

(By Robert A. Bartlett)

The first voyage I made to Greenland was in 1898 with Admiral, then Commander, Robert E. Peary in the old Windward. At that time the "island of desolation," as people used to call it, was just a jumping-off place for the North Pole, and I hardly expected to see the day when it would be anything else.

Since that first visit I have made more than 30 exploratory trips to Greenland in the last 15 years, taking with me on my schooner Effie M. Morrissey lads from the preparatory schools and colleges and gathering data and specimens for the Smithsonian Institution and other scientific societies, as well as birds and animals for zoos.

I have observed the development of the country's resources under the intelligent management of Denmark; have seen the Eskimos gradually adopting white men's ways of living; and have learned that the snow fields of the ice cap, the open land along the shore, and the sheltered fjords provide excellent landing fields for airplanes and hide-outs for war vessels.

Each summer Danish ships have brought tools, foodstuffs, and clothing to the people of Greenland. Who will furnish these supplies now?

To keep the United States Government informed on conditions on the "orphan island," Mr. James K. Penfield has been appointed the first American consul to Greenland. On May 10 last, accompanied by Mr. George L. West as vice consul, he sailed on the U. S. cutter Comanche for Godthaab.

AN ISLAND WITHOUT A COUNTRY

When Germany entered Denmark, the question arose whether this "protectorate" extends to Denmark's island of Greenland, and, if it does, what the effect will be on North Americans.

The answer, it seems to me, is found in geography. If military forces come to Greenland, they will find a diverse island, beautiful, amazing, difficult, icebound; yet a place which might very well serve as a year-round base for air operations and in summer for maneuvers by sea and land.

The distance from the west coast of Greenland to Cape Dyer, Canada, is less than 200 miles, and northern Greenland is only 12 to 14 miles from Ellesmere Island. It is only 200 miles as the sea bird flies from Greenland to Iceland, and from there 500 miles to the British Isles, 625 to Norway.

Thus, while Greenland belongs to North America, it is actually a convenient stepping-stone for airplanes flying to this continent from Europe.

Before I set down my notes of specific voyages, I wish I could put on paper the wonder and bafflement I felt when, as a newcomer to the north, on my original Peary expedition, I saw the picture of just what Greenland comprises.

First, it is an island, the largest in the world, and one of the most sparsely inhabited. In the interior is the vast, forbidding waste of ice which has been accumulating in mystery and splendor since the beginning of time, or, at any rate, since blind Nature in the glacial period set her inscrutable machinery to work.

A MAMMOTH ICE CAKE

It is more than three times as big as Texas. But a good four-fifths of its 827,300 square miles lies mute and frozen beneath the ice cap which has filled the dead valleys and made them level with the mountain tops.

All the visible land of Greenland is a sort of uncovered band, stretching about the coast, 4 to 20 miles wide, but in a few places widening to as much as 112 miles on the west coast and to 180 or so on the east coast.

Interior Greenland today is a majestic plateau of ice. Over this plateau in the old Peary days, we made our sledge journeys across the icecap a full 6,000 feet above the level of the sea. What sleds from the sky may alight there soon I can only conjecture.

The snow of the Arctic has not changed, nor have the ice-locked mountains of Greenland; but the changes which have come over the Eskimos are profound.

In the old days Peary compared the Greenland Eskimos as he had found them on his first trips, with the Eskimos as he left them when the great venture of the North Pole had been won. Peary said that on his arrival in Greenland few Eskimo men had a knife and few women a needle—a steel needle, of course, he meant. Bone needles they fashioned for themselves from animal bones.

Few of these isolated Cape York, Greenland, Eskimos had kayaks, or skin boats, and the man who had a spear or a harpoon shaft made of a single piece of wood was rich. But when Peary said good-bye to Cape York and his Eskimo friends, he left them almost miraculously wealthy—for Cape York.

There were knives and needles of steel, and almost every man and half-grown boy had a kayak. They also had seal spears and sledges and wood for lance making. The wealth that Peary scattered in tools produced other wealth, until the Cape York Eskimos were improved in every phase of their lives.

They had all the food they could use; their better weapons saw to that. They had many more dogs and better dogs. And the improved diet showed, in the years during which Peary took observations, a marked decrease in the death rate and a sharp rise in the birth rate.

All of this Peary noted with pride and a warm heart, for he loved these sturdy, independent men of his North.

WHITE MEN'S WAYS AND THE ESKIMOS

What, I often wonder, would the great Peary say if he could observe the Greenland Eskimos we see each summer when the boys of the Morrissey fare forth again along the water highways sailed by him?

In place of the old-fashioned stone igloos of the early expeditions, he would see Eskimo houses of wood. In them he would hear the blare of the radio and the monotonous droning of the gramophone.

Where, 40 years ago, Peary saw Eskimos eating a soup of seal meat and seal innards, with a porridge composed of the ground bones of animals—happily smacking their lips and rubbing their bellies—today he would see them in store clothes dropping in at the trading post to buy the white man's tea and coffee and imported biscuit.

Instead of the old animal-skin boots, patiently sewed by Eskimo women from skins their men had taken from the animals they had killed, the Admiral would see his brown friends pull on knee-high rubber boots on a wet day, or store-made leather boots for dry weather.

One of my boys, R. F. Dove, during the 1936 expedition, made a rather careful study of the Smith Sound Eskimo, who lives between Greenland and Ellesmere Island, with special regard to "tuberculosis and the sun." Sadly enough, this white man's disease has come to Peary's Eskimos, together with the white man's tobacco and devitalized flour.

DRIFTWOOD FOR HOUSES

The kind of house an Eskimo builds depends almost entirely on its location. In east Greenland, the section we studied in 1939, native homes are built of Canadian driftwood. Rivers draining down from the Canadian northwest, a richly forested section, bring quantities of driftwood dancing along the tides. These rivers empty into the Polar Basin and their water is carried around the north of Greenland, thence down the east coast by the Arctic current.

Thus, the east Greenland Eskimo has plenty of lumber for his house, though the houses we studied used only a small amount in the roof.

But only a little driftwood travels along the currents around Cape Farewell, or up the west coast. Consequently, the Smith Sound Eskimo builds for his house a stone igloo.

The roof is made of flat stones, with a back slope. The house is about 12 feet wide in front. The height just permits a man not too tall to stand upright. A narrow house passage 8 feet long or so forms the entrance. A low platform of stone fills the back of the house completely.

Dry grass is laid on the stone and on this are piled many soft bear or reindeer skins.

Then, above the passage, at the front of the house, is the single "window" made of gut. Through this the light filters weakly.

This Eskimo house is a jolly, familiar, sociable affair. As in the Bible, the Eskimo father may explain, "My children are with me in bed," for the platform is the family bed by night, and the family chair, table, and drawing room by day. I nearly omitted ventilation—a puncture in the roof about the size of a man's arm, in which in time of storm or high wind is placed a sod which stops all chance of air circulation.

In Smith Sound the Eskimos who live in houses like this have 4 months of almost continual sunshine. Then 2 months of alternating sun and twilight preface the winter darkness.

During this third period, for 3½ months, they see no sun at all. And, in these months, the white man's germs and the white man's tuberculosis arise and flourish.

HOUSEHOLD HEAT—AND SMELLS

Certain rather interesting facts turned up as the Danish doctors considered the rise of tuberculosis among the Eskimos. First, the investigators exploded our old idea that the Eskimo by nature is capable of bearing more intense cold than white men. If he does so, the authorities concluded, it is because he dresses for the cold and eats fat, fuel-charged foods to stand him in stead during his extreme winter.

When this theory seemed to be established, however, the contradictory fact was revealed that the Eskimo can stand a degree of heat in which white men wilt and suffer.

Nobody can fully imagine the heat and the smells of an Eskimo house quite so realistically as the man who has borne the heat and smelled the smells. The houses are heated by seal-oil lamps. These are rather flat stone vessels with wide moss wicks which, when properly trimmed, burn the seal oil with a wide, white flame. The heat in the house becomes tropic—and so hygiene perishes in the midst of food scattered about among the fur skins, of dogs here and there, of all too little attention to sanitation. When tuberculosis comes into an Eskimo settlement, it runs rampant.

In the old Peary days such a germ would not have been so serious, for the Eskimos then lived in stone igloos which they abandoned from season to season; or in houses which, grown damp in spring, could have their roofs lifted to let in all the bright and cleansing sunlight from the generous heavens.

But when wood was substituted for stone blocks, making the house a permanent year-round dwelling, the evil was done. Deterioration and disease clamped down upon men who were experiencing a particular scourge for the first time in the history of their race.

For this reason the Danish Government barred all visitors to Greenland except reputable scientific expeditions.

In the Peary days no wild animal was beyond the skill of the Eskimo, though the hunter was armed only with the most primitive weapons.

Then came firearms. One result was the destruction of herds of animals—needless and wasteful destruction. Initiative, independence, the old upstanding qualities of the Peary Eskimo, seemed to pass.

RESOURCES OF GREENLAND

Probably nobody yet knows the economic possibilities of Greenland, but the known resources, for 900 years since the outlaw Eric visited the island, have kept merchants and traders busy with a fairly rich commerce plying between Europe and the largest ice-locked island in the world.

On my first trip to Greenland, Admiral Peary told me that when men set out on the Crusades, ivory from walrus and narwhal tusks was sent to Europe as the pious gift of Greenland Christians.

Salt fish, seal, and cod oil, sealskins, eider down, ivory (the tusks of walrus and narwhal) and furs, blue and white fox, have for long years formed a large part of the trade between Greenland and Denmark. Later, cryolite mines were developed in southwest Greenland. The town of Ivigtut came into being, as did many a boom town and city of our own mining West.

Ivigtut, the port, is near the cryolite mines, and cryolite is one of the most unusual minerals in nature. Chemists tell us that cryolite is a sodium-aluminum fluoride. It looks like hard-packed snow. And where it is found, almost exclusively at Ivigtut in Greenland, other bright-tinted minerals more or less nameless occur along with the cryolite.

The known mineral wealth of Greenland is not extensive. In addition to cryolite, there are coal mines on Disko Island; also some coal has turned up recently on the east coast. Graphite is abundant near Upernavik, and copper has been observed in a few places.

FRONT PORCH OF NORTH AMERICA

But I must come back to Greenland as the next stop to North America. Peary told me this one, too, one night when we were gathered in his cabin aboard the Hope after we of the Windward had made rendezvous with him at Cape York.

Leif, he said, son of Eric the Outlaw, the real discoverer of Greenland, used the island as a base for his visit to North America.

In the early days of Greenland's history the far-venturing Norsemen had seemingly colonized Greenland in fairly large numbers. Old records tell us how, after the black death in Europe, a brace of enemy ships bore down upon Greenland and spirited away many colonists to make up for Europeans laid low by the terrible scourge.

Whether this is fact or fable, the ancient Norse who possessed Greenland before the Danes came in left behind the remains of stables, churches, and houses, and seemingly some sort of Nordic town meeting house to bear witness to that first colonization.

The watchful Danish Government has guarded the old ruins with antiquarian jealousy; but the ruins may still be visited—or could be up to the 1939 trip of the Morrissey.

In southern Greenland near Julianehaab are the ruins of Eriksfjord, now called Tunugdliarfik.

Beyond a high range of hills separating two sides of a fjord the ancient town of Brattahlid had its day not so far from its sister town of Gardar. To this day the boys of my little Morrissey may see the aged church—its walls, at any rate—hoary and in rather good repair, gray against the green hillside of southern Greenland.

On shore the remains take on more of the appearance of ruin. Up and about the sturdy stone walls the whortleberry, the juniper shrub, small willow trees, and many species of vine and weed, entangled, keep company with such familiar American wild flowers as buttercups and dandelions.

TRACKS OF NORSE CIVILIZATION

When I went exploring, years ago, about the ruins of the hoary old Norse town of Kakortok at Julianehaab, it wasn't so hard to grasp the picture of an old and orderly life under the Norse back in the days when all the implements of the "blitzkrieg" still slept in the limbo of evil things not yet conceived.

Stumbling about among the ruins, in that year at the turn of the century, and, later, with my boys on one of the Morrissey expeditions, I examined the remnants of the church and two other buildings, wall enclosed, whose outlines were no vague imagination. They were there for us to trace.

Some of the walls rise to fully 10 feet. I imagined a triangular bit standing above the main wall had probably been a gable. And here and there I was sure the cement used to put the stones of the walls together had been made of native blue clay. Even today that cement has a blue tinge.

Much could be written of these interesting remains, but I'll hurry on, merely adding that some of the boys, recalling their history books, had a hot discussion when at night we were all snug again in the cabin of the Morrissey.

The boys said they had made out an "almonry"—whatever that may be; they vowed one house near the church ruins had belonged to some ancient bishop of the pious Norsemen. Other remains farther up the hill, they said, were plainly houses of old-time governors and other officials.

The walls of some of the ruins were 4 feet thick. One ruin had been, almost certainly, a round tower. Its diameter was 48 feet, by measurement of the ruler brought from the Morrissey.

Last of all, we lingered over the old, gray, crumbling churchyard. Only one stone showed traces of its inscription. We tried hard to make out what was carved on that stone, but it defied even the bright eyes of my boys. However, an old book I once came across states that within recent years this inscription was found on one stone:

"Vigdis, daughter of M—, rests here. May God rejoice her soul."

This, the books say, was carved in runic characters. It is just as well; for even had we made out that inscription, none of the boys, not even the lad from Dartmouth, could translate runic.

I put in this bit about the ruins for what it is worth. It may not be exploration exactly—or, again, it may be. But if I had ever had more time to spare from the actual job of sailing the ship in my jaunts about Greenland, I should have given those ruins around and about more thorough observation than I have yet managed.

A QUESTION SETTLES A DISPUTE

Several years ago Norway and Denmark got into an argument about which country had the better claim to parts of eastern Greenland. I received a cable from The Hague asking me to come there to testify before the arbitration committee.

I cabled back, "Impossible to come. Were modern Norwegians ever in Greenland?"

This question on my part was merely a request for information; and I was astonished to receive in reply a letter from the authorities at The Hague thanking me for settling the question.

The Norwegian claim, based on colonization so far in the past that it has left only a few scattered ruins, was overruled, and Denmark was given the decision.

My most recent voyage in the Morrissey was in the summer of 1939. Late in June we sailed from the McWilliams shipyard on Staten Island bound for Nantucket, Mass.; Brigus, Newfoundland; an Kejser Franz Josephs fjord, on the east coast of Greenland.

Our party consisted of 11 boys, a radio operator, and a doctor. We have a completely equipped hospital to provide for proper care and treatment of the boys. We even have X-ray equipment.

We are in constant radio communication with New York. The folks at home know what we are doing, and we get the news of the outside world. On our broadcasts the boys can send messages to their homes.

Some of the boys have been with us for four or five trips and have become so interested in certain subjects that they make collections. In likely places they go ashore with their camping outfit and canoe, putting in a day or two gathering birds, eggs, and nests of the migratory fowl. While in the field they make a picture record of their work.

We always get permission to do this through the State Department in Washington. Sometimes the bird specimens go to the Cleveland Museum of Natural History, the United States National Museum, the Academy of Natural Sciences, Philadelphia, or the American Museum of Natural History, New York.

Frank Foster, of Phoenixville, Pa., who has fine dairy cattle, gave us a fresh heifer and a young Guernsey bull which we were glad to take along.

Seven thousand gallons of Diesel oil, a thousand gallons of gasoline, two 24-foot whaleboats, two dorries, two canoes, and the equipment which we use for shoving about the ice when we are in the North leave very little room on deck.

We carry a Frigidaire which takes 1,200 pounds of meat and a couple of hundred pounds of fish. We also take along several cases of oranges, apples, and grapefruit. These are put on board an hour or two before we sail and, since we soon reach cool weather, they keep nearly to the end of the voyage.

The night we left New York, going out of the Sound, the wind was strong from the east, and a heavy rain was falling. With the ebb tide against the easterly wind, there was quite a sea in the Sound. Some of the lads had been celebrating commencement with too much rich food, and, although they had good sea legs, they were soon blue around the gills.

I shall never forget the anxiety of that night. The clouds seemed almost to rest on the spars of the Morrissey, and it was as black as an asphalt street. The rain fell in a veritable tropic downpour.

About midnight, when I made my hourly call of the names of the boys on duty, one of them did not answer.

A BOY LOST—AND FOUND

You can imagine my worry. We searched all over the vessel, from one end to the other, but could not find him. Fortunately I caught our radio operator in time to prevent him from sending out the news.

Just at dawn my brother Will happened to look down into the box where the heifer and bull were kept, and there was the missing boy, fast asleep. He had evidently felt cold and seasick and crawled down there for warmth and comfort.

We stopped for a couple of days at Nantucket, and there, through the generosity of Bassett Jones, electrical engineer in charge of the lighting at the New York World's Fair, we acquired an otter trawl, which later enabled us to bring back a wealth of specimens from the floor of the ocean.

From Nantucket to Brigus, Newfoundland, is about 1,200 miles, and by the time we got there our boys were almost as good sailors as the seasoned fishermen who leave T Wharf in Boston to go to the Grand Banks.

Of course, the boys are not all my crew. In the 15 years that I have had the Morrissey, I have always employed a few men chosen from the fishermen and seal hunters around my native village of Brigus.

People ask me, "Bob, how is it that you still look in good physical condition, mentally active, and always keen to go on these trips?"

My dear mother, who is now 88 years of age and still retains a glorious crown of white hair and a figure which any debutante would envy, and who reads without glasses the small print in newspapers or the Bible better than I can with my lenses, told me to associate with young people, get their sentiments on the way to live.

"In this fast-changing modern world," she said, "you have just got to move with the times."

This is why I carry the boys on the Morrissey. I want to go as long as I can; I really hate to think that the day will come when I can no longer go to the north. We always stop to pay mother a visit, and she waves good-bye to us from her garden as we turn our faces toward another adventure.

Before leaving Brigus, we put on our extra whaleboat, sent aloft our crow's-nest, filled up with Diesel oil, and also filled our tanks and extra barrels with water.

A REMARKABLE POLAR MIRAGE

Our next stop after Brigus would be Kejser Franz Josephs Fjord on the east coast of Greenland. From Newfoundland to Cape Farewell we had adverse winds and some rough water. Nearing Cape Farewell in the fog, we suddenly found ourselves among heavy ice, but luckily for us it was not very wide.

I had been many times to the north and had never before seen such open conditions. The east coast of Greenland is a difficult place to reach and in some years ships cannot get in at all. I had been worried about whether or not we could get in. However, everything was fine and, although it was foggy and we could not tell our position exactly, we knew we were close to land.

We saw a remarkable phenomenon in Denmark Strait, midway between the tip of southern Greenland and Iceland. The date was July 17, and all our observations were made in brilliant sunshine. Our position was latitude 63°42′ N., longitude 33°42′ W. The ship's three chronometers had been checked daily by Naval Observatory signal. The air was calm and the sea smooth. At 4 p. m., with the sun in the southwest, an amazing polar mirage appeared in the direction of southwest Iceland, showing clearly the Snaefells Jökull (4,715 feet).

There were other well-known landmarks, all of which were familiar to me as well as to any ship's officer. At the time, I asked him how far he thought we were from this land. He replied, from 25 to 30 nautical miles. As a matter of fact, the position of the Morrissey showed that these features were some 300 statute miles distant.

One of our boys, Doran Warren, had a birthday on July 6, and I presented him with a very fat envelope which his mother had given me for the occasion. He had already borrowed against its contents in Brigus. We had a party for him, all of us giving him some foolish present.

David Nutt and the cook made a cake, a really professional job with all the fixings. David had experience which prepared him for this job, he once made a cake for President Hoover in Cleveland.

One of the most interesting phases of our activities is the job of tossing drift bottles overboard. This is done for the Hydrographic Office of the Navy Department, to gather data on currents. The drift bottles are picked up all over the world; one of ours, in fact, was recovered on the coast of Africa. We also gathered data on temperatures and ice conditions, as I have done on all other trips.

Coming into a school of porpoises, we took some excellent pictures and shot two of the creatures to obtain their skeletons for the Smithsonian. At latitude 58° 41′ N., longitude 44° 15′ W., we got into tide rips and found numerous hagdons, noddies, kittiwakes, parasitic and pomarine jaegers, and Arctic terns and murres.

Each lad who is interested in the birds has a card with the names of all the species likely to appear. During his watch, armed with binoculars, he will put down the names of birds seen, with latitude, longitude, weather, wind, conditions of sea, and other data. His notes are entered in a book at the end of the watch.

Late one afternoon we saw a purple sandpiper, a phalarope, and a turnstone. Two lads went out in a canoe and brought in fulmars and gulls.

We were now near the fishing banks between the northwest coast of Iceland and the east coast of Greenland; the fish smell told us that as plainly as if it were written on the water. We got good hauls with the plankton net; sounded 100 fathoms, no bottom; saw a large school of bottlenose whales.

A BIT OF ROUGH WEATHER

Next day the barometer began dropping fast and the wind was strong from the northeast, with a heavy sea coming from the southeast. The barometer went to 29.44, very low for this time of the year, and the ceiling was also very low.

At noon we lowered the mainsail and jib, making them fast, and hoisted the storm trysail. At 5 p. m. we were near ice. There was a big swell on the weather edge. As we gradually worked in through the ice, the water became smoother, and the wind was going down among the ice but still blowing a gale outside in open water. The sky was dark with heavy, ominous clouds.

In the fast-diminishing light we saw a schooner, two-masted, with a barrel on her foremast. When we got close to her, we saw that she was loaded with seals, deck to water. She lay there as if anchored. Hunting hooded seals—the Norwegians call them bladder nose—is a profitable industry as carried on in normal times by the Norwegian motor-driven vessels.

In a gale among the ice we lost our foresail and had to bend a new hemp sail. Nevertheless, we obtained specimens of hooded seals for the Smithsonian.

The morning after the gale was beautiful, the sky blue as the Arctic, bluer even than in California.

Steaming along by Blosseville coast in a mist which the sun was quickly dispelling, we saw mountains capped with new-fallen snow thrusting up through haze, touched with blue and purple tints. The colors were gorgeous.

On July 23, 17 days from Brigus, we anchored in a fjord at Manby Peninsula. Here we collected birds and flowers and discovered a hot spring.

RED AND GREEN SNOW

As we crossed Scoresby Sound—named after old English whalers—there was no ice. The sound was almost as free as the Potomac is today. We steamed close by the coast of Liverpool Land and saw the red snow, about which Dr. Erzsebet Kol of the University of Szeged, Hungary, had asked us to procure information. The color is due to the presence of a plant. I have also seen green snow in the north.

Along the Liverpool coast thousands of little auks were enjoying the warm, brilliant sunshine. Exquisite colors brightened the face of the cliffs. Marble from similar cliffs on the west coast of Greenland has been used for buildings in Copenhagen.

Because we found the fjords were still icebound on July 26, we could not get into Kejser Franz Josephs Fjord. The ice was close in to Cape Hold with Hope, named by Henry Hudson; and we went eastward for 10 miles, meeting slack ice.

We worked through this and into Loch Fyne near Eskimonaes. It was here that we captured our musk ox calves—four of them for the New York Bronx Zoo.

Going in, we shot two polar bears, also several squareflippers, as we Newfoundlanders call bearded seals, for specimens. The meat of young polar bears is almost as good as pork, and we used it for our meals. Some of the boys stored a quantity of the meat in the Frigidaire and took it home as a treat for their families.

We passed Eskimonaes, on the southernmost point of Clavering Island, a base of Dr. Lauge Koch, who for several years has carried on extensive scientific research both with ships and with airplanes along the east coast of Greenland.

FLOWERS AND BIRDS OF THE NORTH

Steaming in the sound, we saw musk oxen roaming the hills and valleys. Here in this beautiful country, only 1,100 miles from the North Pole, flowers bloom and the grass grows knee deep. We saw barnacle and pink-footed geese, plovers, and songbirds.

The slopes of the mountains were green, black, dun, russet, and brown. Newly fallen snow capped the mountains and a blue haze made a symphony of color.

The boys scattered far and near, collecting birds and flowers. In 10 days we obtained for the Smithsonian thousands of plants, representing several hundred species.

I had been wanting to use the otter trawl on the Belgica Bank and hoped with the good ice conditions that we might be successful. The weather changed and became warm and rainy, with poor visibility.

We passed the Bass Rock close, later catching a sight of Shannon Island. It began to get really foggy; but there was no ice, and we kept going. The water temperature showed around 39° to 40° F.

In fog the thermometer is the seeing eye and feeler. We watch the readings carefully, and when the mercury goes to 35° or lower, we know that we are getting close to the ice. At such times we haul out until we get thermometer readings up to 38° or thereabout, then continue on our course.

Guided thus, we followed the straight edge of ice which parallels the east Greenland coast. It was provoking and tantalizing to have fog, for we had hoped to see the land and ice, polar bears, birds, seals, and so forth.

About midnight, when the light was not so sharp, I saw a polar bear asleep on a sheet of ice. Since the wind was blowing away from him, he did not get our scent. We shot by so near that I could almost kiss him from the quarter of the Morrissey. The slaty color of the bear and the ice blended into one.

In a locality where we expect to see bears, lots are drawn among the boys for a shot at one of the animals. This was John Howard's chance, and he was fortunate in having his watch on deck. Before the bear reached the opposite side of his ice refuge, we headed him off, and John, being a good shot, got his trophy for a museum.

ICE IN BIG SHEETS

As we worked north, we found the ice heavy and in big sheets. The wind veered to the northeast, driving the ice upon the land. For this reason we had to work to the eastward and try for open water.

Once in the clear, with the wind blowing a gale, we reluctantly abandoned the trip to the Belgica Bank. The season was getting well along into August, and by the look of things we might be several days waiting for the wind to let up.

We squared away for Angmagssalik, and off Shannon Island procured for the Smithsonian two magnificent specimens of the hooded seal. Around midnight of August 15, we steamed close to the Liverpool coast.

On our trip north much of the coast below Scoresby had been covered in fog and mist. Now it was clear and free of ice. We kept close to the shore and saw some of the most beautiful scenery in the world—cliffs going up straight from the water 3,000 to 5,000 feet, glaciers, ravines, cascades.

Bird rookeries filled the air with life and noise. The sun, coming out at times behind the clouds, would strike the white breasts of the auks and murres so that they looked like big snowflakes. Around us were huge icebergs of all shapes and sizes. We wormed our way in and out through a galaxy of white and blue cathedral spires, Lincoln Memorials, and Chrysler and Woolworth buildings.

My chart of the Angmagssalik coast was on a small scale, and the approach to it was in fog. The next morning with the rising sun the heavy fog began to disappear. First we saw the peaks and contours of its ranges, then the glaciers and deep ravines, and finally the shore line.

Cape Dan enveloped in fog, and the autumnal tints—russet, brown, yellow, and some places red—were a real joy and drew from us loud expressions of pleasure. Somehow I could not find the opening into Angmagssalik Fjord. I realized afterward that in the fog I had passed it.

As the day wore on, the clouds broke away and we had a deep-blue sky; the brilliant sun, warm and comfortable, cheered us up mightily.

ESKIMOS WELCOME FRIEND MORRISSEY

Moving up the fjord, we saw kayaks belonging to the Eskimos of Kûngmiut; they were seal hunting. We were delighted to see them, and they caused considerable excitement among the boys when they came alongside.

Presently more and more left the village and soon we were being escorted to our anchorage in a welcome that would make the greeting of a conquering hero entering the gateway to New York a minor affair.

As we came to anchor, the shores were lined with men, women, children, and dogs. The clothes were all colors of the rainbow—reds, blues, yellows, and greens, with red predominating.

We were invited ashore, and the boys went with a bountiful supply of sweets, colored ribbons, bright shirts, and gaudy handkerchiefs for gifts.

The whole village was in a holiday mood that fine Sunday. We invited the Eskimos on board later in the afternoon and treated them to biscuits, cakes, tea, coffee, and grape juice. They showed their deep appreciation in their peals of laughter and self-abandonment.

In the early hours of the following morning we sailed away and arrived at Angmagssalik around 11 a. m.

There we took advantage of a chance to get some codfish, the Eskimo boys bringing it to us in their kayaks. We also sent off our own whaleboat with lines and hooks and a trout net. The net we set at the mouth of one of the small rivers and procured a lot of salmon trout. The Eskimos also speared a number, picking them out of the pools farther up the river.

Because of the lateness of the season, our stay in Angmagssalik was short. This was my fourth visit to the charming and prosperous village. Many of its old people have gone to the happy hunting grounds since my first visit 10 years ago.

From Angmagssalik to Cape Farewell we had fine weather and good visibility, no drift ice. We kept in with the shore.

Along the King Frederik VI Land one does not see the towering, saw-toothed peaks. Much of the inland ice comes close to the water, where it forms the glacial front and, breaking off, becomes floating icebergs. There are hundreds and thousands of bergs along this coast, especially when strong offshore winds send the ice to the eastward.

An onshore wind blowing hard creates a big sea, which rolls in and lifts up the glacial front. This releases the bergs, which come south with the south-bound Arctic Stream from the Polar Basin. The glacial streams for months send vast rivers of water into this same south-bound current.

Last summer I saw bergs 50 miles distant from the south end of Cape Farewell. Some of these bergs swing around the cape and get into the north-bound branch of the Gulf Stream, following or paralleling the coast and moving up with the bergs that come out of the big fjords of south Greenland.

As they work north, they begin to leave the coast and move across Davis Strait to Baffin Island and southbound Arctic currents. It would be interesting to tag these bergs as we do birds and fishes. There is no question that they come, many of them, right down to the banks of Newfoundland.

We put in a very busy day in one of the fjords running in from Cape Farewell, catching many fine cod with the jigger, and then lowering the otter trawl and obtaining a good lot of rich specimens. Some of these, while not unknown, were the first ever delivered to the Smithsonian.

In 7 days we crossed the North Atlantic to Brigus and every 3 hours we made plankton hauls. We kept our thermometer readings of the surface water and put overboard bottle papers for the Hydrographic Office of the Navy Department at Washington.

During the morning of August 28 we ran into a heavy gale. The vessel was shipping much water. Our musk ox calves became uncomfortable as water began coming into their box. We wrapped them up with plenty of sail canvas, cut up strands of rope, and made them a comfortable bedding. Water on their long, heavy hair is bad for musk ox calves; it may cause pneumonia.

Sunday, September 3, we heard that England and France had declared war upon Germany.

PEARY'S ESTIMATE OF GREENLAND

My old commander, Rear Admiral Robert E. Peary, wrote in 1916 an article advising Greenland's purchase by the United States, and from this document it seems fitting here to quote a part:

"Geographically, Greenland belongs to North America and the Western Hemisphere, over which we have formally declared a sphere of influence by our Monroe Doctrine. Its possession by us will be in line with the Monroe Doctrine and will eliminate one more possible source of future complications for us from European possession of territory in the Western Hemisphere.

"Greenland is comparatively near to us. For years American ships have conveyed cryolite from the Ivigut mines to Philadelphia. There are coal and cryolite, graphite and mica, possibly gold, in its rocks. With our unlimited means it may, like Alaska, prove a sound and most valuable business investment.

"The abundance of native coal and the numerous glacial streams which come tumbling into the southern fjords from the great interior ice sheet represent enormous potential energy which might be translated into nitrate and electrical energy to make Greenland a powerhouse for the United States. Greenland represents ice, coal, and power in inexhaustible quantities.

BASE FOR AIRSHIPS AND NAVY

"And stranger things have happened than that Greenland, in our hands, might furnish an important North Atlantic naval and aeronautical base. A North Pacific naval base for the United States in the Aleutian Archipelago is a recognized possibility. Why not a similar base in the North Atlantic?

"Cape Farewell in Greenland is but little north of Sitka. It is in the same latitude as St. Petersburg (now Leningrad); Christiania (now Oslo); Great Britain's naval base in the Orkneys; and the northern entrance to the North Sea, which Great Britain has patrolled with her ships, incessantly now, summer and winter, for 2 years.

"There are fjords in southern Greenland which would hold the entire Navy, with deep, narrow, impregnable entrances. Thirty hours' steaming due south from Cape Farewell by 35-knot war craft would put them in the trans-Atlantic lanes midway between New York and the British Channel. With the rapid shrinking of distance in this age of speed and invention, Greenland may be of crucial importance to us in the future.

"The present war (the first World War) has shown us most strikingly how far-flung may be the regions having a bearing on the struggle.

"Great Britain's coaling station in the Falklands spelled destruction for Germany's squadron of commerce destroyers. Russia's port of Archangel (Arkhangelsk) has been an invaluable gateway for her. Greenland in our hands may be a valuable piece of our defensive armor. In the hands of a hostile interest it could be a serious menace."

Railroad Unemployment Insurance Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FRANK E. HOOK

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

LETTER FROM INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF FIREMEN AND OILERS, LOCAL NO. 515

Mr. HOOK. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter:

INTERNATIONAL BROTHERHOOD OF
FIREMEN AND OILERS, LOCAL NO. 515,
Ironwood, Mich., July 5, 1940.

The Honorable FRANK E. HOOK,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. CONGRESSMAN: The railroad unemployment insurance bill is before a committee in the House, and from what information we have, those workers who are making the most now are to have their rates raised, while those who work a short time or whose wages are low, get nothing, except more days, which those earning more get, too.

The average wage of most of us for our part-time work is from $300 to $500 per year.

We would like to see our bill at least as good as the best State bill, and reading the statement in Labor of twelve and one-half millions paid out and one hundred and twenty-five million taken in taxes, we see no reason why it shouldn't be.

Therefore, we are asking you to do all you can to have the rates raised for those workers earning less than $1,000 a year as well as those earning more.

We believe that our rates should be as good as the best State bill, and better if we can get it.

We should also like to know why, under our bill, we must report every other day and sometimes every day, while under the State bill, we report once a week? Aren't we to be trusted to tell the truth about what work we do?

We are sending you a copy of the Michigan bill, and we hope that you will do all you can for those workers in the lower earning class, that they may get at least as much as they would under that bill.

We know that you will now, as you have in the past, do all you can for us, and we hope you will have the help of all the good friends we have in Congress.

Sincerely yours,

MICHAEL WYZLU,
President.
RUDOLPH WESTERBERG,
Chairman.

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

SONG COMPOSED BY MARTIN BRANDON, J. V. DECIMBER, AND WOODY DREYFUSS

Mr. SCHAFER of Wisconsin. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the words of an exceptionally fine song entitled "God Keep America," which was written and composed by Martin Brandon, J. V. DeCimber, and Woody Dreyfuss, program director for radio station WISN, Milwaukee, Wis.:

GOD, KEEP AMERICA!

(By Woody Dreyfuss, program director, WISN; Martin Brandon, J. V. DeCimber)

God, keep America from wanton hands.
God, keep America, land of freedom—keep it so,
With every man a king, his home a throne,
Forever keep it so. God, keep America!

God, keep America, land of the free,
Land of democracy; we Americans love it so.
Let no one take away our heritage,
Though there are those who would. God, keep America!

God, keep America free from all pain;
God, keep America singing Freedom's own refrain;
Free it from wanton hands, where'er they be—
Keep singing Freedom's call. God, keep America!

Do Congressmen Pay Taxes?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE A. DONDERO

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

LETTER BY HON. U. S. GUYER OF KANSAS

Mr. DONDERO. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following letter written by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. GUYER]:

HE PAYS TAXES

I was surprised to find on the editorial page of the Times-Herald for Saturday, July 6, a cartoon, based either on gross ignorance or mendacity, which represents our "Uncle Sam" as saying to a Congressman:

"While the spirit of taxation for defense is strong, wouldn't it be large and admirable if Federal officeholders paid taxes too?"

After paying thousands of dollars of income taxes on my salary as a Member of Congress during the past 16 years, and also income tax to my State on my salary, I confess a desire to express myself in unprintable terms. Federal officials down to the underpaid clerks and secretaries have paid income taxes just like anyone else.

While there are a limited number of people who, through ignorance or malice, peddle this palpable prevarication, it must have been oversight or inadvertence that permitted the Times-Herald to give it currency by publication.

U. S. GUYER,
Member of Congress, Second Kansas District.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST LUNDEEN

OF MINNESOTA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 11 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

ADDRESS BY RAYMOND RUBICAM

Mr. LUNDEEN. Mr. President, James S. Milloy, of the Washington office of the Minneapolis Tribune, has brought to my attention an address delivered to the recent Business-Consumer Relations Conference held in New York City by Raymond Rubicam, chairman of the board, Young & Rubicam, Inc. Mr. Rubicam's firm is one of the Nation's leading advertising agencies, and because of his outstanding leadership in advertising his comments on business-consumer relations are of distinct importance. Because of widespread interest on this subject, I ask unanimous consent to insert it in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, there is much more to the consumer movement than a consideration of advertising alone. And the questions concerning advertising involve more than national advertising alone. But national advertising is important, and it is the branch of advertising in which I work; therefore most of my remarks will be concerned with it.

WHAT DOES NATIONAL ADVERTISING OWE THE CONSUMER?

In my opinion, the first obligation that national advertising owes the consumer is the same as that which it owes the manufacturer—namely, success in selling honest goods and services to a mass market at a low cost.

If an advertisement does not succeed in commanding the attention of a large number of people, it fails in its first test. Even if it gives all the information in the world about a product, if it does not command such attention, it is a failure. If every statement in it were hailed as incontrovertible fact by Consumers' Union, it would still be a failure. And if it won the enthusiastic approval of every guardian of public welfare in the land, its classification would not change.

The only reason for the existence of advertising is that it sells goods to the many simultaneously, the way personal salesmen sell goods to people individually. It has no other justification worth mentioning. It reaches where sales forces cannot reach, and does it at a lower cost than any other method yet tried.

Why is all this of primary interest to the consumer? Certainly it is of interest to the consumer to have worthy goods and services offered to the largest possible number of people. Only in that way can the national standard of living be raised. Only because that job has been well done does the average American have more of the goods and services that make life enjoyable than any other average man in the world. And only because so many Americans use so many products and services are they available at all or at their present prices.

And there is still another reason why it is of primary interest to the consumer to have advertising highly effective in its ability to influence the consumer. The additional reason is that consumers are not only consumers, they are also producers and wage earners, and their ability to buy depends in part upon the success with which advertising helps to keep factories busy and wage earners earning.

ADVERTISING MUST BE INTERESTING

The first requirements which advertising must meet, or else cease to exist, are the requirements of people's tastes and habits regarding what they will and will not read in magazines and newspapers and what they will and will not listen to on the air. If these requirements are ignored, people will in turn ignore the advertisements, and they will fail.

If you will study the editorial contents of the magazines which are most popular, the newspapers which are most in demand, the radio programs which are listened to by the greatest number of people, the movies which people flock to see, there is one conclusion that you will come to rather easily—namely, that people do not want dry facts served to them in a dry way. Critics complain that the best books are not read, that the best plays are not popular, the best movies not even produced. Perhaps this is so. Authors and playwrights can afford, if they wish, to appeal to a judicious minority, but the advertiser and the advertisement have no choice. They must meet popular taste and appeal to it in terms which will win broad response or they lose their justification.

Advertising is divided into two main branches—national advertising and retail advertising. In a broad way it is the job of national advertising to stimulate desire and demand; it is the job of retail advertising to fill it. It is reasonably well known that you cannot create desire or demand in any field of human activity simply by a recitation of facts. Equally as useful as the facts is the art of persuasion, which I have yet to hear called a crime except by some critics of advertising. Preachers use it not only to save sinners, but, competitively, to win converts to their sect. Educators use it to convince the indifferent young that it pays to study, and alumni use it to recruit talent for the football teams. Democratic governments use it to win people to their policies, but dictators don't bother with it; they just tell you what to do.

ADVERTISING SHOULD HAVE LIBERTY WITHIN LIMITS

Effective national advertising is made up of a combination of facts and persuasion. It should not be exerted in behalf of fraudulent products; it should not resort to unjustified claims; it should not violate or evade the laws whose purpose is to prevent the consumer from being cheated.

On the other hand, advertising should be given as much liberty as possible within the limits of honesty. It should not be required to become an encyclopedia of factual information about the product. It should not be asked to employ standards of public taste which apply only to a minority. If it is compelled to do so, it will fail to interest enough people to perform its primary job of selling goods at low cost.

Studies of public reading habits and preferences show that the picture page of the newspaper will be looked at by 90 percent of the women readers and the leading comic will be read by 70 percent, whereas the leading editorial will be read by only 10 percent. Although fiction is not nearly so popular in newspapers as it is in magazines, even in a newspaper the love stories will be read by more women than the leading news story on page 1. The Hollywood columns far outrank the book columns in popularity, and the columns on beauty, etiquette, and society outrank columns on health.

Critics sometimes question advertising as an effective and economical selling tool; the same critics will criticize it for lack of factual dignity. Certainly advertising cannot lower its cost without reaching the masses of the people, and certainly it cannot reach the masses of the people by a very great preoccupation with dignity.

EMOTIONAL AND DRAMATIC TOUCH NECESSARY

In both newspapers and magazines research proves over and over again that people want information served to them with a light and entertaining touch, or else with an emotional and dramatic touch which mirrors their own lives. Particularly is this true of women. In a woman's magazine, articles of serious import must be highly personalized, or they are likely to get scant reading. In national advertising an advertisement about an electrical appliance which featured for a woman the technical details of the product would be a complete and utter failure, according to all past experience; but an advertisement which dramatized for her the contribution which that appliance could make to her life, if it hit the truth of the matter, would be a huge success.

The most effective advertisements are not written about products; they are written about people and their relationship to the product advertised. Dramatic selling and free use of the imagination are clearly recognized by the critics of advertising, or they would never have taken such titles for their books as One Hundred Million Guinea Pigs, Forty Million Guinea Pig Children, Skin Deep, and Partners in Plunder. How much circulation do you suppose these popular books would have had if they had been given conservative titles and been written in factual language?

Imaginative persuasion is a crime only when it is used by your opponents.

Advertising is not to be likened to an impartial consumers' information service. An advertisement is a salesman; it exercises any man's right to advocate openly and honorably his own goods and his own work. It does not pretend to be disinterested, as so often happens in propaganda outside of advertising. It is as partial to the product it advertises as the doctor to his own diagnosis, the lawyer to his own brief, the architect to his own building plan, the economist to his own theory of a depression or a boom. Its partiality can do no more harm than these other partialities. Its departures from fact are out where they can be seen, challenged, and corrected, and where the parties responsible are known and can be held responsible.

It is not an offense against the consumer if the advertiser is in favor of his own products and says so enthusiastically. It is not an offense against the consumer if he tries to make a place in her life for the goods he sells. And he must be allowed liberty and latitude, it seems to me, in the choice of methods by which he sells.

If he makes honest goods, prices them fairly, puts all vital information about them on product or label and in service literature, it seems to me that he should be allowed to advertise them with nursery rhymes if nursery rhymes carry the good product to the greatest number of consumers at the lowest cost.

Let me hasten to say at this point that I am not arguing that advertisers should not give more information to the consumer. I am not arguing against grade labeling. I am not arguing against full information on labels, products, or in service literature. I am arguing that national advertising's primary job is to sell, without misrepresentation, the largest number of people at the lowest possible cost, and that everything else about it must be secondary to that.

Readers of national advertising are frequently repelled, instead of attracted, by a mass of literal facts about the product. They are frequently repelled by informative headlines. They are usually repelled by lots of words and small type. They are usually attracted by pictures of generous size or by sequences of pictures. They are generally attracted by pictures of people rather than pictures of products alone. More often than not there is some one fact about a product or some one appeal for its use that is of supreme interest and importance to people, and so far outweighs all others that emphasis upon it is the best, and perhaps the only way of effecting low-cost selling.

CONTACT BETWEEN CONSUMER AND PRODUCER

Perhaps in saying these things I am, as the phrase goes, sticking my neck out. But, as I see it, the value of consumer-business conferences lies in hearing all views. I am distinctly in favor of greater contact between consumer and producer. Nothing but good for both can come from it if the contact is frequent enough, is continued long enough, if the consumer representatives and the business representatives really represent the forces behind them, and if there is an honest and cooperative effort in both groups to understand the needs and problems of the other.

Human beings always find it hard to make sudden changes and adjustments. Businessmen and advertising men are no exception to this. Changes in procedure which are suggested from the outside sometimes look harder to make than they are. Changes that are restrictive in nature, sometimes look more dangerous than they are to the freedoms which we in this country so rightfully guard today.

It is true, at the same time, that this American freedom is, or should be, based upon a willingness of the individual to accept such limitations on his personal freedom as will serve the rights and interests of all. There is no question that business and its instrument, advertising, must serve the great consuming public to its satisfaction or that the public will find ways of compelling that satisfaction.

It is important that we, who are in business, see and accept that fact. It is likewise important that the leaders of the consumer movement truly represent the views, needs, and desire of the great mass of consumers, and that the measures which they advocate will permit business to serve the consumer in his role as producer, too.

In the short run it may not always be true that what is good for business is good for the consumer and wage earner, but in the long run it has got to be true, and in my experience, businessmen have never seen and understood this as clearly as they do today.

FREEDOM OF CHOICE FOR CONSUMER

The most precious possession we have in this country is freedom of choice. The average American has more latitude with regard to everything in his life than any citizen of any great nation in the world. We cannot blind ourselves to the fact that millions are without jobs, but we must strive for the restoration of those jobs without the loss of the freedoms—spiritual, mental, and material—which make us the most fortunate great people in the world today.

The most important consideration before us is that we shall use well and thus retain the freedoms which we now have.

Reasonable and fair freedom for business in its methods must be guarded as carefully as freedom for the people whom business serves. For violation of freedom in one field leads to violation in others.

Business, heedless of consumer needs and desires, might bring upon itself new restrictions to shrink its area of freedom; but consumers must look out that, in imposing too severe restrictions on business, they do not, in the end, restrict themselves.

Today, business suggests through advertising and salesmanship, but the consumer decides. Because of the freedoms which business enjoys, the consumer is offered an almost limitless range of goods and services to choose from.

What difference does it make if 2 or 10 or 50 different manufacturers market and advertise goods which have many like characteristics? Why shouldn't 2 or 10 or 50 manufacturers have the right to make and market resembling products? Is it not important to preserve their right to do so in order to preserve the whole principle of right of choice—whether for a man to choose to go in business or for a woman to choose what hat or automobile or brand of peas strikes her fancy?

We must all be careful that a movement which starts with the reasonable desire of consumers to get what they want from business, does not end with the dictation of an individual empowered to decide what everybody wants.

Shall Roosevelt Have a Third Term?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ALEXANDER WILEY

OF WISCONSIN

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 11 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. ALEXANDER WILEY, OF WISCONSIN, BEFORE GET-TOGETHER CLUB, OF HARTFORD, CONN.

Mr. WILEY. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD an address made by myself some months ago before the Get-Together Club of Hartford, Conn. At that time I debated with Mr. Jay Franklin the issue Shall Roosevelt Have a Third Term?

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SHALL ROOSEVELT HAVE A THIRD TERM?

(Debate between Jay Franklin and Senator ALEXANDER WILEY)

Mr. President, ladies and gentlemen, I am very happy to be the guest of the Get-together Club of Hartford. I am grateful for the opportunity to visit in your city and for the opportunity of exchanging ideas in this forum.

Until tonight I have not had the privilege of meeting my distinguished opponent. I read his column and I must say that he is consistent in his hero worship of the President. Just the other day he came out with a very beautifully written column comparing the President most favorably with the great men, living and dead.

His column might have stimulated a paraphrase of one of the Confucius sayings which are so much in vogue today:

"Me lik-ee President, as man.
Me no lik-ee, as politician.
Me no lik-ee, as God, at all.
Too much baloney, no good, no good."
Confucius say.

I am also happy to be in Hartford to pay my respects to your two Senators, JOHN DANAHER and FRANCIS T. MALONEY. I have learned to know and admire them both.

But to the subject of the debate: Shall Roosevelt Have a Third Term?

The answer, as I see it, is "No."

In arriving at that conclusion, I do not want to indulge in personalities; nor do I want to permit bias, prejudice, or political partisanship to influence my answer. Why? Because the question has more significance than appears on the face of it. It really implies—Shall we impose upon this country 4 more years, and perhaps more years after that, of the political leadership and the political philosophy of the New Deal?

In answering that question, we have to arrive at our individual conclusions from an investigation made by ourselves as trustees—trustees of the great American freedoms, the great American political concepts. Mere personal regard for, or prejudice against, the individual concerned should not influence our judgment in this matter.

Putting it bluntly, the personal appeal of the President—and we must admit he has such an appeal—his ability to overcome his physical handicap, his pleasing smile and voice, and his incessant activity make a personal appeal of tremendous proportions, all of which, among judicially minded folks, should have no great significance in determining the answer to this question. Likewise, the mere prejudice of a Republican against a Democrat should have no influence either in our decision this evening.

I repeat that we are trustees, you and I, of great values. Every 4 years the American people choose anew the leadership which will carry on for 4 more years. Tonight we debate whether we want to move in the same direction we have in the last 7 years, and whether America can take the chance of pursuing the course we have been traveling, under the same leadership.

I do not believe Mr. Roosevelt should have a third term. I have many reasons for that belief. My reasons fall into two groups:

1. Reasons why no President should be given a third term.

2. Reasons why Mr. Roosevelt specifically should not be given a third term.

First, let us consider the reasons why no President should be given a third term.

At the outset of our discussion on this point, let me state that I am not going to present the intolerant idea that there is a hard-and-fast rock-ribbed American doctrine absolutely forbidding a third term. There is no constitutional prohibition against a third term.

There are 150 years of tradition and precedent which have almost created an unwritten law on the subject. This historical tradition is so deeply rooted and so well known that it is hardly necessary for us to discuss it at great length. The question goes back to the Constitutional Convention itself. It was discussed at great length. It was discussed in July of 1787 and again in August. It wasn't until September 15 that the final plan for a 4-year term was agreed upon.

It was just 2 days later that the Constitutional Convention concluded its work and adjourned. The Convention omitted the question of reeligibility about which Thomas Jefferson was greatly concerned.

The men in that Convention who believed that the President should serve as many terms as the people wished were in the minority. Alexander Hamilton was one of that group and I might add that he was generally suspected of being a monarchist at heart.

The Committee on Detail for the Constitutional Convention was the committee which attacked the naming of the President by Congress. Then the delegates referred the whole question to a special committee of one representative each from each of the 11 States represented. That committee settled on election by an electoral college and a term of 4 years. They ignored the question of how many terms might be permissible.

Jefferson worried about this question. On May 2, 1788, when he was our diplomatic representative in Paris, he wrote to George Washington about this matter. He said:

"This I fear, will make an office for life. * * * I shall hope that before there is danger of this change taking place in the office of President (referring to perpetuating a President in office) the good sense and free spirit of our countrymen will make the change necessary to prevent it."

In all honesty it must be admitted that Washington did not entirely agree with Jefferson. The fact remains, however, that he did not accept the office for a third term. That set a precedent even though his decision had been made upon entirely personal grounds.

That precedent was really established, oddly enough, by the two fathers of the Democratic Party—Jefferson and Jackson. Immediately after Jefferson's second inauguration as President in 1805 he announced that he would not be a candidate again. His reasons boiled down to his aversion to "perpetuation of power." He didn't want the office to degenerate into an inheritance so that the power of Federal Washington would be used to keep a man in Washington year after year.

That wasn't his idea of democracy. In 1807 the legislatures of five States asked him to reconsider his action. On December 10, 1807, he wrote his famous letter to the Vermont Legislature. In it he said:

"That I should lay down my charge at a proper season is as much a duty as to have borne it faithfully."

In that one golden line he set a test for all succeeding Presidents.

Jefferson was succeeded by Madison who was followed by Monroe.

Each of these men served two terms and voluntarily retired at the end of their second terms. Meanwhile, Jefferson believed that his own decision coupled with those of Washington, Madison, and Monroe, had firmly nailed down the precedent that a President should retire after a second term.

Most Presidents have followed the precedent. Only one President has actually been a candidate for a third term. That man was Theodore Roosevelt. Grant almost became another exception when he permitted his friends to attempt to secure the candidacy for him.

Andrew Jackson is another classic example of a man who refused a third term. This man—the $100-a-plate patron saint of the New Deal—was militantly opposed to a third term.

He stood for new movements in American life fully as much as the New Deal claims it does. His friends wanted him to break the third-term tradition but he didn't because he subscribed to Jefferson's belief in the necessity of rotation in office "to secure in all contingencies that important right of sovereignty to the direct control of the people."

After the Civil War there were many Presidents who discussed this question. Rutherford B. Hayes advocated a single term and kept his pledge not to seek reelection. William McKinley squelched a third-term boom which began 3 months after he entered on his second term. Cleveland advocated a single term though he later battled for a second term. Teddy Roosevelt was against a third term until he got the Bull Moose urge. Wilson in his 1912 platform pledged himself to a single term though he did not keep that pledge.

As a matter of fact the Democratic convention in Baltimore in 1912 adopted a plank which favored a single Presidential term. The following year an amendment to that effect actually passed the United States Senate though it never became a law.

But, my friends, I am not as concerned with the force of historic precedent as I am with the reasons behind it. Calvin Coolidge gave the best reasons why any man should not stand for a third term. Coolidge said that the drain on an incumbent makes 8 years the full span in which a man can give his best. In support of that idea he cited the fact that each two-termer in his last 2 years had had a serious let-down.

The canny New Englander saw other reasons for not having a third term. He said that men in high office are always in danger of "self-delusion"; "that they live in an artificial atmosphere of adulation and exaltation which sooner or later impair their judgment."

My friends, it serves little purpose for me to discuss at great length the history of the third-term tradition. I do not contend that this is a closed issue decided by dead hands stretching across the span of many decades.

I do contend that there is a sound basis for opposition to a third term to be found in the historical discussions on this matter. Jefferson, Jackson, Wilson, and Coolidge, all considered this matter and found compelling reasons against granting a third term to any man.

All of their reasons simmer down to one important thought. That thought is just this:

It is necessary that there be a change of power at reasonable intervals in order to perpetuate the rule of the people. It is the perpetuation of this principle which constitutes the tradition which must be observed today. Let us know for once and for all that no individual is indispensable in a democracy. That is the lesson of 150 years during which no emergency from the time the Nation was in swaddling clothes to the present day has ever justified one man in regarding himself as a Messiah who is indispensable.

I might add that my belief on the principle involved in this matter is not at all partisan. On May 31, 1939, I introduced a joint resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States and restricting the terms of both the President and the Vice President to a single 6-year term. Here is what President Roosevelt himself has said on the subject.

President Roosevelt, on November 3, 1932, repeated a statement made by former President Calvin Coolidge on October 31, 1920, relative to the third term. His statements (President Roosevelt's) were printed in the November 4, 1932, issue of the New York Times, page 14:

"Let me propose a text which, in my opinion, expresses a sentiment that is widely held this year. It is presented so clearly, so distinctly, and so admirably that I would not change a word of it, even though it was spoken 12 years ago. Coming from a great figure in our national life, it deserves serious consideration; and coming from a great Republican, it deserves particularly consideration from Republicans: 'For one reason or another even a wisely led political party, given a long enough tenure of office, finally fails to express any longer the will of the people; and when it does so fail to express the will of the people, it ceases to be an effective instrument of Government. It is far better for such a political party—and certainly better for the state—that it should be relegated to the role of the critic and that the opposing political party should assume the reins of Government. This condition appears to have arrived in America.'

"That, my friends, is the sober conclusion of a cautious public man, not long ago President of the United States, Calvin Coolidge. With every word of it I heartily agree."

Thus far, my friends, we have only discussed the reasons why no President should be given a third term.

Now let us consider why Mr. Roosevelt specifically should not be given a third term.

1. He should not be given a third term because he has failed to do the job he promised. It is inconceivable that he should be given a third term as a reward for his two administrations which will leave us a heritage of debts, deficit, unemployment, relief, less gold in our dollar, and growing Executive power.

What was that job?

I take it from the platform under which Roosevelt was elected and which he endorsed.

The job to be done was—

(a) A drastic reduction of governmental expenditures by abolishing useless commissions and offices, eliminating extravagances.

(b) A Federal Budget annually balanced.

(c) A fact-finding Tariff Commission free from Executive interference.

(d) The restoration of agriculture.

(e) The removal of Government from our fields of private enterprise, except where necessary to develop public works and natural resources.

(f) No interference in the internal affairs of other nations.

(g) Condemnation of improper and excessive use of money in political affairs.

(h) Create jobs for the unemployed.

It will be remembered that the great depression of 1929 was in full swing in the fall of 1932. It will also be remembered that President Roosevelt himself said that this condition—world-wide depression—was the result of the World War. Of course, he didn't so argue in 1932. He blamed Hoover and the Republicans for everything then, and he said he could remedy the situation. He diagnosed the ills as I have shown above, and he said, "Give me the job and I and my party will do that job." And we gave him what he asked.

After 7 years of the New Deal, the people realize that the present leadership cannot coordinate the various forces in America, which coordination is necessary in order to bring America out of the depression. As we look at the balance sheet we know why the American people are saying: "This leadership with its psychological and human appeal cannot do the job."

We have:

(a) More than 10,000,000 Americans unemployed.

(b) A lower standard of living than a decade ago.

(c) The creation of new enterprises virtually at a standstill. The modernization and expansion of existing enterprises deferred.

(d) Labor involved in extensive and costly disputes with its organized ranks torn by civil war and its annual income lower despite higher hourly wage rates.

(e) Farm prices neither stable nor satisfactory and the basic problems of agriculture no nearer solution than before the administration's exercise of sweeping controls over farms and farmers.

(f) The doors of economic opportunity barricaded to youth by the sluggish condition of American enterprise.

(g) Government expenditures, excluding postal receipts and debt retirement, of $9,210,091,000 in 1939 against $3,863,544,000 in 1933.

(h) The heaviest tax burden in the Nation's history.

(i) A national debt doubled by the end of 1939—increased from less than twenty-one billions at the beginning of the New Deal administration to approximately $42,000,000,000, not including nearly $6,000,000,000 of obligations guaranteed by the Federal Government.

I have quoted from a program for a dynamic America, the same being the report of the Republican program committee. I continue by showing you 6 years before the New Deal and 6 years of the New Deal. The record is revealing.

(a) The average annual pay roll in all industries for the 6 years preceding the New Deal was $38,760,000,000; for the first 6 years of the New Deal, $30,446,000,000.

(b) The average number of strikes annually for the 6 years preceding the New Deal was 753, the average number of workers involved was 296,954, and man-days idle, 10,819,019; for the first 6 years of the New Deal the average number of strikes annually was 2,541, the average number of workers involved 1,181,637, and man-days idle, 17,232,583.

(c) The average index of farm prices of all agricultural products for the 6 years preceding the New Deal was 118.7; for the first 6 years of the New Deal, 99.7.

(d) The average index of department-store sales for the 6 years preceding the New Deal was 98.16; for the first 6 years of the New Deal, 81.

(e) The average annual value of construction for the 6 years preceding the New Deal was $4,608,000,000; for the first 6 years of the New Deal, $2,239,200,000.

(f) The average annual volume of new domestic corporate issues for the 6 years preceding the New Deal was $4,060,000,000; for the first 6 years of the New Deal, $672,000,000.

Now, my friends, you will remember that the New Deal leadership promised to get results by planned economy, or planned political action; and after 7 years of such spending as the world has never seen, we have uncertainty, confusion, doubt, and nobody knows where we are going.

Let me tell you several incidents that illustrate how the average man reacts to the dilemma that America is in and why he says there is going to be a change.

THE STORY OF HANS, THE SMALL-TOWN CARPENTER

The story of the old German who said: "You can't dig yourself out of a hole by digging deeper."

Granted that the New Deal hasn't done the job that it started out to do—and, I repeat, it stated pretty well in its platform of 1932 what the job was and what the Democrats were going to do—you will remember that they were to balance the Budget, reemploy the idle, cut down the expenses of government, protect the farmer and the laborer and the businessman—why didn't the New Deal succeed? It had every opportunity. It had more money, more power than any other administration.

Well, the old German said: "You can't dig yourself out of a hole by digging deeper." The New Deal tried to do that very thing. Besides this, it was also guilty of errors in legislation, administration, and selection of personnel, with the result that, as I said before, there was lack of coordination. By that I mean lack of pulling together. Labor and capital pulled apart. There was dissension, fear, distrust, and no one seemed to get all the factors interested in going in one direction. It was like a team of horses—one going one way and one another. And that condition has continued now for a long spell, and the leadership asks for a new lease of life to carry out its plans and policies. Can America afford to give this extension? The answer must be an emphatic "No." We cannot go along this highway we have been traveling for another 5 years, because if we do the national indebtedness will be sixty-five billion, and undoubtedly more men unemployed, business and agriculture stagnant.

2. The President should not be given a third term—aye, more, if he were running for a second term he should not be given it, because in the Democratic platform and in his speeches, until his Chicago speech, he promised the country that there should be no interference in the internal affairs of other countries. Right now my distinguished opponent and others have been trying to claim that the President has a superknowledge in foreign affairs, which should equip him for continuity in office. What we need in America now is men who know the domestic situation and who can coordinate all the various factions in America. We need in America someone who can discriminate between "showmanship and statesmanship."

I am sure the President does not want to get us into war. Wilson didn't want to get us into war, either. But ever since Roosevelt's Chicago speech the 48 States and Territories haven't been big enough for his efforts. He must have more worlds to conquer. He has forgotten the advice of Washington and Jefferson—not to become entangled in foreign affairs or alliances. He may be sincere in the conviction that we should try to exercise a dominant position in world problems, but I say that in that attitude he goes beyond the established rule of America. He becomes a meddler. In fact, just recently the papers in Europe said that our unofficial representative over there was a meddler. I say it is most important to this people and to future generations that we keep our fingers out of that European fire. We have seen how his administration has sought to centralize virtually all power over the enterprise of the Nation. If war should come, then we would go the way of Europe and become a totalitarian state. We cannot afford to take the chances of a restless mind like his remaining in the saddle another 4 years.

3. The American people are realizing that mere activity is not synonymous with constructive action. The American people are realizing that there is just one thing that is sure about Washington, and that is that no one knows what the administration will attempt to do tomorrow, because the leader himself does not know, as Moley says, what he will do tomorrow.

Under ordinary circumstances these might be considered harsh words, but the circumstances are not ordinary—and, I repeat, you and I are trustees of the great American values, and we want to make sure that we can turn them over to the next generation unimpaired.

Many a good-intentioned banker has wrecked the bank. Many a good-intentioned, but reckless, driver has killed a pedestrian. Hell is paved with those who have good intentions. America needs someone in the saddle now who will "go slowly," think the problem through, and before he takes a step in a certain direction, make sure that his foot is on solid ground.

Because of his apparent attitude toward foreign affairs which tends toward involvement, we should by all means keep President Roosevelt or any of his political kin who may think the way he does out of the Executive chair for the next 4 years.

There are certain minds in America today which speak glibly, use sonorous phrases, but who have little or no time for the Constitution of the United States. The President's attitude toward sit-down strikes; toward men of means; toward the Constitution; toward the Supreme Court; the President's attitude toward men who dared to oppose him in the Senate—he went into their States to purge them—all of these indicate a mental quirk. The same quirk now is manifested in foreign affairs. He ignores the Foreign Affairs Committee of the Senate and of the House. Such a quirk, during these perilous war years, should not be present in the Chief Executive of this great Nation. He has a national job, not a personal job, to tend to. He is not the state. He is still the servant with limited powers.

He and others of his philosophy knew that the loaning of money directly or indirectly by this Government to a belligerent while this Government was at peace was violation of international law. They knew also that the people had never conferred upon the Congress the right to spend the people's money by loaning it to a belligerent while this Nation was at peace. But these minds are the same autocratic minds that fill the pages of history in which we have heard said, "I am the state"; "to hell with the people." Their attitude is now "to hell with the Constitution," if it runs contra to what they think.

In all seriousness, I present this phase of the subject because, to me, unless an individual or a nation has a principle to go by—a guide post to follow—such an individual or nation will make his own principle and set up his own guide post, and that is just what these new dealers have been doing. There has been too much experimentation with fundamental values. There has been too much experimentation with the people's money. There have been too many broken pledges strewn along the highways of the last 7 years.

Yes, this Nation needs a new leadership—a leadership that can and will straighten out its domestic affairs. Under the stranglehold of New Deal philosophy, capital is dormant, or partially so. If we have 4 more years of Roosevelt, it will mean that Government will have its clutching hands on all the wealth of the Nation. The only real market for the people's money now is to be found in Government securities. Excessive taxation, war-torn labor, coupled with Government interference, have partially strangled the initiative of our people. If initiative were all that were gone or dormant, it would be bad enough, but under this new policy which we have had now for 7 years, a large segment of our society has had its morale seriously impaired. Why? Because we used to think it was the business of the people to sustain Government. Now millions of our people believe it is the business of Government to sustain the people. You can lay that new principle to the people in power.

It is time that the Nation awakens to this danger—this danger of growing bureaucracy and growing dependency of millions of men on the state.

Because someone might say, "Senator WILEY can see no good in anything that has been done by this administration," I hasten to say that this is not my position. I am willing to give credit for palliative measures and willing to say that whoever takes over the next administration will, of necessity, have to carry along some of the ideas that have been put into effect by the present administration. Yes, the new administration will have to continue for a while the C. C. C., W. P. A., and P. W. A., and some of the relief and agriculture policies. But these are no part of the permanent patterns of our American life.

Yes; Roosevelt will go down as the great "palliativeator," but not the builder, not the coordinator, not the leader that united a great people in a great crisis. Why? Because he builded on the false god of legislation. By and through legislation only his fertile-minded hero worshipers thought a nation could be rebuilt, and proceeded to carry out a revolution. He was elected on a platform and pledges different from what he proceeded to put into action 6 months after he was elected. Norman Thomas was defeated on that platform. Roosevelt took his platform—socialism.

Every problem—labor and capital, the unemployed, the farm, excessive taxation, centralization of power in Washington, the railroads, the increased cost of government, bureaucracy, dormant national initiative, dormant capital, fear of government, relief, State barriers, Government overregulation, loss of capital values, increasing national indebtedness—all these are still with us. Why? Because the leadership did not bind us together to solve these problems. It divided us. It never admitted any mistakes. It flittered back and forth constantly, always in action, never quiescent. Fundamentals in economics, law, and politics were disregarded under the plea of emergency and justified by highly sounding and plausible statements.

But the job was not done.

America knows now that magic and false economies are no substitutes for thrift, industry, honesty, and square dealing.

4. What kind of leadership do we need? (Let me tell you a story—the story of a football team and a coach.)

The story in brief is this:

A western college some years ago had a football team which could not win. It had great individual players, great punters, sprinters, throwers of the ball, but the team couldn't win. Then the college got a new coach. The coach never appeared in the limelight, but he got that team to win.

How did he do it? He got each individual player to forget self. He got 11 men to play as 1, not as 11. In other words, he unified the team. Wherever there was friction, he ironed it out. Wherever there was dissention, he did away with the cause. Wherever there was lack of team play, he found what was the trouble and got team play. It was a case of "all for one and one for all."

That's the leadership this Nation needs, and we have not had it.

My friends, in the last analysis this question of whether Roosevelt shall seek a third term resolves itself into a question vastly more important.

Franklin Roosevelt is merely a symbol in this larger question. That question is just this: "Which way of life will the American people select in the forthcoming election?"

Make no mistake about it. The year 1940 will mark a significant milestone—a crucial milestone—a milestone marking a turning point in American and world history.

Selection of Franklin Roosevelt for a third term would mean that the die would be cast for an extension of an "American fascism." I make that statement advisedly. The cloven hoof of authoritarianism beats stronger in Washington today than at any time in world history.

Selection of Franklin Roosevelt for a third term would mean scrapping the unwritten law against the third term and further impairing our constitutional democracy. It would mean a continuance of bureaucracy, babel, and bankruptcy.

It would mean that your children's children would be paying for horses they never rode. It would mean that future generations would be unable to enjoy the privileges which we have come to regard as traditional American rights. It would mean that your son could never expect to operate a business unfettered and uncircumscribed by government.

It would mean that your children would never be able to cast a free American ballot unhampered by a financial dependence on government. It would mean that the independence which has characterized every free-born American would be slaughtered on an altar of paternalistic pap.

It will mean that the man with the hoe will be guided not by the dictates of a munificent nature but by the ironclad heel of bureaucracy drawn across his land in a line that says "Thus far you shall plant and no farther."

It will mean that more and more you will be dependent on government just as in other lands. It will mean that government will no longer be dependent on the people. It will mean that American youth, just as has been the case in other lands, will be placed more and more under the guidance of a kindly paternalism which may some day turn to crack the whiplash of regimentation over them.

It will mean that every dollar of American money will be worth just what the President says it is worth. It will mean that the cost of government will mount to such ungodly heights that no man will be able to save, secure in the knowledge that his savings will not be subject to the confiscatory blackjack of ruinous taxation.

It will mean the further sapping of American virility, and with a nation of weak men, the yoke of dictatorship is easily applied.

It will mean that the same social forces which are now hailed as beneficent may be turned to other ends. The power to set a bottom to wages and hours is the same power which may be used to set a ceiling to wages and hours. Witness Europe—labor take notice.

In short, the question of whether Franklin Roosevelt is to be retained for a third term resolves itself into the question of whether we continue American or whether we go to the dreary way of European totalitarian governments. That is the momentuous issue we discuss tonight.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BENNETT CHAMP CLARK

OF MISSOURI

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 11 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. HARRY H. WOODRING

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. Mr. President, very recently there retired from the President's Cabinet an official whom I regard as one of the most valuable public servants who has held a Cabinet position during my lifetime, a man who gave up his Cabinet position rather than sacrifice his views as to the intervention of the United States in foreign quarrels, and as to the matériel which the United States could afford to part with. Night before last at Topeka, Kans., in response to a testimonial dinner which was tendered him by his fellow citizens of the State of Kansas, the Honorable Harry H. Woodring delivered a magnificent address, which I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the RECORD.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

VIEWPOINTS ON THE NATIONAL ISSUES

My fellow Kansans, it will soon be 10 years since I came to Topeka, our State capital, and lived among you as Kansas' twenty-fifth Governor, and the second native-born Kansan to serve as chief executive. With that tenure of office and my service in Washington, I have finished a decade of full, broad, and rich experiences. As a banker in a small Kansas town, I had daily contact with the city, the township, and the county officials. I studied and helped them with their financial problems, helped them solve those problems of local government which are probably the most important to the average citizen and the taxpayer.

Now, as a Democratic Governor of this great State, I worked with the Republican legislature to solve the serious problems pressed upon us by the great depression which had but a year before paralyzed the economic life of our entire Nation. As a member of the President's Cabinet, I have tried to do my part in the great national effort to solve the social, the economic, and the political problems which were threatening our form of government, and, yes, the very existence of our Republic.

In recent years, I have had the further opportunity to observe with anxious eyes the development of other forms of government in other nations, and to consider the possible effects of the impact of new political philosophies upon our American way of life, and to consider the possibility of a resort to force of arms to defend our own institutions.

In this decade, I have first-hand and intimately observed some of the problems of democracy. I have seen local officials without the advantage of special training from the farm or the corner store go into local office and discharge the function of local government in such a way that the community thrived. Local taxpayers received full value for their taxes, and even the thought of oppression by the local government was unheard of. I saw a legislature, composed mostly of farmers, merchants, and lawyers, pass wise legislation for the conduct of the impressively large business of this State.

I saw them improve the tax laws, provide for the educational system, and do their part in meeting the crises of unemployment and agricultural distress brought on us by the depression.

I then went to Washington at the close of an ominous era in our history, the golden age of big business. There had to be a clean-up of the debris left by years of maladministration, by men who forgot the interests of the common citizen, the common stockholders of this democracy. I learned again what I already knew, that no government can survive which is a government only of businessmen, or a government only of labor, or a government only of farmers. That golden decade of the twenties left agriculture prostrate, left labor destitute, and businessmen confused and helpless.

I saw a determined leader and, yes, an equally determined Congress, void of all partisanship, attack the problems as statesmen, dispel fear, and bring confidence again to the common stockholders of our country, and to know that our democracy worked and that it would pay dividends.

The main point that impressed me was that regardless of partisanship, those problems were approached as human and social problems as well as economic problems.

I saw the organized farmers come to Washington, demanding legislation for the relief of agriculture. The laws they demanded were modified and passed.

Organized labor came to Washington demanding the legal right to bargain on equal terms with capital and they also were given laws which did not fully meet but satisfied their demands.

Business came to Washington demanding banking and securities reform and other legislation to protect the depositor and the investor and the honest, able businessman. They, too, received the reform they asked, but like the laborer and the farmer, were refused the right to completely dictate to the Government.

The result was a broad program of social, political, and economic reforms which are today the accepted principles of both major political parties, and which have made our National Government an intimate part of the daily life of every American citizen.

This, briefly, my friends, is the intimate scene that has passed my eyes during the past decade of public life. My observations convince me that the people of this great democracy can rule themselves and that common men can become statesmen and solve their own problems, but that no one class, whether it be labor, farmer, or businessman, can govern any other class, and that the Government must remain a part of every class but not partial to any class.

Democracy should be intelligent coordination and cooperation of government, of business, and of labor combined.

Simply because some things have been done in the name of the Democratic Party does not mean that I have always approved of many of the methods used in Washington to reach objectives, and I have not approved of some of the brainless, impractical advisers that think our democracy must be tinkered with and made over, some of the young ideologists who subscribe to more liberal social and economic viewpoints than I myself hold. I think they should realize that our democracy and the capitalistic system are synonymous, and that America has grown great under this system even before they graduated from Harvard. [Applause.]

I want to say to Americans that no democracy can succeed riding two horses going in different directions. It cannot have one foot planted on the capitalistic private enterprise system and the other planted on a horse harnessed to a state socialism program. They must realize that their unsound economics cannot be transferred into wisdom by legislation and that legislation will not make unsound economy sound.

The primary objectives of a democracy of enlightened progressive peoples, free peoples, is in my mind, and always should be, the constant raising of the social and economic standard of living of each individual and each family that comprise that democracy. But there frequently comes a period of indigestion in the cycle of progress, especially after heavy social reform legislation and expenditures, that were necessary for huge national defense preparedness and modernization expenses now upon us.

With increasing public debt and large annual deficits, it is imprudent and unwise to further introduce new reform projects. Further reform legislation when men need jobs and homes is like giving caviar to the hungry.

I have had a great deal of satisfaction in the fact that my stay and my experience in Washington, my observation of the economic developments in this and other countries, has not changed nor scarcely modified my convictions which were founded and formed in Kansas. [Applause.]

Many leaders of both parties in Kansas and the Middle West have many times expressed the thought which I as spokesman of the Kansas delegation expressed in my address at the Democratic National Convention in Chicago in 1932, when I said that the North, the South, the West, the East recognize agriculture as the basic industry of our country.

Agriculture in all sections is prostrate, and every farm product is today selling below the cost of production. Such conditions have brought failure and ruin to the homes of thousands, yes, millions of homes of American farmers.

Prosperity will never return to this Nation until purchasing power is returned to the American farmer, and we want no radical program. We only want agriculture to sell its wheat and its corn and its cotton and its hogs and its cattle above the cost of production, and it will in turn then buy from the industrialists their farm machinery, their automobiles, their radios, their clothing, and the shoes, and the very necessities and the comforts of American farm life.

The West and the South plead for the rehabilitation of the American farmer, his home, and his family. We plead for economic stability and social justice. We know that real relief to agriculture must come through a liberal program, of course, based, though, on sound business principles. We do not ask to tear down business and industry to help the farmer. We want to restore business and industry through the revival of the basic industry of the Middle West.

And so I said that at Chicago, and now I have only become more convinced today of my then convictions. I have watched our national prosperity rise and fall with the rise and fall of the national farm income, and I am as firmly convinced today as I was in 1932 that permanent prosperity cannot come, that a balanced National Budget which is supposed to follow an increase in national income will never come until we balance the budget of the middle-western farmer.

We have found no permanent solution of our agricultural program. There may be no satisfactory solution under present changing world conditions today. A Secretary of Agriculture from the Middle West has made a tremendous effort, with a measure of success, to bring temporary relief, and we in Kansas have cause to be grateful to our Government for the aid without which the drought years might have wholly destroyed the value of large sections of our great State of Kansas.

Yet the Middle West must still be vigilant to protect our agricultural interest. We must convince the Nation of our conviction that when the Middle West is sick the Nation cannot get well.

At this time, there is consideration of a proposition which may be far reaching in its effect upon the whole economy of the Middle West as well as upon Middle West agriculture. The proposed Pan-American Cartel may be sound from the standpoint of its effect upon our international relations. I agree that measures must be taken to prevent economic penetration of South America by nations whose purposes and economic policies are inimical to ours. But we should not be a party to any cartel or any other proposal which will sacrifice the interests of the Middle Western farmer.

For instance, if it is proposed to pool the surplus wheat of South America and that of the United States and sell it on the world market, we should have assurances that the price paid to the United States farmers will not be the same as that paid to the farmer of Argentina. We have had one sad experience in which the surplus agricultural products of this country were held by the Government in the showcase of trade and depressed the market price almost to zero, and we don't want another Hoover board.

In connection with just such a proposal, we want and will insist upon subsidies or price guaranties which will bring to the United States farmer not only the cost of production but that part which will enable him to have his fair share of our national income and to maintain the American standard of living for all American farmers.

In stating that nations whose purposes and economic policies are inimical to ours should be kept out of the Western Hemisphere I do not for one moment want to be understood that I am advocating that it is any business of ours what form of government any European or Oriental nations may choose.

I EXPECT TO REMAIN A NONINTERVENTIONIST

It is, after all, none of our business if certain European nations choose one form of government over another. May I take this occasion to say to many friends whose inquiries have come from all sections of the country, that I have always been, I am now, and I expect to remain a noninterventionist, a noninterventionist in both the military and political controversies of Europe, and I am a strong advocate of keeping this country out of recurring European wars.

I hold that it is not necessary for America to provoke antagonism with any peoples because their nations choose one form of government over another. We naturally believe and are sympathetic to the democracies of the world, but as they wage war our aid should not be determined upon the issue of whether it be a defensive war to maintain their war-won empires, or an offensive one to maintain a European balance of power, or, no, not even if moral and social problems of European peoples be involved.

Our aid should be generous, and upon a strict basis of cash and carry—wheat, pork, arms, and airplanes alike, but only aid to that point that the sale of products to foreign nations does not jeopardize the defenses of our own country. There need be no first line of defense beyond our own possessions if we refrain from provoking belligerencies with any of the warring nations of this world. What is our quarrel with any power in the Orient? What is our quarrel with any nation in the Far or the Near East? What is our quarrel with any nation of Europe or Asia?

WE HAVE ALL WE CAN DO TO MIND OUR OWN BUSINESS

We have all we can do to mind our own business and prepare like hell to insulate this hemisphere from war. A neutral America with a friendly attitude to all nations, backed up by a powerful, prepared army and navy, is an America that has anticipated the path of wisdom and has anticipated the path of peace. It is the only path that America may wisely follow if honestly in search of peace, if honestly determined to keep out of war.

Some say this formula did not guarantee peace for some other major nations of the world, but I want to remind you that our antecedency does not involve us in the power and the imperialistic controversies of the Old World. We must and we are going to spend billions to insulate the Americas against war and to assure our position of speaking with authority for peace.

I believe this policy of nonprovocative attitude and billions for preparedness is the best insurance for peace in America. No insurance, however, can guarantee absolutely that there will be no fire, yet we can only pay premiums as a safeguard for peace.

Billions appropriated today cannot be converted into preparedness tomorrow, and anyone who provokes belligerency, a near state of war for this Nation, must do so with the knowledge that we are not and will not soon be prepared for a major conflict.

The real decision that confronts our Nation today is whether we have responsibilities or obligations to any warring nations sufficient to cause us to assume an increasing provocative position that eventually will involve us in their war.

Our will to peace is the first guaranty. Our force is the supreme guaranty. The human conscience of all the Americas, of all of us, cannot remain unsympathetic to those Europeans who also only ask and wish to be free people, and yet no honest, conscientious citizen need insist on involving 130,000,000 free Americans in century-old European conflicts.

If it be any encouragement to them, I trust that our friends so sorely tried in the democracies of the world will remember that physical force rarely conquers free peoples, although it may defeat their armies.

If reaction from my leaving the War Department as a known noninterventionist has caused modification of some policies, and has sobered some of those provocative and meddling advisers of the administration who would strip our own defenses, then I regret that I have only one set of guts to sacrifice on the altar of public service.

Whether I remained as Secretary of War or continued in the service at another post, is unimportant. Whether I continued to serve or return to Kansas as a private citizen is of no consequence, in comparison to the real issues confronting our Nation at this time.

However, I am grateful, I am appreciative, and I am humble before the President of the United States for the privilege of having served my country to the best of my ability. The fact that a Kansas country boy, without previously seeking or holding public office. could be elected Governor of this great commonwealth of ours, and subsequently serve in the Cabinet of the President, is further evidence that our great democracy does work.

There is another proof that demccracy works. It can meet emergencies when the time comes. In this great hour of need for accomplishment, the wisdom of President Roosevelt in calling to Washington the Knudsens, the Stettiniuses, and other successful men of industry will be proven to be wise. The National Government, I have said, must be above business but have the confidence of businessmen so that it can call upon them to carry their part of the obligations of preparedness. It must be above labor and yet be able to call with confidence upon labor leaders to also do their share.

There is a big job to be done. Besides constant consideration for the solution of domestic problems we must prepare to insulate against war coming to this Western Hemisphere. As an advocate of peace I have consistently for the past 8 years in Washington been an advocate of preparedness.

You will recall that in January 1934 many who now criticize and offer criticism for failure to prepare are the same ones who wanted to hang my hide on the fence because I wrote an article for a national magazine suggesting that the boys from the C. C. C. camps receive elementary military training.

If my suggestion had been followed then, today we would have over one and one-half million military-trained young men as Reservists for this great Nation of ours in its emergency.

Now, as a private citizen, I continue my plea for preparedness by advocating that all of us serve our country in its time of need. As taxpayers we must all dig a little deeper. Our young men must face the problems of real training. Some of our industries must turn from making the comforts and luxuries of ordinary life to fabricating the instruments of destruction.

We face this stern necessity of preparedness with sorrow, but I hope also with firmness and with realism, for I have faith in our democracy and know that under it in times of peace we have in the past and will in the future raise our people to the highest standards of culture and of prosperity.

If our democracy is to survive, we must then be willing to sacrifice to maintain it, to maintain our institutions, our homes, and our families.

And now, my fellow Kansans and Topekans, Mrs. Woodring and I again take our places as private citizens in Kansas. It has been a great experience for me in Washington. A Kansas boy has dined with kings and queens, with princes and princesses, ambassadors and foreign diplomats, and has sat at the right hand of the President. But, truly, a Kansas boy has seen Utopia from the mountaintops. But today a Kansas boy returns to heaven; he returns to Kansas.

Dedication of American Flag at Office of Carolina Process Co.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 11 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

ADDRESS BY R. C. ANDERSON, PRESIDENT, CAROLINA PROCESS CO.

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have published in the Appendix of the RECORD a description of an impressive service held at the Carolina Process Co. on the morning of July 4 for the dedication of the American flag.

The private ceremony, attended only by the personnel of the office and employees of the company, took place at 7 o'clock on the lawn directly in front of the main office building.

The patriotic speech for the flag-raising exercises was made by R. C. Anderson, president and treasurer of the Carolina Process Co. and a former officer of the United States Army. Immediately following the speech W. P. Rhodes, employee of the main office, raised the flag, where it will remain for permanent display at the top of the 50-foot pole recently erected for the purpose.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICAN FLAG DEDICATED IN IMPRESSIVE SERVICE AT CAROLINA PROCESS CO.—R. C. ANDERSON DELIVERS ADDRESS AT DEDICATION CEREMONY HERE

An impressive service was held at the Carolina Process Co. this morning (Thursday) for the dedication of the American flag.

The private ceremony, attended only by the personnel of the office and employees of the company, took place at 7 o'clock on the lawn directly in front of the main office building.

The patriotic speech for the flag-raising exercises was made by R. C. Anderson, president and treasurer of the Carolina Process Co. and a former officer of the United States Army. Immediately following the speech, W. P. Rhodes, employee of the main office, raised the flag where it will remain for permanent display at the top of the 50-foot pole recently erected for the purpose.

Mr. Anderson's dedication is quoted as follows:

"We, in the security of our land, this day pay tribute by memory to the historical Declaration of Independence that, sealed by blood sacrificed on the battlefield, provided the privilege of individual freedom it has been our good fortune to enjoy. That liberty is now threatened. The battle of might against right across the sea will determine the future of democracy. We may soon stand alone in the defense of that people's form of government, and courage is essential in this hour of peril. This Fourth of July should have greater significance in the heart of every American than at any time since the Declaration of Independence was approved by the people.

Democracy has served this country well and deserves energetic support of every American. The United States, still a youngster, has grown from a courageous beginning to an envied, important place in the world by the development of our vast resources. That was encouraged by freedom of individual action limited only by the rights of others. That progress must, and can be, continued without change of Government. There are those who believe they know best what is good for the people, but the American conviction that people can better govern themselves than be governed, if the will of the majority is recognized, stands unchallenged.

The requisite of government is to provide adequate progress for a contented society. Absolute social tranquillity is not possible under any conceived form of government. Democracy offers the best possible solution for the elimination of social distress, but like all other forms of government it provides no reward without effort, and to the satisfaction of foreign interest ambitious to obtain the vast wealth of this Nation, too many of our people have not availed themselves of the opportunity for progress. There are those among us who are susceptible to foreign influence destructive to democracy because, unfortunately, they have but their lifeblood to protect and would possibly fare as well under any form of government. Unselfish Americans among them, however, must certainly realize, even in their misfortune, that the unlimited opportunity provided for every individual by our Constitution is available for their children and if necessary would fight for the protection of that birthright. Most of our successful citizens have come from humble families. The mayor of our largest city is of immigrant parentage. Negroes have advanced from slavery to prominent positions in life in less than a hundred years.

That is evidence of opportunity unknown in most countries, particularly in totalitarian states, regardless of false claims made for sympathy and support of selfish ambitions. Immigrants in this country, except those in the propaganda service of their homeland, have praise for the liberty enjoyed here, and, having known the disadvantages of restricted opportunity, most of them are taking full advantage of freedom to acquire material possessions in this country. Their success should not be envied by born Americans, for we are privileged to spend our lives as seen fit, and if opportunity is unkind due to lack of preparation or effort we should not complain. In this country, thanks to democracy, death alone eliminates individual opportunity, and it is never too late to start converting wasted time to preparation for a more abundant life.

Nazi-ism, fascism, and communism are natural enemies of democracy. Much hatred is now rightly directed against nazi-ism and fascism, but, unmindful in the heat of anger, communism, our most eminent danger, has been temporarily overlooked. The threat of nazi-ism and fascism is contingent upon the result of the battle overseas, but for too many years communism has been organized in our land to promote discontent and class hatred in preparation for revolution. The undermining influence goes on daily. That organization is a "fifth column" not dependent upon war material. Its most effective weapon is propaganda. The people, deceived by false promises, are expected to take over the helpless Government and surrender the country—victory without battle.

Democracy is our only hope for continued progress and must be preserved at all cost. We must not shackle our children to our position in life. They, too, must be free to live their own lives. We have no right to sell out their birthright—unrestricted opportunity. It is current information that the "fifth columns" of foreign nations eager for the wealth and resources of our country—the result of unrestricted opportunity—are organized here to destroy all means of resisting infringement on our independence. It is the duty of such organizations to convert to their cause as many as possible—government officials, military leaders, educators, and captains of industry. Their activity also includes the spreading of class hatred by influencing the less fortunate to believe they have been mistreated. The procedure is modern-type warfare and the organizations are enemies in disguise. In our country this freedom of speech and assembly shields the destructive forces; that is our constitutional right; but it is difficult to imagine the privilege was provided to protect organized effort publicly directed to destroy other rights provided by the safe Constitution. We can no longer be indifferent to "fifth column" activities. The vanguard of all "isms" must be exposed and deported without delay.

The administration of our Government is responsible to us for the preservation of our Constitution, and it is our duty to select only the most conscientious Americans for public office, regardless of party. Every aspirant for public office should be required to publicly denounce nazi-ism, fascism, and communism—not one or two but all three—and pledge themselves to the complete support of our Constitution, as is, unless revised by the majority of our people. More important at this time, they must be required to pledge every ounce of their effort to free the United States of all foreign influences destructive to democracy. It is time to take inventory of American loyalty, and the vast number of citizens indifferent to politics in the past must now join in the voice of the people.

It is a profound privilege to dedicate the raising of Old Glory here today to wave in all its significant splendor, and while it is being hoisted to its rightful place above our land, let us now pause a moment to thank God for America.

Compulsory Training

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ERNEST W. GIBSON

OF VERMONT

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 11 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

EDITORIAL IN THE RUTLAND (VT.) HERALD

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be printed in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial on compulsory training which appeared in the Rutland (Vt.) Herald on July 2.

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

[From the Rutland (Vt.) Herald of July 2, 1940]

COMPULSORY TRAINING

A good many people shy away from conscription, compulsory military training, or selective service (call it what we may) on the same grounds put forth by Senator CAPPER, of Kansas, that it invades personal liberty. This is a catch phrase that does not mean very much when the Nation is faced by a military emergency, for personal liberty must be merged with the interests of the whole or the liberty of all may be lost.

Compulsory training seems to be essential if the United States is to be prepared for self-defense. The old hokum about a million citizens springing to arms overnight will not work, never has worked, is pure rhetoric and wishful thinking. Neither is it enough for young men to be given a little perfunctory drill in the manual of arms and close formation. As things stand now, they may be much more useful to the Nation as truck drivers or mechanics than as riflemen.

Military training then may get down to training a million men as fighters who actually handle weapons and 5,000,000 men and women who are essential to defense. If we had sufficient time, the whole economy of training and military service might get down to judicious selection of citizens for certain industrial as well as military jobs, for we know, in the light of the experience of France and England, that it takes more than a year or two to put a nation in position to defend itself adequately.

If the cry of regimentation is raised let us declare such an emergency as will fuse all such objections in the defense of the Nation.

The military part of it would come in the fact that such conscription of industry would also be a conscription of labor, notwithstanding Mr. Roosevelt's pious assertion that national defense can be achieved without the surrender of the hardly won advantage which labor now possesses. France, defeated and prostrate, knows now that it can't be done. The people of Great Britain may discover to their sorrow that national safety cannot be won without national sacrifice.

So we are facing in this country not only the need of more soldiers, sailors, and mechanics, but for a great many more people in industry who are working, not for a 6-hour day or a minimum wage but to save the Nation as possibly the last bulwark betweeen liberty and the way of life (if it can be called living) under a dictatorship. So the artificial issue of infringing personal liberty in time of peace must yield to the larger, universal issue of preserving the Nation.

Selective Compulsory Military Training and Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD R. BURKE

OF NEBRASKA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 11 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

STATEMENT BY GRENVILLE CLARK

Mr. BURKE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there may be inserted in the Appendix of the RECORD a statement from Mr. Grenville Clark, chairman of the national emergency committee of the Military Training Camps Association of the United States, which is supporting the Burke-Wadsworth bill for selective compulsory military training and service.

There being no objection, the statement was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

In this morning's press there appeared two sharply contrasting statements with reference to the Burke-Wadsworth bill for selective compulsory military training and service. One of these recounts the action of 23 college presidents, who, at a conference in New York yesterday, endorsed the principles of this bill.

These men took a clear-sighted and realistic view. They understand what every well-informed person willing to face the facts is rapidly coming to understand:

1. That our integrity and institutions are gravely and imminently threatened by the sweep of the Nazi power.

2. That selective compulsory military training and service is the only measure that can provide any assurance of our ability to resist that threat. The kind of vision and leadership exhibited by these leading educators is more needed now than at any time in our history if we are to survive as a free country.

In sharp contrast, the same newspapers reported a statement issued by a "committee on militarism in education" flatly opposing what they term "military conscription in peacetime." Their long statement contains so many misconceptions as to the purpose and effect of the Burke-Wadsworth bill that I am constrained to point out a few of these errors.

The statement refers to the proposed "military regimentation of the entire manpower of our Nation." This characterization is utterly without basis as applied to the Burke-Wadsworth bill which is the only measure now pending on the subject. Such a statement could not have been made by anyone who had carefully read the Burke-Wadsworth bill or followed the testimony before the Senate Military Affairs Committee concerning its purposes.

The fact is that this bill does no more than provide a flexible instrument whereby such military manpower as is needed, whether in large numbers or small, may be chosen under the fair selective system adopted during the World War with the consent and approval of the vast majority of the Nation.

The bill does not prescribe any particular number of men to be called out but leaves the determination of that matter solely to the judgment of the President, acting in accordance with the national need and subject to appropriations by the Congress. It may be that the present crisis will call for the mobilization of large numbers of men or it may be that relatively small numbers will be sufficient. To represent the bill as a proposal to raise a vast Army whether needed or not, is therefore a total misconception.

The statement does not deny the need for compulsory service if and when we enter a technical state of war but seeks to distinguish between the necessity of compulsory training and service in what they call peacetime from the situation now existing. The sponsors of this bill deny that this distinction is sound.

Our present situation is unique in the history of the country in that although we are technically at peace we are faced with a graver and possibly more imminent threat of foreign aggression than we have ever been under in our history. The position taken by these gentlemen amounts to this—that we would have to adopt a declaration of war before we take the necessary steps to prepare for war and thus safeguard our national existence. They are willing to gamble our country's future upon the possibility of being able to raise and train enough men after war is formally declared. As a matter of common sense and prudence, in these days of lightning war, we are simply unwilling to take that gamble.

The statement wholly ignores the fact that, as repeatedly shown in our history and shown again in recent months, voluntary recruiting is impotent to obtain enough men or anything like it. The figures tell the story. These show that in the 6-month period ending July 1, 1940, the Regular Army recruited only enough men to make a net increase of about 32,000.

There is no evidence whatever that voluntary recruiting can possibly give us sufficient men to resist Hitler if he attacks us. The evidence is exactly to the contrary. In the face of these facts the vote on the passage of this bill will constitute the acid test as to whether or not the American people really wish to stand up to Nazi aggression. If they do, this bill is essential, because in no other way can a sufficient number of adequately trained men be obtained.

If the American people do not wish to resist Hitler, no better way could be found to insure our surrender after a brief and helpless struggle than to follow the advice of the Committee on Militarism in Education—that we refrain from any compulsory military training until war is actually declared.

The statement further asserts that compulsory training and service before war is declared "is in itself a flagrant negation of democracy." There will be few Americans to agree with this proposition because, as the vast majority well know, nothing could be more consistent with American democracy than the sharing of the risks and obligations of military service by all able-bodied citizens under a justly administered selective system.

Moreover, such a statement is bad history. As General John McAuley Palmer (our leading authority on American military policy) pointed out in the Senate hearings on the Burke-Wadsworth bill, in the first year of Washington's administration he transmitted a proposal to Congress that all able-bodied young men should receive military training, and that after such training they should all serve in units of a Nation-wide army.

Among the members of the committee which signed the statement opposing compulsory training in the present juncture there are doubtless some conscientious nonresistants. These persons acted consistently in opposing any adequate preparation to resist the Nazi menace because if it comes, they would not wish to have any resistance made.

However, there are many others signing the statement who are among the most violent advocates of resistance to dictatorial aggression from abroad. These persons are, we believe, simply making the old error of wanting to have it both ways. They do not wish to be dominated by Hitler and yet they oppose the only measure which in the judgment of our military authorities will suffice to repel this threat.

The old motto still holds that "he who wills not the means, wills not the end."

America Continues to Support Mexico

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROBERT R. REYNOLDS

OF NORTH CAROLINA

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 11 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

EDITORIAL FROM APPLETON (WIS.) POST CRESCENT

Mr. REYNOLDS. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that there be published in the Appendix of the RECORD an editorial from the Post Crescent, published at Appleton, Wis., under date of June 5, 1940, entitled "America Continues to Support Mexico."

There being no objection, the editorial was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

AMERICA CONTINUES TO SUPPORT MEXICO

We have now about a million Mexicans in this country. We have no immigration quota in respect to that country so that any Mexicans who want to come here just come.

Refugees from the Spanish war, particularly the "reds" who dare not return to Spain, have emigrated to Mexico in great numbers. As Spaniards they cannot get into America but as Mexicans they can. So they first become Mexicans. Then with their propaganda under their arms and a knife in their belts they enter America to show us how to improve our country.

Senator REYNOLDS, of North Carolina, recently introduced in the Senate a stack of evidence to show that thousands of Mexicans, lazy, indolent, diseased, and pauperized, have come into this country apparently to get upon relief. And they get there, too.

A recent survey of the city of San Antonio, Tex., showed that there were more Mexicans working, and on relief, in that city alone than the total number of Americans in the entire Republic of Mexico. Since Americans have generally been stripped of their property in Mexico they have quite naturally left that country, but even before the stripping began there were 50 Mexicans in this country to every American below the border.

Meantime, Mr. DIES, gathering information from many reliable sources, declares that already 10,000 Communists have moved into Mexico from France and Spain. California sheriffs are banding together to protect that State from a "definite Communist-front organization" working from the other side of the Mexican border.

While there are exceptions, of course, the general run of Mexicans—that is the mixture of Negro, native, and white—presents a backward mental development, a type of citizen quite low in intelligence.

To solve this problem Senator REYNOLDS has proposed that the number of Mexicans in this country be limited to the number of Americans who reside in Mexico. What chance has his proposal? What chance has any proposal whose purpose is the reasonable and intelligent protection of basic American rights?

We are very critical about admitting through our gates the high type of refugees from Europe we might obtain but our door is wide open to what may justly and accurately be placed near the scum of humanity. We don't seem to believe in locking the door until the bandits have stolen everything in the barn.

Under the existing circumstances we not only turn over millions of the created wealth of this country to Mexico by purchasing unneeded silver at an artificial price but we also continue to tax ourselves and borrow the Nation black in the face to raise funds to support on relief an endless stream of Mexican immigrants.

Admission to the United States of Children From War-Affected Countries

REMARKS

HON. HARRY SANDAGER

OF RHODE ISLAND

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

Mr. SANDAGER. Mr. Speaker, headlines in the morning newspapers indicate that Great Britain, which Hitler has been strafing from the air with increasing intensity, expects an attempted Nazi invasion at any hour.

After reading of the plight of the refugees in the Low Countries and in France many Americans are concerned as to what fate awaits the children of England if an invasion takes place. Bills have been introduced in the House, among which is one of my own, providing for the admission without regard to quota for the duration of hostilities, of children from Great Britain and other war-affected countries.

In the meanwhile thousands of generous and warmhearted people are ready to assume the sponsorship without cost to our Government of these children and are actively organizing in the various States to provide for their reception, their adequate care, protection, and education. I regret that parliamentary paralysis and convention convulsions have prevented early passage of these measures. They are still in committee, and while the gentleman from New York, Chairman DICKSTEIN, is sympathetic and willing to hold hearings on them, the recesses for the two conventions have prevented prompt action. Of course, I am not blaming anybody for this; it is a condition that just seems to defy immediate solution, but the only thing that worries me terribly is that by the time we get ready to take care of these youngsters it may be too late.

I hope that when we get back here later in the month we can get prompt action on one of these measures—I do not care which one, for I have no pride of authorship—but for the sake of humanity and Christianity, let us promptly extend a helping hand to these unfortunate and innocent victims of the new World War. Already the delay in considering these bills is arousing the resentment of the press. On Tuesday there appeared simultaneously in the New York Herald Tribune and the New York Daily Mirror editorials criticising the delay, and red tape and the Christian Science Monitor of Boston has taken a similar position in a news item dated July 10.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to include these press comments as part of my remarks. The editorials follow:

[From the New York Herald Tribune]

BRITAIN'S CHILDREN

Another 350 British children arrived in New York yesterday, and there is something deeply moving in their greeting to these strange but safe and friendly shores. All these little travelers, however, make up only a tiny group; they are children of well-to-do families with relatives or friends here who would no doubt have invited them in any event. The mass evacuation of Britain's youngsters from under the imminent threat of Hitlerian savagery has as yet not even begun. That great task of human conservation has gripped the American imagination. Americans by the tens of thousands are flocking to help with offers of money and hospitality. Fully envisaged, it is a task not only overwhelming in its humanitarian appeal; it not only offers one way at least in which this country could, without the slightest question of military commitment, lend a tremendous moral aid to the heroic British defense of the last line between ourselves and Hitler-Europe; it is also a task on that great scale for which Americans have always believed themselves peculiarly fitted.

Yet American assistance in the project is still tangled in yards of red tape, official conservatism, and plain inertia. The worst immediate obstacles do not even lie in the immigration or neutrality laws; they lie only in the regulatory interpretations which have been given to them and in the difficulty of getting official action to modify rules which, while no doubt necessary under normal conditions, are absurdities when applied against a unique and challenging situation such as this. It is simply another case—but a particularly pressing and appealing case—in which energy, imagination, and coordination are so badly needed in Washington to give effect to policies in which the public will and enthusiasm are already far ahead of the administrative direction. With every request to the volunteer committees for advice as to how one may help the children of Britain there should go an appeal to Washington—to one's Congressman or to the departments concerned—for action that will count. For here is at least one way in which the United States can do something—if we do it, and do it now, while there is still time.

[From the New York Daily Mirror]

Nazi bombs are already dropping like explosive hail on England. Not just on London. Every English town is a target. Hitler has decreed that the British people must be hammered to their knees. The men and women of England are not afraid. They ask no mercy. But they do beseech those nations free from war to "take our children * * * spare them the horror that is almost upon us." And thousands of Americans have answered that plea * * * "Yes, yes! Send us your children!" But cutting across this eager desire to help, this desperate need for rescue, is a maze of legal red tape, a stony barrier of State Department regulations, which keep the children of England within range of Nazi bombs.

The slowness with which official Washington is moving to permit Americans to take in England's refugee children is shocking.

There is a shortage of boats to carry England's children to these safe shores. American boats cannot carry them, because the Neutrality Act says that no British subjects may travel on United States ships.

If President Roosevelt asked Congress to, that law could be changed within 24 hours, to permit children to travel to safety on this Nation's ships.

A United States law prevents the British Government from paying the passage of her children, either "directly or indirectly." That is why you read only of rich English children coming to America.

Still another law—which was passed 50 years ago to prevent the United States Steel Corporation from importing Carpathian labor—prevents a corporation like the United States Committee for Refugee Children from guaranteeing that England's children will not become a public charge in America.

There is a move now under way to get the State Department to change its rulings, and classify England's children as temporary visitors, to permit as many as 100,000 to come in under that classification.

But there is a lamentable lack of support for that measure in Congress. Congress must be asleep. They should listen to the multitudes of Americans, crying: "Let them in! Now! Before Hitler strikes them down!"

The law (which could be changed by Executive ruling) says that only 65,720 British subjects can come into this country during the next 12 months. The law further decrees that only 10 percent of that total, or only 6,572 of those children can come in each month.

That law is an accomplice of Hitler. It is holding England's children where he can strike at them, and by killing children, he can break the will to resist of the men and women of England.

Mrs. Roosevelt addresses a plea for action to the people of America, she asks for pressure on Washington (she should persuade her husband to exert that pressure).

Her arguments are less angry than the Mirror would like them to be; but they are convincing:

"The red tape, the thorny regulations, the worst difficulties can all be swept aside, if you, if I, and everyone else will only insist on it.

"I say the children have been classed as immigrants. But why? They are not immigrants.

"They do not wish to settle and work and make their homes in this country. Their parents do not wish to part with them forever. When the danger has passed, they will go back overseas.

"If, instead of being classed as immigrants, the children can be classed as temporary visitors, most of the difficulties can be overcome.

"New and simpler arrangements can be made for the guaranties that will still be necessary. Visas can be issued freely.

"The children can come in, not in sad little bands, but as they ought to come, by the thousands, until every American ready to do his bit for the children has had his opportunity to do it. Change the children's classification.

"The time is very short. The battle of England is at hand, and if the children are to be saved, we must act now."

[From the Christian Science Monitor]

BRITAIN AND UNITED STATES AT ODDS ON REFUGEE TRANSPORTATION

WASHINGTON, July 10.—President Roosevelt and the British Government were tossing back and forth today the responsibility for getting Britain's army of child refugees to the United States, where thousands of homes have been offered them.

Transportation is the problem that now threatens to sidetrack the large-scale migration of British children promoted at this end by Mrs. Franklin D. Roosevelt and others.

Unable to provide the necessary armed convoys for conducting refugee ships to this country, the British today were proposing that the United States furnish the ships to bring British children to its shores.

Such suggestions have thus far received an official "cold shoulder" here. President Roosevelt, at a press conference, yesterday indicated the transportation problems belong to the British since the United States neutrality law forbids American ships traveling in belligerent waters. The question of enlarging United States immigration quotas to allow admission of additional children, he said, will not be an issue until the present British quota of 6,500 a month is filled.

The possibility of using Red Cross supply ships to bring children across has been considered, but because of British blockade and German occupation of France, these ships have quit sailing for the time being.

The United States Children's Bureau, meanwhile, went ahead with its job of finding proper homes for young refugees. Forms are being sent out to State welfare departments for the listing of certified foster homes and child-placing services. This list will be forwarded to the United States Committee for Care of European Children, in New York, for its use.

OF

HON. THOMAS R. BALL

OF CONNECTICUT

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

Mr. BALL. Mr. Speaker, the people of the United States have at last been awakened to their problem of national defense. It has been a rude awakening. Although many conscientious citizens have been trying for years to arouse our slumbering Nation, their attempts have been in vain, and it has taken the terrible impact of a merciless military machine upon western Europe to call us from our peaceful dreams. Americans everywhere are now awake and alert, and eager to demonstrate their loyalty and devotion.

From coast to coast and from Canada to the Gulf our people read anxiously the news from Europe and the despatches from Washington. They listen daily to the cultured commentators attempt to interpret the news, and they hear again and again the voices of their Representatives in Congress raised in praise or censure. In thousands of American homes the soft and seductive tones of the "fireside chats" receive courteous consideration. Our people listen, they read, and they ponder.

We are not subjects of a proud potentate. We are not mere cogs in a great machine. We are American citizens, devoted to our country, each of us determined to defend our Nation against all enemies foreign and domestic, willing to submit to new and heavy taxes, able to give up worldly things to preserve those of the spirit, but we are going to stand on our own feet, think things through in our own way, and make absolutely sure that the path we are treading, no matter how hard, is the true one. Once we are convinced that we are right, there will be no holding back.

The one thing that this country demands is that its elected servants do their part. I know that we here in the House, no matter how we may differ as to means and methods, are unanimous in our resolve to insure the protection of our people in the sanctity of their homes, and we are doggedly determined that no invader shall ever set foot on the free soil of America.

By virtue of his office the President of the United States is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. This is no mean responsibility. It calls for high courage, common sense, and absolute integrity. I have stated many times that when I believed the President to be right I should back him up, and that when I thought him wrong I should oppose him. Last summer, and again last autumn, I supported the Bloom bill, which was the chief cornerstone in the structure of his foreign policy. I have even voted to sustain his vetoes when to do so was most unpopular. You who know me will, I am sure, believe me when I say that the story I am about to tell you is not told in any spirit of political prejudice or personal pique. I am obliged to tell it, however, and I shall not mince my words.

There is in my district, the Second District of Connecticut, the United States submarine base at New London. We have within the past few days set aside huge sums for the further development of this station. It is a vital link in our chain of national defense.

The board of naval officers headed by Admiral Hepburn, which was appointed in accordance with the act of Congress of May 17, 1938, said this in its report:

> The strategic location of a permanent base of any sort within continental limits is determined more by the requirements of protecting the continental coast as a whole than by the necessity of local protection in any particular limited area.

The board then emphasized the importance of this submarine base to the entire eastern seaboard, and mentioned New London with the following specific recommendation:

> NEW LONDON, CONN.
> 124. This base is the only training station for all submarine personnel, and is especially equipped for this purpose. Facilities which will be available upon completion of approved projects will be adequate, except that river channel should be widened to accommodate, as necessary, the larger submarines. This station also is a component part of the New York-Narragansett main fleet base and should at all times be readily available to fulfill its mission as such.

For some time before my election to Congress it had been evident that this widening of the channel of the Thames River opposite the submarine base was imperative. The larger submarines were being berthed with great difficulty and were in constant peril. At my request the distinguished gentleman from Texas, Judge MANSFIELD, with his customary courtesy, scheduled a hearing for the Rivers and Harbors Committee to consider a resolution to request a review of the reports on the Thames River and the resolution was adopted by that committee on January 24, 1939.

Soon afterward the division engineer at Providence, an officer of the highest integrity, under whom I was privileged to serve in France in the last war, held a public hearing at which representatives of the Navy Department testified. I quote from his report of the hearing:

> The expressed purpose of the improvement is to provide safe navigation for naval craft going alongside and leaving the base. In recent years considerable damage has occurred to both vessels and docks.

And again—

> Material benefit of the desired improvement from the point of view of the Navy would consist of adding to the military value of the base for current and future use in peace and in war.

And still further on—

> The proposed widening of the Thames River in the vicinity of the submarine base as desired by the local naval authorities is necessary to permit appropriate use of the facilities at that station. The required expense is warranted by the resultant benefits to the national defense and to avoid congestion and delay to commercial traffic as the base is further developed.

This report was approved by the Board of Engineers for Rivers and Harbors, a board made up of senior officers of the Corps of Engineers of the Army, selected for their engineering knowledge and technical ability, as well as for their military skill and unswerving devotion, the very cream of the Army. It was then given the careful consideration of the distinguished Chief of Engineers of the Army and approved by him. It was transmitted to the Speaker of the House by the Secretary of War.

Because of the great interest of everyone in eastern Connecticut in the submarine base and prompted, too, by my own feeling that within a short time our country would become aware of its need for greater national defense, I kept in constant touch with the progress of this project. I corresponded with the commandant of the base. I talked repeatedly with the Chief of the Bureau of Yards and Docks. Both these officers stressed again and again the necessity of the work. The senior Senator from Connecticut, as a member of the Senate Committee on Commerce, was untiring in his efforts to get the work approved. As late as March 24 of this year the Assistant Secretary of the Navy stated in a letter to me:

> The dredging project to which you refer is an extremely important project, and we have been attempting to obtain funds for it both through the Army and by means of a Navy appropriation for some time.

The widening of this channel was incorporated in the Rivers and Harbors bill by the Senate Committee on Commerce, it was agreed to by the House, and then the bill was vetoed by the President, who in his veto message said:

> With respect to the few items in the bill that are of a national-defense value, I would be glad to approve separate legislation covering these projects.

Taking him at his word, a bill was introduced which covered specifically those projects that everyone had agreed were of prime importance. In this bill was this project which had been urged as vitally necessary to national defense by every officer in both Army and Navy who had anything to do with it, and approved by the Secretary of War and the Secretary of the Navy. Then the other day the chairman of the Senate Committee on Commerce submitted a report which was ordered printed, and is public property. In it is incorporated the following letter from the President to the distinguished and able Senator:

> THE WHITE HOUSE,
> Washington, June 15, 1940.
> Hon. JOSIAH W. BAILEY,
> Chairman, Senate Committee on Commerce,
> United States Senate.
> MY DEAR MR. CHAIRMAN: In my message to the Congress of May 21, 1940, vetoing H. R. 6264, a bill authorizing new river and harbor improvements, I stated that I would be glad to approve separate legislation covering the few projects in the bill that were of national-defense value.
> Based upon this statement, there has been introduced, and is now pending before Congress, H. R. 9972, a bill which would authorize 23 projects of river and harbor improvement estimated to cost a total of $24,823,000. I have carefully reviewed the projects contained in this bill and have reached the conclusion that the following items are not of sufficient value to national defense as to warrant my approval of them at this time:

Kennebec River, Maine	$2,000,000
Boston Harbor, Mass. (H. Doc. 362, 76th Cong.)	2,300,000
Nantasket (Hull) Gut and Weymouth Fore River, Mass.	141,000
Thames River, Conn.	120,000
Channel from Manteo to Oregon Inlet, N. C.	45,000
Silver Lake Harbor, N. C.	60,000
Charleston Harbor, S. C.	465,000
Oswego Harbor, N. Y.	1,000,000
Total	6,131,000

> It would be my desire that the above items be deleted from the bill H. R. 9972, in view of the necessity at this time of restricting the nonmilitary activities of the War Department in the interest of military preparedness.
> Sincerely yours, FRANKLIN D. ROOSEVELT.

Now here is a situation that should receive wide attention. The President has long prided himself on his attachment to the Navy. His experience during the World War should have taught him that the officers of the Navy know their needs, and can justify their demands. Yet he states in his letter that this project is not of sufficient value to national defense to warrant his approval. Think of it, sir, he has seen fit to dismiss lightly the carefully considered judgment of the highest officers of the Navy and of the Chief of Engineers of the Army. He is not only endangering the submarines, many of which are brand new and very costly, but the lives of their gallant officers and men as well. He is playing fast and loose with the protection of the entire Atlantic coast. I am not blaming the senior Senator from Connecticut who has labored unceasingly for the project, I am not blaming the Acting Secretary of the Navy who is a capable, energetic, and fearless man temporarily receiving the censure of my colleagues for "taking the rap" for his superior, and for refusing to "pass the buck" upstairs. I lay the responsibility on the very threshold of the White House, and I ask in all sincerity if a man who cannot show common sense in little things should be trusted with big things. This is no time for playing lead soldiers. This is no time to dismiss the advice of wise officers who have been tried and found true. This is no time to drop the pilot.

This beloved country of ours needs a President who can lead us in the path of peace. It needs, too, a Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy who can display the qualities needed in time of war. There can be no toying with the destiny of America.

Expert Training or Universal Service?

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY CABOT LODGE, JR.

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES

Thursday, July 11 (legislative day of Monday, July 8), 1940

ARTICLE BY MAJ. GEORGE FIELDING ELIOT

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent to have printed in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD an article by Maj. George Fielding Eliot, which I very earnestly commend to the attention of the Senate. The title is "Expert Training or Universal Service?" I believe the article is in support of the bill which I introduced yesterday by which I seek to build up a standing army, relatively small, which is highly trained, rather than go in for a mass conscription of the entire population, with all the delay and all the confusion which inevitably flows from such course.

There being no objection, the article was ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

EXPERT TRAINING OF UNIVERSAL SERVICE?—MAJOR ELIOT REPLIES TO GENERAL PALMER'S ARGUMENT FOR THE BURKE-WADSWORTH BILL

To the New York Herald Tribune:

I feel a natural hesitation in expressing a difference of opinion with so distinguished an officer and so profound a military student as Brig. Gen. John McAuley Palmer. In the drafting of the National Defense Act of 1920 General Palmer bore a great share, and that admirable piece of military legislation, based on the lessons of the war then just ended, marked a tremendous step forward in the formulation of American military policy. Yet times change and with them, methods; and I do not think that any proposed system of organization or training may be properly criticized on the sole ground that it does not accord with the principles of the National Defense Act. In his book, The United States Army in War and Peace, Col. Oliver L. Spaulding says:

"The National Defense Act has sometimes been said to be the embodiment of a new military policy; it is even spoken of as the first enunciation of an American military policy. This view is perhaps in part justified; the precise form of combination of all the elements is new, but we have seen that each element is old, some as old as the Nation. The policy formulated is remarkably complete, and it is difficult to see how anything more comprehensive could be worked out by combinations of these same elements.

"Without presuming to predict, it may be suggested that future progress is more likely to come by adoption of some new system than by further elaboration of this. The most evident tendencies that may lead to a change are to be found in the increasing use of mechanical power. The airplane, the armored car, the tank, even the humble motortruck, are increasing the complication of operations and their speed. Simpler and more rapid methods of execution are being sought. There are indications that the use of power may enable fewer and smaller troop units to do the work of the many larger ones which we now plan to use. This will hardly mean reduction in the number of men used, but it will mean their redistribution—fewer but more highly trained soldiers at the front, using the new material; more men in the rear supplying it; and more skilled workmen at home manufacturing it."

It is precisely this situation which now confronts us; and my hope is that our Military Establishment may be recast along lines which will take into account these changed conditions. I do not, as General Palmer says, consider that the principle of universal and compulsory military training is absurd. The duty of every citizen to defend his country in time of need cannot be too strongly emphasized. But it is also the duty of those charged with translating this effort into military power to see to it that each citizen does his duty where he can be most effective.

General Palmer thinks that it is wrong to determine the size of a military establishment by any other means than a plan to expand to the full limit of the national manpower. I cannot agree. I think the distribution of national effort between the Army and Navy, including the allocation to those forces and to the industries which support them not only of fighting men but of labor, raw materials, power, and transportation should be the subject of the most careful study, with the missions which the forces may be called on to perform clearly in mind. Unless we can foresee a practical use for a great citizen army of millions, we have no right to allocate to it the disproportionate share of the national resources which its creation would demand; indeed, to do so would be dangerous, the almost certain prelude to disaster.

General Palmer deprecates the study of military geography as a basis for military policy; my own view is that national strategy can have no other basis and that military policy must necessarily conform to strategical decisions. There is a limit to our resources. We cannot have everything. The instruments of defense which we create must be adapted to the conditions under which they will be employed.

While I did not quite ascribe training as the sole cause of the German victories in France, I would not be so far afield in doing so as is General Palmer in stating that the invulnerability of the German tanks was the primary ingredient of those victories. The German success was due, as much as anything, to coordination of effort, giving a tactical, battlefield superiority which the French could not withstand. This coordination sprang not only from the training of the individual soldier, but also of commanders and staffs, and of units in the field; coordination of air with ground forces, and of every element of both with each other. This is not to be achieved by half-trained troops.

It was the misfortune of France that the decisive German blow on the Meuse fell upon the French Ninth Army, composed largely of reservists who had had only 1 year's training during the period (1930-35) when a complacent French government reduced the period of service to that length of time. Only fully trained soldiers and a fully trained army, seasoned, smooth-working, confident in itself and in its leadership, can meet the terrific exigencies of modern war.

General Palmer does not reply to the most serious criticism that I offered of the proposed Burke-Wadsworth bill, and that is its effect on the average citizen, who is all too prone to think that the mere passage of legislation or the appropriation of money ipso facto creates military power. If this bill were to be enacted into law, the average American would immediately begin to delude himself with visions of a great army which would give us complete security. In fact, there would be no security; there would be only masses of partially trained men whom we could not arm, equip or provide leaders for in any reasonable time, and if we tried to do so we would inevitably fatally handicap other elements of our defense forces which are of even greater importance.

By all basic considerations we are a sea power. Sea power is our first dependence in war, our first insurance against war. Appreciation of this fact by all our people is vital to our military security. The type of army we require is one which will be an adequate and immediately ready support to maritime operations; a vast universal service army can be really useful to us only if we are again to undertake large-scale operations in Europe or Asia (in which case we shall have time to create it) or if we are foolish enough to scatter our effort and our resources over too wide a field and thus bring about a weakening of our naval strength that will make it necessary for us to defend ourselves on our own soil.

Time is of the first importance in preparation for an emergency; it is the time element in war and in preparation for war which demands of us that we shall put first things first. War in this year of 1940 is a different matter than war in 1861, or in 1920, for that matter; the study of military history is the only useful guide to the future, but the lessons of military history must be applied to present conditions, not confined within the rigid limits of outworn conceptions or outmoded legislation.

Administration of National Labor Relations Act

REMARKS
HON. B. FRANK WHELCHEL
OF GEORGIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 11, 1940

Mr. WHELCHEL. Mr. Speaker, some features of the National Labor Relations Act are oppressive to manufacturers and ought to be modified.

Under the act, the National Labor Relations Board has such vast authority that the manufacturer is deprived of any control of his business.

Representatives of the Board are sent into plants to investigate the minute phases of the businesses. They have little or no knowledge of local conditions or the reason for apparent deviations from the letter of the law, or rather the letter of the rules promulgated under the law, and they act without consideration for the welfare of either the employer or the employee.

Small plants are closing down and larger ones are in serious danger of closing because of these conditions.

A number of plants have been distressed by the application of a recess rule.

At the request of the employees, manufacturers were giving brief recesses for recreation, refreshment and so on, to break the monotony of the work day. The Board ruled that these recesses were illegal unless approved by the Board, and must be 20 minutes in any event.

Mind you, the plants were observing the hours provisions that applied to them. The workers were simply allowed a definite recess time, some 10, some 15, and some 20 minutes or more, as the employees desired, depending often on distance and other conditions that are not uniform or subject to control.

The Board made its ruling: That any recess must be 20 minutes or more and must be granted then only on the Board's approval.

Orders were issued to numerous plants that they must pay wages for the back time on these recesses. In some cases the amounts ranged up to $500 or more for a small plant of around 150 workers. Some plants unable to pay shut down, I am reliably informed.

Since that time the order has been modified. Now the provision is that after June 10 any unauthorized recesses must be paid. Yet many manufacturers may yet be ignorant of that order and may effect the technical violation of it, without knowing about it, and later have to pay or shut down.

Information is lacking now as to what resulted when some plants did shut down shortly after the order to pay retroactively for such recesses. Doubtless some of them will be able to reopen. Others may not. But the damage is done whether they do open again or not.

Another feature of the order was that the employers were required to pay in cash in the presence of a member of the Board. That was in effect telling the employees, "Your employer will pay you what is your due only when we come and stand over him and make him do it." It destroys all confidence, and I believe it is designed to destroy confidence of the employee in the employer.

In this same connection, representatives of the Board have ordered the employers to provide for private interviews between N. L. R. B. agents and employees, individual conferences, on the employer's time.

Reports of some of these conferences indicate an active effort to antagonize the employers.

"Are you satisfied with your work and pay?" might be a fair question.

"You are satisfied, aren't you?" might be leading, but still fair. Neither method of questioning is used.

Instead, the question is phrased so it is highly leading, as against the employer, in this wise: "You aren't satisfied, are you?"

And if the employee indicates satisfaction, this is thrown in: "Well, if you are not satisfied at any time, let me know, confidentially and secretly, and you will be protected in every way. We'll look after your interests, no matter how unfair your employer is."

Now I submit that such methods should be used only when it is evident that unfair treatment is being used. Under present methods, it seems to be used in all cases.

The method is designed to put the honest employer in a false light and to find the ever-present disgruntled employee who is ready to agree to anything that will injure the interests of the business that pays him his check.

Such methods ought to be stopped. If the agents cannot find there is something wrong at a plant without himself planting the seed of discord in the mind of the employee, then you may be pretty sure there is nothing wrong.

If the employer is found to be wrong and agrees to give his employees back pay that may be due through a technical error, he ought to be permitted to do so without having an agent stand over him to make it appear he is paying under compulsion.

To go into all the phases of the injustice that is being done both labor and employers would require too much time.

The great injustice in the whole thing is that there is no appeal. There is a method of appeal open to some who have much wealth with which to pay the cost, but to many, especially to small factories trying to get under the belt of unemployment, the method is beyond reach.

For them it is pay up or go to jail. They are considered guilty until they are proved innocent. That is the tenor of all the discussions the agents have with the employers and with the employees—that the employer is guilty; that the employee is abused.

And the agent sets the fine, and there is no escape, except by a costly appeal in an effort to show innocence, the guilt already having been established without a hearing.

The foregoing practices are not in keeping with the purpose and intent of the law being administered by this Board, and I submit that the administrative feature or enforcement of this is bringing about dissatisfaction among all that it touches, and should be stopped.

On New Deal Spending

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HAMPTON P. FULMER
OF SOUTH CAROLINA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 11, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE COLUMBIA (S. C.) STATE

Mr. FULMER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I am inserting an editorial carried in the Columbia (S. C.) State paper Wednesday, July 10, 1940, entitled "On New Deal Spending."

This editorial is so sensible and convincing, or should be to those who are almost daily talking about what the President and the Congress should have done, and so forth, that it is my belief that it should be very helpful to those who read the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to get the views of this editorial writer.

[From the Columbia (S. C.) State of July 10, 1940]

ON NEW DEAL SPENDING

Roosevelt haters are saying, "If that fellow hadn't squandered so much money, we'd be all right now. But look at us. We've got to spend billions for defense, and already we are up to our necks in debt." And so on.

That criticism is inevitable, and easy to offer. Most criticisms are easy to present. The habitual critic just lets his mind run along in accustomed channels. He need not think a subject through. His task is the simple one of faultfinding—at times an essential task.

But let's try to think this spending matter through. In 1932 and in 1933 this Nation was in economic distress. That's the kind of situation from which revolution develops. Revolution is not characteristic of people who have enough to eat, adequate shelter, and certain other requirements for tolerable existence. The Russian revolution grew from distress. The Nazi revolution grew from distress. Major movements against democracy today have resulted, in part anyway, from the failure of democracy to work; that is, from its failure to supply the minimum requirements for contentment.

Back in 1933, and thereabout, nearly everyone was saying that democracy wasn't working, but that democracy must be made to work. The New Deal plunged boldly in and tried to make it work. The President seemed to see, almost immediately after taking office in 1933, that he was dealing not with a depression merely but with the makings of a revolution.

In other nations revolution developed. In this Nation revolution has not developed. On the contrary, this Nation stands today as the last remaining great nation in which democracy is likely to survive. Perhaps the big spending advocated by "that fellow" has had something to do with the survival of democracy and of liberty in the United States.

Of course, money has been wasted. There was no adequate experience for disbursing such sums as the Government of the United States spent for defense against domestic distress and its consequences. And some of the spending has been tainted by a too-close contact with low politics. There were, too, Passamaquoddy and the Florida ship canal and quite a lot of minor "boondoggling" (minor as to individual "projects," but not minor in aggregate cost). But policies must be, or should be, appraised by major accomplishments, or by major failures, not by minor slips.

Democracy in the United States has not failed. Would it have failed if the New Deal had remained narrowly thrifty and conserved public dollars without much regard for the general distress, and for the revolutionary rumblings of the early 1930's? No one can answer and prove his answer to be correct. What would have happened under different conditions is an opinion, not a provable fact.

P. S.—The State anticipates this comment: "Yes, but why didn't Roosevelt spend all those billions for armament?" Because no one foresaw the power of the Nazi machine except Hitler and his associates, and perhaps a few revolutionary Russians. The conduct of democratic, representative government in any era, or in any period of several years, is determined by the popular will, or by popular indolence concerning public matters. Only since the beginning of 1940 have the people of the United States realized the necessity for great fighting forces. A proposal of billions for defense a few years ago would have created a popular storm of indignation.

The Hatch Bill

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CHAUNCEY W. REED

OF ILLINOIS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

Mr. REED of Illinois. Mr. Speaker, I shall cast my vote in favor of the enactment of this legislation. I know it contains many imperfections; some of them seem quite patent to me at the present time. Doubtless others will be likewise discernible as time goes on and the law is put in effect. We cannot expect to attain perfection in initiating legislation of this character, but experience will point out the defects and succeeding Congresses can make the necessary corrections. I was an enthusiastic supporter of the original Hatch Act because I saw in my own State how Federal funds were prostituted by unscrupulous politicians in lining up unfortunate persons on the relief rolls to vote as directed. That such unfair tactics had a potent influence on what had heretofore been free elections cannot be successfully denied. Those tactics have not been eliminated by the passage of the original law. By that act only Federal employees were affected. Pay rollers of the State, whose salaries are provided out of Federal funds, are still free to coerce and unduly influence their subordinates with immunity from prosecution. It is to correct this evil that the present legislation is offered.

It has been said that "Federal control follows the Federal dollar." For many years the United States has given Federal aid to States for the construction of highways. Prudence, uniformity, and economy required that certain conditions must be complied with by such States if they wished to avail themselves of this money, and rightfully so. The same situation has developed in the allotment of relief funds and in every other activity of the States wherein the Federal Government has lent a helping hand.

It has been amply demonstrated in the past few years that these moneys have been manipulated in such a manner that an immense army of pay rollers has been recruited whose members are naturally subservient to those vested with authority to allot these funds. If unchecked, it means an oligarchy of Federal and State pay rollers ruled by those in authority at Washington whose sole ambition would be to perpetuate themselves in power. The measure before us today seeks to protect State employees from coercion, just as the original act protects Federal employees.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the scholarly addresses of the distinguished chairman of the Judiciary Committee, the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SUMNERS], and the able gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HOBBS], who oppose this bill. While conceding merit to a great many of their contentions, I believe that their criticisms are directed more forcibly against the measure as it came to us from the Senate than against it in its present form, as amended by the Committee on the Judiciary. As a member of that committee, I, too, objected to the original Senate bill. It went far beyond reason when it prohibited political activity by any employee of a State or local government who exercised "any function in connection with any activity" financed by Federal loans or grants. I concede that it would have been difficult to ascertain how far such a provision would reach, and, had it remained in the bill, a citizen occupying a remote and obscure relationship to Federal appropriations might in the performance of what he considered a highly commendable civic duty have found himself a violator of a Federal statute. The Committee on the Judiciary considered this legislation for many weeks. It finally struck out all of the Senate bill, including the above obnoxious clause, and then wrote an entirely new bill as an amendment. The prohibition in the pending measure is directed only to those employees of a State or local agency "whose principal employment" is in connection with any activity financed in whole or in part by Federal loans or grants. This limitation brings under the act only those who ought to be there. The others must be dealt with as each individual State sees fit.

Without doubt, there are some just criticisms that can be directed against this measure. In my judgment, however, it is not an unreasonable condition to be attached to the use of Federal funds and its merits outweigh its imperfections. It is directed at an evil in American politics that has been growing by leaps and bounds. It will not purify politics, but it will make them less impure. It will not eliminate corrupt political machines, but it will render less opportunity for them to become more corrupt. It will not make bad politicians good, but it will give honest politically minded citizens a fair opportunity to have their voices heard in the affairs of their Nation. It will not destroy the States. It will prevent them from destroying themselves by surrendering their rights and prerogatives to those who control the purse strings at Washington.

Better Not To Have Any Preparation Than To Be Half Prepared To Defend Our Country or Our Hemisphere

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. BUELL SNYDER

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

Mr. SNYDER. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD I wish to include what I think is a conservative estimate for national-defense equipment and installations if we are to think in terms of protecting our country and the Western Hemisphere against foreign foes during the years to come. It goes without saying that the Government and industry must, and I feel sure will, speed up production at a rapid rate such as was never attempted or accomplished in this country. I hope I am wrong, but I am compelled to take into account recent acts and achievements of foreign powers who could and might be knocking on our back door, demanding admission to disturb our freedom and liberty-loving institutions as well as our very lives. I say I hope I am wrong, but taking these factors into consideration we must be prepared and keep prepared until such time that the war lords and conquerors across the water show us by their actions over a space of years that they no longer desire to disturb us. It will take at least five decades for them to show us this. Therefore, we must prepare in a big way. I recommend that we equip the Nation with at least the following:

A. That we manufacture and have on hand by July 1, 1943, 100,000 airplanes of different types and kinds.

B. By July 1, 1943, we should have manufacturing facilities and plants in perfect maintenance and upkeep in order to be able to manufacture 1,000 airplanes a day if an emergency would arise—or by putting on full shifts, 2,000 a day if necessary.

C. We should have manufactured by July 1, 1943, 4 million rifles, and facilities to manufacture 2,000 of them a day—or 4,000 by putting on full shifts.

D. We should have by July 1, 1943, 4 million machine guns of different types and kinds, with facilities to manufacture 2,000 a day—or 4,000 with full shifts.

E. We should have on hand by July 1, 1943, 75,000 tanks and armored cars of different types and description, with manufacturing facilities to produce 500 a day if necessary in an emergency.

F. We should have on hand by July 1, 1943, 2 million anti-aircraft guns of the finest and best type, with facilities to manufacture 1,000 a day—or 2,000 with full shifts.

G. We should have on hand by July 1, 1943, 100,000 anti-tank guns, with a certain percent of them capable of piercing 3-inch armor plate, with facilities to manufacture 500 a day.

H. We should have on hand by July 1, 1943, clothing, tentage, shoes, and full field-service equipment for 4 million men.

I. We should have by July 1, 1943, manufacturing facilities scattered throughout the Nation to manufacture sufficient replacements for all these commodities at a speed necessary to assure equipment on hand in case of an emergency invasion of our shores or institutions.

J. By July 1, 1943, we should have completed at least three transcontinental superhighways as outlined in my bill, H. R. 8503. That is, an 8-lane highway following the general route of the Old National Pike or Route 40 across the Nation, built as straight as possible, and with a grade of not more than 4 percent at any one place. The same type of highway should be built up and down each coast some 30 to 60 miles from each coast. Of course, the other six highways embodied in my bill should be, and will be built in time—but these three should be built without fail, to be used for the transportation of the commodities of commerce as well as a military road in case of necessity. Experts think this would be the cheapest national-defense installation, looking to the conservation of our whole Nation, that we could build. These three highways would cost about $4,000,000,000 to build them eight lanes, or 100 feet wide, with proper facilities along the highways.

K. We should have by July 1, 1943, about 2,000 air bases or air fields developed. In the interim the United States Army Engineers should select throughout the Nation about 15,000 landing fields. That is, fields that if an emergency day came, could be put into condition for landing planes within 48, or 120, or 168 hours. These should be circled within a radius of so many miles outside of each city that is considered a large industrial and manufacturing center.

L. By July 1, 1943, we should have several scores of underground hangars along our main highways, as well as underground storage facilities for our munitions. The hangars, in time of battle, are very essential as discovered in the war now going on across the sea.

M. And finally, we should have by July 1, 1943, sufficient munitions of all kinds in storage to use these guns and weapons for months if necessary, without running out of munitions. The two things that hampered the French the most were traitors within her own ranks, and, second, a shortage of munitions.

I have no doubt that some who read this will think that my estimates are exaggerated—that the program is too ambitious. Some will think it is not necessary to make such provisions. Others will think it is too expensive, and so forth.

But, Mr. Speaker, it seems to me that all of us are convinced that our way of life is worth preserving. We are convinced that our schools, our churches, and our homes, are worth preserving.

We are convinced that this blessed endowment that we received from our forefathers called freedom of speech, freedom of press, and religious freedom, is worth fighting for. Yes, we are convinced that if we wish our children and our children's children to enjoy these blessings, we will have to build up a national defense that will insure their preservation. The partial recommendations that I enumerated above I think we will find absolutely essential within the next score of years to defend our precious institutions. Yes; Mr. Speaker, we will have to eat fewer ice-cream cones, chew less chewing gum, burn less gasoline, deprive ourselves of a lot more things we classify as semiessential or pleasure and recreational adjustments, to provide this equipment. But it is better to have no equipment at all than to be one-fourth, one-half prepared.

We learned the lesson over and over again in the last year. We saw nation after nation in Europe that was one-fourth or one-half or one-tenth prepared, being ruthlessly run over—and, my fellow citizens, whenever a barbarious ruler directs his forces to run over a peaceful, God-fearing people like the people of Holland, Belgium, or similar nations, then it is time for us to prepare in a big way to see to it that no force will be able to run over us or to fly over us and destroy us.

The trouble is, my friends, that we here in America do not realize the horrors and hardships that result when a dictator takes over a country such as Poland, Czechslovakia, and so forth. We do not seem to realize that they kill off the educated and intelligent people. We do not seem to be aroused over the fact that they close all of the schools except the very elementary schools. We do not seem to understand that all the precious things that are near and dear to us would be wiped out under a dictatorship such as now reigns over Poland, Czechoslovakia, Denmark, and so forth. We do not seem to realize that our Negro slavery was heaven compared with the slavery that these conquered people have to endure.

Yes, my friends, I believe if you were in possession of the facts and background that I have as chairman of the Appropriations Subcommittee for National Defense, you would agree with me that my suggestions or recommendations, if you please, enumerated above are moderate compared with the value of our liberties and our free country.

National Defense and "Fifth Columnists"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LUTHER A. JOHNSON

OF TEXAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

RESOLUTION BY LIONS CLUB OF WAXAHACHIE, TEX.

Mr. LUTHER A. JOHNSON. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks, I submit herewith the resolution unanimously passed on July 2, 1940, by the Lions Club of Waxahachie, Tex., relative to national defense and also subversive activities commonly known as "fifth columnist" activities.

This resolution reflects not only the sentiment of the Lions Club of Waxahachie, but of the entire population of the Sixth Congressional District of Texas, which I have the honor to represent, and of which Waxahachie is a part, and I believe that it also reflects the sentiment of the American people at this time.

Unpreparedness and "fifth columnist" activities were largely responsible for the downfall of a number of democracies in Europe, and we must not permit such to be the case here.

Whereas the slogan of the International Association of Lions Clubs is "Liberty, intelligence, our Nation's safety;" and

Whereas the Lions of the Waxahachie, Tex., Club are vitally interested in, and deeply concerned for, the safety of the United States of America: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Lions of this club, assembled in Waxahachie, Tex., on July 2, 1940, hereby assure the President of the United States, and the Congress, of their approval of legislation enacted, and proposed to be enacted, to keep the United States safe in a world being consumed by war; and that we respectfully but earnestly urge further immediate and positive action to assure a degree of preparedness such as will safeguard our free democracy; and be it further

Resolved, That the Lions Club of Waxahachie, Tex., urge the immediate enactment of such legislation as may be necessary to put an end to the subversive activities of agents of foreign powers, paid or otherwise, who are plotting and working against our democracy; and that the Congress enact further legislation to inflict drastic punishment on any citizen or any alien, working in the interests of any foreign power, who may willfully engage in any activity whose purpose is to defeat or overthrow our democratic form of government; and be it further

Resolved, That the Lions Club of Waxahachie, Tex., stands resolutely for freedom of speech, freedom of the press, freedom of thought and individual liberty; that to this end we believe in adequate and substantial preparedness; and that the Lions Club of Waxahachie, Tex., ask for a definite part in carrying out the program of preparedness and stopping the subversive activities of aliens and of all who would hamper the task of the Government in making this country fully prepared to defend its liberties and rights; and be it further

Resolved, That the Lions Club of Waxahachie, Tex., heartily endorse the work of the Dies congressional investigating committee and the Federal Bureau of Investigation of the Department of Justice, and emphatically urge that their powers be broadened and that ample appropriations be made to enable them to combat all subversive activities, thereby further guaranteeing our Nation's safety; and be it further

Resolved, That duly authenticated copies of these resolutions be sent to the President of the United States, to the President of the United States Senate, to the Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, and other leaders in Congress.

Fulton Lewis, Jr., Speaks on "July 4, 1776"

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SOL BLOOM

OF NEW YORK

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Monday, July 8, 1940

BROADCAST MADE BY FULTON LEWIS, JR., OVER THE MUTUAL BROADCASTING SYSTEM, THURSDAY EVENING, JULY 4, 1940, SPEAKING AS FROM PHILADELPHIA, ON JULY 4, 1776.

Mr. BLOOM. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include therein the following text of the broadcast made by Fulton Lewis, Jr., over the Mutual Broadcasting System, Thursday evening, July 4, 1940, speaking as from Philadelphia, on July 4, 1776:

Good evening, ladies and gentlemen, this is Fulton Lewis, Jr., bringing you, as usual at this time, the news of the day.

And there is very vital and memorable news tonight. It may have terrific impact on the future of the world.

This afternoon, July 4, 1776, the Continental Congress, which is sitting here in Philadelphia, has finally taken the irretraceable step. At a very tense and momentous session this afternoon they adopted and issued a formal proclamation, that these Thirteen Colonies of ours, here in the New World, are no longer colonies of the British Crown. We no longer recognize the sovereignty of King George the Third. It was what you might call a declaration of independence, telling the world that, beginning immediately, we are a free and separate Nation, a union of States, and we request the other nations of the world to accord us all rights and privileges as such.

As you know, Congress has been debating this question for some days now, exactly 5 weeks ago tomorrow. On June 7, Mr. Richard Henry Lee, who is a Member of Congress from Virginia, introduced a resolution declaring—to use the exact words of the resolution "that these united Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States," and that they are hereby "absolved from all allegiance to the British Crown."

As you well know, that caused a terrific controversy in Congress. There are two widely separated factions. One is what you might call the isolationist group. They believe that we should break with the Old World; we should live our own life, and we should not involve ourselves in affairs across the Atlantic, and we should not submit to dictation and interference and meddling from across the Atlantic. These isolationists say that we should govern ourselves, and make our own place in the world, and they were the ones who have been supporting Mr. Lee of Virginia.

The other faction is what might be called the appeasement group. It is the Tory Party, really. They believe that we should try to reach a peaceful settlement with King George, and should remain under the British Crown. They are not sure we are strong enough to stand on our own feet, and fight off the British troops that are now here.

And so, through all of these weeks, the gentlemen of Congress have been considering the points at issue, pro and con. The discussion has been very heated, at times, and it has gone on day after day and evening after evening, in the lobbies and the taverns in Philadelphia. Everything has been done in executive session, behind closed doors as usual, and day before yesterday, as you may know, they finally brought the issue to a vote. They approved the Lee resolution by a rather large majority. The actual vote, of course, has been kept a secret, but I was told on good authority that it passed by a very comfortable margin.

President John Hancock, who comes from Massachusetts, you know, appointed a special committee to draft a formal proclamation, this one that was issued today. Perhaps you'd like to have the names of the gentlemen.

The members were the distinguished publisher and editor of Philadelphia, Mr. Benjamin Franklin; Mr. Robert R. Livingston, the young lawyer from New York; Mr. Roger Sherman, of Connecticut, who had begun life as a shoemaker; another young lawyer from Virginia, who has been in Congress only a short while, Mr. Thomas Jefferson; and the able lawyer from Massachusetts, Mr. John Adams. Supposedly, Mr. Adams was to have drafted this momentous document, but when the facts leak out, as they probably will some day, it will be discovered that young Mr. Jefferson really was the one who did it, and there was a rather interestesting reason for that.

As you know, Mr. Adams has been one of the leading advocates, behind the scenes, in this movement to declare our independence, but he felt that he was unpopular and so that a document which he might draft might not be so well received. He felt that young Mr. Jefferson had a much better flare for writing, and a much greater ability to express himself, anyway, so, after they all had adjourned to a quiet back room, in a little private house near the statehouse, the committee insisted that Mr. Jefferson do the actual drafting.

Incidentally, in spite of Mr. Jefferson's youth, he is attracting considerable attention in Philadelphia. If his constituents allow him to remain in Congress a while, and get a little seniority, you may hear quite a little from him, in the future.

On June 28, the final draft was ready, the committee laid it before the entire Congress; it was amended and passed after 3 days of discussion. This afternoon President John Hancock signed his name at the bottom, and so did the secretary of Congress, Mr. Thomson, and that made it official.

It's too lengthy to read in full, but the first part is particularly important. It says:

"When, in the course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands, which have connected them with another, and to assume among the powers of the earth, the separate and equal station—to which the laws of nature and of nature's God, entitle them—a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

"We hold those truths to be self-evident:

"That all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator, with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness; that, to secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that, whenever any form of government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter it, or to abolish it, and to institute a new government, laying its foundation on such principles, and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness.

"Prudence, indeed, will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes, and accordingly, all experience hath shown that mankind are more disposed to suffer—while evils are sufferable—than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed.

"But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to reduce them under absolute despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government and to provide new guards for their future security."

Then it goes on to list the various grievances that we have against our King, or rather against the man who was our King, until this afternoon. The oppression, the interference, the taxation, the arrogance, and finally it closes with the actual declaration to the world that from now on we are free and independent States, and we have renounced all allegiance to the British Crown.

The document was then taken to the local printing shop of Mr. John Dunlap, and copies of it are being struck off, to be distributed to the public, and it will be interesting to see the reaction of the average citizen, when he reads it. Even some of the aristocrats, the best social families of Philadelphia, who, you know, took the attitude in the beginning of this fight for liberty that this was a movement of hoodlums and rowdies, even they will nod their approval, as they read. in a great many cases.

Of course, it was impossible to get any wide circulation of this document this afternoon or this evening, so there was no demonstration or celebration. But Mr. Franklin has given orders that the entire document be printed in the next edition of his newspaper, the Pennsylvania Evening Post, which comes out Saturday—day after tomorrow—and in that way the public will have an opportunity to read and digest it, and the city officials have planned a general celebration in front of the statehouse on Monday. There will be music; there probably will be a huge crowd. You know the population of Philadelphia is almost 20,000 people, and it's quite conceivable that several thousand might be on hand. The plan is to read this Declaration of Independence, from the steps of the statehouse, and then to ring the huge bell in the steeple, to announce to the world the new-found liberty of the New World.

To be entirely objective, it's very difficult to stand off and evaluate a development of this kind today. It's hard to see, at the moment, whether this means the beginning of a great and powerful nation, based on the principle of peace and justice and freedom, or whether the Tories are right when they say that people cannot rule themselves. Only time will tell that. If the Tories are right, 10 years from now may find this proclamation of today a forgotten scrap of paper, but if these young men of Congress—and most of them are young—the chief support behind Mr. Adams on this move for independence has come from the younger men, most of them still in their thirties, like this young Mr. Jefferson—if they are right, who knows? Some day this country may grow to have as many as a million people, and this 4th day of July may be celebrated as Independence Day, and the statehouse may go down in history as Independence Hall, and the big bell there which will ring in honor of American liberty next Monday may be known the world over as Liberty Bell.

Now, about our national defense, the dispatches from New York are not too encouraging. General Washington is building up his army as much as he can, you know, and he has a tremendous force at the present time. He has over 10,000 men to defend the city from the British, but the military experts are rather fearful that even that is not enough to hold off the invading fleet under the command of Lord Howe. To be entirely candid, they're afraid that General Washington's defense of New York is dictated more by political considerations than it is by military advisability. The public wants New York defended, but the military men say that that defense is almost impossible, and they rather expect that General Washington will have to withdraw within the next few days. Sir William Howe, the brother of Lord Howe, is ready to begin landing troops at any moment.

One of the greatest difficulties is that public sentiment in New York City is not in support of this revolution. The internationalist sentiment there is very strong indeed. There is very serious fear that most of the population of the city will help the enemy instead of helping our own forces when Sir William Howe does begin his attack. And in that connection, there is a special dispatch from Paris which says that Portugal has adopted something similar to that as a deliberate plan of warfare against Spain.

Portugal, you know, is very much in need of colonies. She wants sources of raw materials, and she has had hungry eyes for the Spanish colony of Brazil.

It seems that Portuguese ships have been visiting the ports of Brazil for many months, leaving soldiers who are disguised as travelers and businessmen. No one suspected them but when the Portuguese Fleet arrived and began to attack from the water these soldiers suddenly threw off their disguises and brought out their firearms and attacked from inside, and the result was that a large part of Brazil has been lost to Portugal by Spain in the last few months.

There is one encouraging angle, from the point of view of our own American prospects, and that is that we have developed a secret weapon that is far superior to anything the British have. It's a new form of rifle with a very long barrel that can shoot nearly three times as far as the British muskets can shoot, and so General Washington's men are able to kill the British before they can get in shooting range. Lord Howe has offered a reward of 5 pounds to anyone who will capture one of these weapons for him. He wants to send it back to England, presumably to be copied for his own men.

So there's the story, ladies and gentlemen. That's the top of the news, on this 4th day of July 1776, that may be very momentous in world history.

And if this thing that we Americans have done today does live, if this theory that you and I can rule ourselves is sound and is able to continue, I wonder whether those who come after us will understand what we're going through to achieve this freedom.

Let's pray that in 1800 and 1900, and even further—say in 1940—the American people whoever they are and whatever they have and however great and wealthy and comfortable they may be—let's hope that for their own good, they will understand their freedom and appreciate what it means, and keep themselves strong enough to protect it.

It's a bitter and bloody job getting it, once it is gone.

And now, until tomorrow evening, good night.

Amendment of National Labor Relations Act

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. E. E. COX

OF GEORGIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE WASHINGTON DAILY NEWS

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Washington Daily News of July 3:

[From the Washington Daily News of July 3, 1940]

DUTY FOR THE SENATE

Almost 4 weeks ago—on June 7—the Smith amendments to the National Labor Relations Act were adopted by the House. The vote was 258 to 129, a large number of Democrats joining with Republicans in support of the amendments.

(On that same day—how remote it seems now—General Weygand went from Paris to the Somme front and ordered a withdrawal of Allied advance units before furious German attacks. France, still hoping against hope, was revealing her fatal weakness, her lack of weapons to resist Hitler's mechanized might.)

All that has happened since that day has emphasized the need for enacting the Smith amendments. We know, now, that we must prepare as France did not. We know that our Government, while protecting the rights of labor, must stop inciting ill will between workers and employers; must promote industrial peace in order that production may be unimpeded.

Yet one motive behind the renewed administration drive for an early adjournment of Congress is a desire to prevent these Labor Act reforms from coming to a vote in the Senate.

The Smith amendments are aimed directly at that spirit of zealotry which has controlled the present National Labor Relations Board and brought the Labor Act into disrepute.

They were drafted by a special House committee, after long and thorough investigation of the Board's record of maladministration, bias, and incompetence.

They are approved by the American Federation of Labor, but bitterly opposed by the Congress of Industrial Organizations, whose president, John L. Lewis, aspires to dominate all labor and all industry.

Their most important provisions would:

1. Abolish the present Labor Board and create a new one, also of three members. That would eliminate the two men who have failed as administrators. For, if the President were unwise enough to renominate J. Warren Madden and Edwin S. Smith, their stewardship would have to be submitted to the test of Senate examination, and by that test their names would be blacked out.

2. Separate the functions of prosecutor, judge, and jury, now combined and grossly abused in the present Board. That would remove opportunity for unfairness even if, which seems almost impossible, the new Board should prove to be as lacking in fairmindedness as Messrs. Madden and Smith have been.

We do not contend that the amendments, as passed by the House, are perfect. We do contend that it is the Senate's duty to get them out of the pigeonhole where the Senate Labor Committee is trying to keep them, to debate them fully, to improve them if need is shown, and to bring them promptly to a vote.

And we repeat: Any Member of Congress who votes to adjourn and go home before this and other items of important unfinished business are cleared should be ordered by his constituents to stay home.

STATEMENT BY THE METAL TRADES DEPARTMENT OF THE AMERICAN FEDERATION OF LABOR

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following statement recently made by the Metal Trades Department of the American Federation of Labor:

The international presidents and their representatives affiliated with the metal trades department, A. F. of L., in national conference, Thursday, June 20, 1940, gave earnest consideration to the problems presented by the urgent necessity for rapidly developing the Nation's equipment for national defense.

It was the unanimous conviction of these international unions that they should give every possible assistance to the rapid production of material for national defense. While their membership records indicate a large number of skilled mechanics now unemployed, or working at some other occupation, it was recognized that the requirements for adequate national defense may, in the near future, make necessary the special training or retraining of skilled workers for some of the industries which will be engaged in the production of material the Nation's defense necessities require.

It will be the immediate purpose of these international unions to investigate the present supply of skilled labor available in all classifications in the metal-working trades, and from the data secured from the membership throughout the United States, to determine where retraining or special training will be advantageous.

There are two well-established Federal agencies which must play an active part.

From the time, in 1935, when the Federal Committee on Apprentice Training, Department of Labor, established equal representation of management and labor on the committee, the international unions affiliated with the metal trades department, have annually gone on record in support and in approval of the purpose, the policies, and the rules and regulations adopted by the Federal Committee on Apprentice Training, for the purpose of establishing bona fide apprentice training in the United States.

The present national emergency makes it mandatory that apprentice training should not be neglected, but instead, should be extended so as to adequately maintain the supply of skilled craftsmen required in the manufacturing industries.

As an immediate contribution to production, apprentices cannot play an important part, for it will require from 3 to 4 years' training before an apprentice becomes a competent journeyman, equipped by training and practical experience in industry, to do the work required of a craftsman.

Since 1935 the international unions, comprising the metal trades department, American Federation of Labor, have taken an active interest in the work of the Federal Bureau for Vocational Education.

In 1935 an advisory committee to the Federal Bureau for Vocational Education was created, this committee having equal representation of management, of labor, and of vocational teachers. On this committee the metal trades have had continuous representation.

In the present national emergency vocational teachers will play a prominent part, in some instances to teach skilled workmen to do work requiring special skill, but principally to train large numbers of inexperienced workers to enter the industries for national defense as specialists, those who must be taught the knowledge and skill to perform a few operations in connection with manufacturing under mass-production methods.

The purpose of the international unions constituting the metal trades department will be to assist in the maintenance and further development of the genuine apprenticeship system as defined by the program, rules, and regulations of the Federal Committee on Apprentice Training, and to give every assistance to vocational education under the Federal Bureau for Vocational Education in the training of the lesser skilled to perform those operations which are so definite a feature of modern mass production.

The international unions in the metal trades department pledge the Nation to give every assistance within their power to place skilled workmen where they are required for national-emergency production. In connection with these and all other trade-union activities, the international unions will protect the right of labor to voluntarily organize into trade-unions, to bargain collectively with their employers, and to make use of those basic rights of all American citizens—freedom of speech, of the press, of assembly, and to voluntary collective action for lawful purposes.

The international unions in making their pledge to give the Nation every possible support, must take into consideration the fact that there are at present some 10,000,000 unemployed in the United States, and that a goodly number of these are skilled craftsmen. While fully realizing the part that training must play, the international unions believe first consideration for employment should be given to the present unemployed and those skilled workers now employed in less satisfactory occupations. At present a large number of the most highly skilled mechanics are being denied employment because of unsound and unjustified age-limit barriers.

When the Nation entered the World War in 1917, these international unions gave their pledge to give every possible support to the Nation in the winning of the war. Their record during this period is an evidence of how loyally and patriotically that pledge was honored.

In the present national emergency these international unions again pledge their loyal, active, and cooperative support to the Nation in the effort to speed production required for national defense. These international unions pledge themselves to the Nation with an understanding of their responsibility to contribute their full share to the Nation's defense, and the protection and perpetuation of those institutions of freedom which are now menaced by totalitarian powers.

Letter to Senator Wagner in Reference to Democratic Platform Declaration on War

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LOUIS LUDLOW

OF INDIANA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

LETTER BY HON. LOUIS LUDLOW, OF INDIANA, TO SENATOR ROBERT F. WAGNER

Mr. LUDLOW. Mr. Speaker, I have today sent the following letter to Senator WAGNER:

JULY 11, 1940.

HON. ROBERT F. WAGNER,
Chairman, Convention Committee on Resolutions,
Stevens Hotel, Chicago, Ill.

DEAR SENATOR WAGNER: I am writing to invite your attention, and through you the attention of your committee, to the advisability of including in the platform of our Democratic National Convention a clean-cut, forthright declaration in favor of giving the people a right to vote on proposals to send our boys into war overseas.

The time is particularly appropriate for the adoption of such a declaration by our convention, and I do not have the slightest hesitation in predicting that on that plank alone we would sweep the Nation.

Not only should we, in my opinion, adopt such a plank, because of its righteousness and its conformance with the principles of democracy for which our party stands, but it would be politically wise and advisable to do so, because it would positively remove in advance all doubt about the outcome of the November election.

I do not speak from conjecture, because I know the sentiment of the people of the United States on this subject. I have been in touch with countless thousands of the folks, and I have an enormous volume of correspondence, filling many file cases, that has been built up over a period of many years when I have been advocating the adoption of a constitutional amendment that would give the people who have to suffer and, if need be, to die and to bear the awful burdens and costs and griefs of war the right to vote on sending our boys into the hell of foreign wars. This very direct and first-hand evidence of public sentiment has been supplemented by five Gallup polls, which have shown the American people to be overwhelmingly for the principle of this proposed constitutional amendment.

I say without hesitation that if we Democrats are looking for a winning issue that would be both right and effective, this is the one. No other issue half as popular as this one could be found. It would sweep the country.

This is an issue made to order for us by the Republican national platform, which adopted a weasel plank on foreign relations, a plank that faces all ways and means nothing. Never was a platform constructed more scientifically to dodge the issue than the Philadelphia platform. It is a typical politicians' platform made to get in on and leaving it to the party to stand any way it wants to after it gets in. If our Democratic National Convention has the vision and straightforwardness to adopt an unevasive declaration that the people shall have something to say as to whether our country shall enter foreign wars that are not of our creation, we shall see one of the most notable exhibitions of a political platform backfiring that was ever witnessed in this country and the politicians who drafted the Philadelphia platform will be taught the lesson that mere cleverness and slickness does not win votes in times of extreme seriousness such as we are passing through at present.

That the plank I propose for a referendum on foreign wars is in harmony with true Democratic thought is shown by the fact that the Young Democrats of America, 5,000,000 strong, in their national convention at Indianapolis in 1937, with James Roosevelt presiding, unanimously and with great enthusiasm adopted the following resolution:

"Resolved, That we favor a Nation-wide referendum before declaration of war except in case of invasion or internal rebellion."

In conclusion let me say that the war referendum plank which I propose would be strictly limited to a declaration for a referendum on taking part in overseas wars. If the United States or any other country in the Western Hemisphere is attacked or invaded the referendum would not apply. The proposal would not impair our national defense in any way, shape, form, or degree, and the Monroe Doctrine would be fully safeguarded and protected. We who advocate a referendum on foreign wars believe in the strongest possible national defense.

I enclose for your information a copy of my war referendum resolution which in the past has had the support of a majority of the House of Representatives who signed a discharge petition asking for its consideration. I am sure that many Members of both branches of Congress would be immensely pleased if your committee, in its wisdom, sees fit to endorse the principle of this proposal in the platform to be submitted to the Democratic national convention next week. Will you kindly give the matter your thoughtful consideration?

Very sincerely,

LOUIS LUDLOW.

The Postal Service

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES P. McGRANERY

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

ADDRESS BY HON. JAMES P. McGRANERY, OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. McGRANERY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following speech which I delivered recently at Pottsville, Pa.

The great Commonwealth of Pennsylvania is represented and the Federal Government of the United States is symbolized more truly by your convention here in Pottsville today than by any assembly of lawmakers at Harrisburg, or by any conference of businessmen in Philadelphia or Pittsburgh at any time. For, as our distinguished Postmaster General, the Honorable James A. Farley, has said with characteristic wisdom and simplicity:

The Postal Service is "the most effective instrument of human democracy that exists in this country today."

General Farley quoted the inscription which I have often observed and read with appreciation upon the walls of the postoffice of the city of Washington in the District of Columbia:

"Messenger of sympathy and love, servant of parted friends, consoler of the lonely, bond of the scattered family, enlarger of the common life. Carrier of news and knowledge, instrument of trade and industry, promoter of mutual acquaintance, of peace and good will among men and nations."

These words are indeed rich with the meaning of democracy and, at the same time, expressive in a realistic way of the mission of the service to which you are dedicated.

You are familiar with the history of the development of the post, and you have long since realized that it has run parallel to the development of our country. The history of postal communication is a history of the growth of the American Nation because without the former, we would not have had the latter.

From 1672, when Governor Lovelace of New York decreed that there be a monthly post between New York and Boston, until 1691, when William and Mary granted to Thomas Neale, by letters patent, power and authority to establish a postal system for the American Colonies, there had been many short-lived postal routes. Thereafter, the postal system under successive Postmasters General continued to unite and expand the life of the Colonies—until 1753 when the British possessions in North America were divided into a northern and a southern district, with a Postmaster General for each district. The Mason and Dixon line began in that year, marking the division between Pennsylvania and Maryland, between the northern and southern postal districts. Thereafter could be seen the divergent tendencies which culminated more than a century later in the Civil War.

It is interesting to us that one of the Postmasters General of the northern district was Benjamin Franklin, who was dismissed from office by King George in 1774 for insubordination.

Not until 1789, following the adoption of the Constitution, was the first Postmaster General of the United States appointed in the person of Samuel Osgood, of Massachusetts. When our Nation began, it was the author of the Declaration of Independence, Thomas Jefferson, who foresaw the part that the postal system would play in the expansion and unification of these United States. Constantly he stressed the need for speed and dependability of the post, which he visualized as the artery of the States, the bond of communication between those who were living in the States, and those who were pioneering westward. That is why Jefferson was known as the father of fast mails, and that is why, when he became President, the Post Office Department achieved a new record for the efficiency of its service and of its administration.

Another great Democrat gave deserved recognition to the Post Office Department in 1829, when President Andrew Jackson invited the Postmaster General to become a member of his Cabinet.

Through the following decades the Postal Service continued to occupy a more and more important part in the life of the Republic, just as it did in the lives of Americans whether they lived in the cities, on farms, or in small communities.

It is not surprising that the great American who was to heal the breach between the North and the South had in the beginning of his career the opportunity of serving in the post office, that civic center where his neighbors were wont to gather to greet each other and chat, where they solved their personal and local and national problems as they sought letters from friends and kin. On May 7, 1883, Abraham Lincoln was appointed postmaster of New Salem, Ill., by President Andrew Jackson. And Lincoln continued as postmaster until 1836, when that post office was closed.

Undoubtedly the experience that Lincoln there obtained prepared him, as no other experience could, for the task of leadership that was later to be his. He had come to know men and women and their view of life in an intimate way, in the American way, as you do who see them day by day in their friendly moments. The informal, kindly manner with which he spoke to his neighbors then was his ever afterward.

You, too, have learned that never varying courtesy and accommodating service from a firm and lasting foundation of good will in your communities.

In New Salem, Ill., Lincoln was the representative of the Government of the United States in a more actual, intimate fashion, than later when he lived in the White House, remote from the men and women who are Americans. Yet, the knowledge that he acquired in New Salem was invaluable when the crisis of our Republic came.

Today, the United States is facing a world crisis, more fundamentally menacing than that which rocked our Government during the Civil War.

Across the seas war and chaos have destroyed the many countries that gave birth to the ancestors of our fellow citizens and to many of our fellow citizens themselves. There are, in our country, today many aliens recently come from the lands transformed by nazi-ism, fascism, communism, into totalitarian states.

With war hysteria ravaging Europe, it is not surprising that the dread of the rapacious, gluttonous power of the totalitarian state should cause an emotional reaction here—even among lovers of democracy.

Strangely enough, that dread has, in many instances, taken the form of imitation of the Nazi persecutors. The treasured civil liberties for which the founders of our Nation fought and bled in the revolution are now being threatened by many who call themselves Americans.

The Attorney General's Department has called our attention to the outbreaks of mob violence against Jehovah's Witnesses whose religious beliefs forbid them to bow to anyone but their creator, and hence, to salute the flag. The F. B. I. has investigated these cases to protect the civil rights of these religious people and to prevent the continuation of Nazi methods of persecution.

Recently, the House of Representatives passed a bill to deport one Harry Bridges, "notwithstanding any other provision of law."

The Attorney General, the Honorable Robert H. Jackson, has expressed his opinion of this bill as a direct violation of the constitutional provisions for due process of law and against any bill of attainder.

It is important that the country be protected against dangerous aliens; but it is equally important that the proper legal methods be used to this end. We cannot violate our Constitution to accomplish even a good purpose. Democracy is more vital than the expedient suppression of one of its enemies.

Our administration has a true and sincere reverence for the Constitution, the life spirit of the Republic, as this opinion of the Attorney General well indicates.

The administration under our great President, Franklin D. Roosevelt, has labored long and silently to make possible in our country the continuance of the democratic way of life.

All the progressive reforms advocated and brought into being by Roosevelt have served to bind Americans together into a more justly ordered community.

During this administration, and for the past 7 years, our country has been at the same time building up a defense Army and Navy, both of which had been sadly neglected during the previous administrations. At the present time our Navy is greater than that of any other single country in the world. And on Saturday last the House of Representatives authorized the building of a second Navy equal in size and power to that which we now have, in order that adequate defenses be maintained for the Atlantic and the Pacific coast lines.

The wheels of industry have begun to turn in cooperation with the Government to provide for the mechanized defense of our Nation.

All that, however, will not suffice—unless we can maintain the spirit of democracy here. It is possible, indeed, it is necessary to have union and tolerance living side by side. Intolerance breeds disunion, disruption, and mob disorder.

The "fifth column" wants first of all to stimulate mutual distrust among Americans. The Government agencies of the F. B. I. are adequate to police the "fifth column."

Another Government agency, the most influential of all—the post-office system—can accomplish more by quieting the temper of the men and women in local communities than could any other organized group. As the artery through which flows the lifeblood of communication, as the bond among the townspeople, each local post office is still a civic center just as it was in Lincoln's New Salem. To many Americans the postmaster is the only representative of the United States Government whom he knows or will ever know.

A word of calm, a message of faith in the stability and durability of the Republic, a reassurance of the necessity for tolerance—these can be effective in keeping the citizens of our country neighborly.

The preservation of the Nation's integrity is indeed certain and safe today, as it has always been in the hands of men and women who are worthy successors of Franklin and Lincoln and the equally great and patriotic, if nameless, members of the Postal Service, of whom it was said:

"Neither snows nor rain nor gloom of night stayed these couriers from the swift completion of their appointed rounds."

Why the Securities Acts Were Passed

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. LEE E. GEYER

OF CALIFORNIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

ADDRESS OF FORMER NEW YORK SUPREME COURT JUSTICE WILLIAM HARMAN BLACK

Mr. GEYER of California. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I reproduce a speech delivered by a former New York Supreme Court justice. We may all study this with profit.

REMARKS OF FORMER NEW YORK SUPREME COURT JUSTICE WILLIAM HARMAN BLACK AT THE MEETING OF THE ATTORNEY GENERAL'S COMMITTEE ON ADMINISTRATIVE PROCEDURE

Mr. Chairman, the subject we are here to discuss briefly falls under six questions:

The first is why the Securities Act and the Securities Exchange Act were passed; second, was there an evil to be cured; third, was the remedy set forth in the acts properly devised; fourth, have the acts been successfully administered; fifth, are they adequate to their purpose; and sixth, if they are not adequate should they be amended.

If the acts were not the result of what they were designed to remedy they should be repealed or amended, but if they were necessary the only other question is whether or not they have been properly administered. If they have been properly administered, and if they were needed they should be continued upon the statute books, and every effort should be made to perfect them by any amendment that may be necessary.

Certainly, the passage of the acts fulfilled the classical requisites Blackstone laid down for the passage of any law; i. e., that there was a situation fraught with evil potentialities, that the public thought that legislation was necessary, and that the legislation offered a remedy, if not a cure, for the evils.

The Securities Act has been on the statute books about 7 years, and the Securities Exchange Act has been on the statute books about 6 years. There has been no demand to repeal them, certainly no demand considerable enough to cause any change further than amendments which sought to strengthen the acts. We must presume, therefore, that they were demanded by the state of affairs that existed when they were passed, that they were adequately drawn to effect their purpose, and that they have been not only honestly administered but administered with a fair measure of success considering the changes that they effected in our systems of selling securities, and in conducting the exchanges that sold them.

It should be a matter of congratulation that the stock exchanges, which have a habit of being blamed for all the acts of all their members, and are usually accorded but little credit for the good things they do, have had practically no part in attacking in the ccurts the Securities and the Securities Exchange Acts.

There is a strange timidity that is the curse of every innovation or any attempt to improve any branch of our Government. The people, acting through our Representatives and our Executive, first boldly crystallize their opinions into laws. But often before the laws have had a chance to be tested some of the people begin to fear that maybe they were not necessary, and maybe they are not perfect, and maybe they can never be made perfect. As history goes, 6 or 7 years is too short a period to test any law of importance. There must be the trial and error born only of experience to see what the result of any law is, and only the average of years suffices to determine whether or not the result can be successful. Patience is required to correct defects, and the lack of patience or the lack of ccurage to be patient is fatal to progress. Frequently, too, this patience is requisite because what cannot be accomplished in 1 year or in one decade may be easy of success in the next year or the next decade. But success is never attained unless within a reasonable time there is enough progress to encourage the faltering and enough results to warrant the hope of final fulfillment. During such a period of definite experimentation many nostrums are sure to be suggested, usually not long enough after the experiment has started to enable those who would perfect a statute or a system to effectively gage its course or to amend it to correct its defects. These are truisms that every statesman knows, but every statesman is further perplexed because, before a reasonable experimentation period elapses there are frequent appeals to the courts that embarrass, and are intended to embarrass, the officials who are trying to succeed. Some of these appeals to the courts go to the very heart of a measure by attacking its constitutionality. Others attack the administration of laws because they give too much "judicial" power to administrators. The Securities and Exchange Commission and the two acts have not escaped some of the attacks, but they have weathered them all.

As to attacks on constitutionality, I am quite content to follow in the then wake of John Marshall, who is quoted in the case of Ware against Hylton in the Third Dallas United States Reports at page 210 as saying:

"The legislative authority of any country can only be restrained by its own municipal constitution. This is a principle that springs from the very nature of society, and the judicial authority can have no right to question the validity of a law unless such a jurisdiction is expressly given by the Constitution."

If I read American history right, it is barren of any dire results from enforcing any statute properly drawn, and called forth by a demanding situation, if that law was properly drawn and properly enforced. Certainly no law as sorely needed as the two acts I am discussing ever brought evil days upon the country. The people of the United States have never visited their wrath upon the men who adopted these laws, and as such matters go, there have been few amendments. Indeed, some of the amendments passed to the Securities Acts have been additions rather than amendments.

The people of the United States, I must assume therefore, are satisfied that the laws were needed; that they were carefully framed; and that they have been judiciously administered.

But having failed to have these two acts declared unconstitutional, it is not beyond the bounds of probability that they may be attacked in other ways. One of these ways would be to demand that there be administrative courts to supervise, control, or set aside the decisions of the Commission that enforces these laws on the ground that the acts give to the officials enforcing them too much judicial power.

Speaking for myself, and with some experience on the bench and 50 years' experience at the bar, I have no misgiving as to the enforcement of any properly drawn acts by competent and honest officials. Neither am I afraid that any act of theirs may be improper because it is called judicial; that is to say, because it is an act involving the exercise of discretion or anything like judgment. To my mind, the turning off or on of an electrical switch frequently involves a higher and more discriminating discretion than is required to construe a statute or declare that it is or is not constitutional.

A good many years ago England began jitters on this fear that administrators would try to be judges. The author of one of the first books to be written on the subject, Lord Hewart, seemed greatly disturbed because he feared that government officials, both national and local, who had been vested with administrative discretion had overstepped the powers which had been so liberally vested in them. But he seemed to have forgotten that if the official had not exercised the powers he had he would have been impotent to accomplish anything. Lord Hewart and the men before him and the men who followed him therefore suggested administrative courts which should have the power to set aside and nullify what the official had done.

Germany has gone further on this sidetrack of administrative courts than any other country. The theory of that country is that if an official authorized to do certain things exercised his discretion in a manner that was satisfactory to any party to a controversy the only cure was to establish over him a series of verboten courts, either courts of temporary relief or courts of last resort. It was argued that if the administrative courts were to be of last resort they would save the time of other courts which would have otherwise had to consider the sins of the administrators.

If this was true, which I do not believe, that would have been some excuse for administrative courts, but if they were to be merely stepping stones to another court of final decision, they are totally useless.

The history of Germany in such courts has been that their judges floundered in such an overlapping maze, and have so frequently changed their entire legal concept, that they have, in my opinion, proved utter failures. Mr. Rudolph Uhlman, in the Illinois Law Review, while not going to the length I do in criticizing these German courts, has pointed out in elaborate articles the difficulties that beset administrative courts.

As far as these two securities acts are concerned, and as far as any similar reform of any kind is concerned, I am opposed to trying to cure it by sieving all their work through administrative courts. They are not necessary to enforce these acts, and they would clog the splendid work that has been done by the Commissioners of the Securities and Exchange Commission, who have labored with conspicuous success in administering these acts, and whose work will long be appreciated.

Every attempt by legislation to give judicial control over administrative action has to take into account the vital fact that in modern society the administrative branch of the Government must be given a wide scope of discretion uncontrolled and unhindered by judicial supervision. Before we can find a satisfactory solution of the problem we must recognize clearly that discretion is the most important attribute of administration and that without discretion administration cannot function. Any legislative reform should, therefore, be based on the principle that all discretionary acts of administrative tribunals and officers should be final and not open to judicial inquiry and control. Such administrative finality in the realm of administrative discretion would enable the administrative authorities to act with the necessary swiftness and efficiency which are required by present day social and economic conditions. Only true and genuine administrative discretion should be final and not open to a review by the courts. Where an administrative officer or tribunal exceeds or abuses its discretion the courts must be of course free to set aside such administrative excess or abuse. In a given situation the court will inquire whether a certain administrative act is the exercise of the free discretion of the administrative tribunal; if so the court has no power to set aside such act regardless of whether or not it likes the underlying policy through which such discretion was exercised. On the other hand if the court finds that the discretion was abused or exceeded by the administrative authority the court must be free to set aside such action.

The last administrative court bill introduced in Congress, the Walter-Logan bill, passed the House, but since the critique of it by Dean Landis, it has not passed the Senate.

I am of the opinion that it is a shortcoming of the Walter-Logan bill that it completely ignores the fact that modern administration can function only if it is clothed with the power of discretionary action which is not open to judicial inquiry. That bill, by attempting to give to the courts the power to review each and every action taken by administrative organs and tribunals and by substituting judicial for administrative action not only ignores the necessities and exigencies of a sound administration but also violates the principle of separation of powers which is embedded in our Constitution.

My first suggestion regarding the Securities Acts is that there be made an adequate analytical index of the various acts under which the Securities and Exchange Commission operates. For my own use, and in an effort to be helpful, I have spent the last 3 months in making such an index to the Securities Exchange Act. I have not yet finished similar indexes for the Securities Act and the other acts, nor have I finished an index of the rules and regulations issued by the Commission. This is not nearly as necessary as the indexes to the acts themselves. In order to avoid complications with my publisher, I can only agree at present that the Commissioners may use this index, as it will become part of an annual supplement. I have concluded that I am not the first man to write a perfect analytical index, but I have done my best to put enough into each of the 750 catchwords for a lawyer to determine whether it refers to what he is looking for. In addition to the alphabetical index, there will be a duplicate which will follow the same order as the acts themselves.

To reply to the questions I put at the start, I answer that the acts were needed. The history of other forward-looking countries had already approved them in principle or had actually proved the value of such laws. They were demanded by a situation that I need not call your minds back to. There were evils that had to be corrected, and the remedies sought by the passage of these acts were properly devised. If I believed they were not necessary, I should be running counter to the best judgment of the country at large and the best opinion of the exchanges themselves. Even a cursory reading of the acts shows that with the short time at their disposal not even the clever minds which devised these acts could as an original proposition have covered the vast detail that they contain.

Further, I answer that these acts have been successfully administered and that they are adequate to the purposes for which they were passed by Congress. As to whether they require amendment, I prefer to withhold opinion until I have had more time to study the monograph.

I shall start with the premise then that these laws simply crystallized public opinion regarding their necessity and the remedies that the situation required. If they are perfect, they are probably the only things in the world that are. Every other law has had to be tried and studied and perfected.

And it cannot be claimed that their administration has been absolutely flawless. But, considering the importance of the subject, the highly technical nature of the work that had to be done, and the traditional and almost insurmountable difficulties encountered, it can be said that much more than a fair share of success has been achieved by the men of high intellectual attainments, tireless industry, and undoubted honor who have composed the Securities and Exchange Commission. From as intensive study as I have had time to make, I think the people are to be congratulated upon the outstanding results they have achieved.

In the interest of time I have listed some of the things the Securities and Exchange Commission has done, in a note at the end of this paper.

Let me say that the monograph your committee has prepared, which I have only had time to read once, is a monumental piece of work that reflects credit on its authors. It is exceedingly informative and understandable. In the few suggestions I shall make regarding it, I hope you will agree that I have tried to approach the subject in a spirit of constructive criticism.

First, I think the Securities and Exchange Commission is to be congratulated in that it never avoids responsibility by refusing to write opinions, and dissenting opinions as well. It is not afraid to give reasons for its faith. Such a course can only result in warnings to those who do not or cannot see what they should have done or should have left undone. If I may comment on their work, I believe it has been practical, courageous, and time saving. They seem to desire to substitute conference for conflict, and they seem to be quick to acknowledge slight errors that have been corrected by experience. The Commission does not seem to have sought to participate in anything except what the law commands them to take part in.

I congratulate the Commission upon its progress in attempting by conference to get together with the other side in modifying the law regulating the effective date for the registration of securities.

I think the acts should be so amended that political affiliation should be irrelevant to the performance of the tasks of the Commission, because certainly so far there has been no tendency to split along political lines.

I recommend that your committee ask the Securities and Exchange Commission for further data regarding short sales and how they are or should be reported, and the subject of pegging, fixing, and stabilizing registered securities to facilitate their distribution.

I am not in entire agreement with the statement on page 29 of the monograph that "as the assimilation of the field staffs to the organization as a whole becomes complete and as the Commission's policies become crystallized, there will be some shift of intermediate if not ultimate control from Washington to the field. The field should be confined to investigation and recommendation, but the final decision of all important questions should be made in Washington.

Having in mind the report of the Commission on the Whitney matter that the banking business done by brokers involves customers' funds and securities estimated at totaling more than $3,000,000,000, I believe that there should be every effort to cooperate with the exchanges to try to work out a segregation of the chief functions of dealer and broker, under section 11 of the Securities Exchange Act.

Former Chairman William O. Douglas, now a Justice of the Supreme Court, urged the establishment of a central trust institution which would take over from the brokers the banking and credit functions they now exercise, and the present Chairman of the Commission, Hon. Jerome Frank, has urged that the problem of establishing "brokerage banks" or providing equally effective substitute safeguards for customers be immediately attacked and solved by the financial community. But this has not yet been accomplished. The beginning of these changes begun under the present administration of the New York Stock Exchange under Mr. William McC. Martin "constitute at least an interim (and cooperative) approach toward these objectives of customer protection." This approach has been regarded by the Commission as a liberal one, and "the Commission has withheld its own rules and regulations in the hope that the financial community would itself undertake thoroughgoing measures to achieve greater flexibility." While nothing final has been achieved, let us hope that there may be a mutual spirit of conciliation on both sides that will lead us back to that prosperity which is only possible in the restoration of full confidence between the Government and the exchanges and their members.

I have not had time to give the monograph so ably prepared by this committee sufficient study to take its points up in detail, and I respectfully ask that I may have the privilege of supplementing this general statement by a detailed comment on this monograph at the earliest possible date. In the meantime, if I may formulate my views in a few words, I believe that the objects set out in the preamble to the act, and in the avowed "purposes" of the Securities Act should be carried out with the greatest fairness to both sides, and if these objects could be effected with no harm to either side. I favor such modification as the subject is capable of. I favor the greatest power of the Commissioners with the least appeal from their decisions consistent with justice, and I favor detailed and definite study by real experts of each of the subjects covered by the monograph—all of which will redound to the credit of the Government, and most surely result in a restoration of confidence in the exchange and a resulting increase of the legitimate business of the exchange, and especially do I bespeak the maximum of frankness and a minimum of any friction between all sides to every controversy.

The remedy for the present situation is to strengthen the hands of the Securities and Exchange Commission in every way, keep good men on the Commission, and trust to their ability and integrity to administer the law for the best interests of the customers, brokers, and the exchanges and their subsidiaries. As a citizen who has given some five years' study to this subject, I again express my appreciation of the splendid work of the Chairman and of every member of the Securities and Exchange Commission.

SOME OF THE WORK OF THE COMMISSION

For the past 5 years, ending with the fiscal year of 1939, the proposed new issues of securities totaled $14,500,000,000.

At the end of the fiscal year of 1939 there were subject to the jurisdiction of the Commission registered companies representing 51 separate utility systems comprising 142 registered holding companies and including 1,524 individual holding, subholding, and operating companies, whose consolidated assets represented a book value of $14,097,000,000.

Since the passage of the Public Utility Holding Act of 1935, $2,637,718,000 of securities have been issued under its provisions, of which $1,449,810,000 were issued during the year of 1939.

In the last 5 years the Commission has stopped the issuance of 119 security issues, and 14 issues have been delisted because they did not make the required disclosures. The Commission has revoked or suspended the registration of 60 brokers and dealers in over-the-counter securities.

The Commission in the last 5 years has brought 312 suits in the United States courts to prevent the violation of its rules. Two hundred and eighty-eight of these are concluded and 657 defendants have been permanently enjoined from violation of the law.

During the 4 years from 1935 to the end of the fiscal year of 1939 over two billions five hundred millions of securities were issued. Nearly a billion and a half of these were issued during 1939.

Of the 49 orders considered by the United States Court of Appeals, 39 against the Commission were withdrawn or dismissed, in 2 the orders of the Commission were affirmed, and in only 1 was an order of the Commission vacated.

ORDERS REVIEWED

Up to the end of the fiscal year 1936, 1,096 persons had been indicted in 158 cases. In the 98 cases disposed of so far, 403 defendants were convicted.

During 1939 national securities exchanges filed with the Securities and Exchange Commission 265 amendments to the applications for registration.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MARTIN L. SWEENEY

OF OHIO

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

Mr. SWEENEY. Mr. Speaker, the House of Representatives may recall that on May 25, 1939, I addressed the House in reference to actions for libel I proposed to bring against Drew Pearson and Robert S. Allen, authors of the Washington Merry-Go-Round, and other newspapers, for falsely publishing about me that I opposed the nomination of an attorney of Cleveland, Ohio, to the Federal bench for the reason that the gentleman was a Jew.

Of course, anybody who knows me knows the charges were absolute made out of whole cloth and that I have never in my life entertained an anti-Semitic feeling.

Through my counsel, Hon. John O'Connor, former chairman of the Rules Committee of this House, over 70 actions have already been brought throughout this country against Pearson and Allen and newspapers which carried the libel in question and more suits will be filed within the near future. Beginning in the fall of this year, many of these actions will be brought to trial. In the meantime the defendants in a number of the actions have filed motions or demurrers to my complaint on the ground that the article in question was not libelous, and that I could not recover in my actions. In the following jurisdictions the courts have already decided in my favor that the article was libelous and that I have a cause of action.

United States District Court for the District of Arizona.

United States District Court for the Northern District of Illinois.

United States District Court for the District of Kansas.

United States District Court for the Eastern District of Arkansas.

In the action against the Burlington Daily News, Inc. (Vermont) settlement has been effected.

I intend to pursue the matter to the very end because I believe that all persons in public life are concerned with the extent to which a "free press" may go in attributing to public officials false actions or un-American motives. It is for that reason I again call the matter to the attention of this House.

ARTICLE FROM THE UNITED STATES NEWS

Mr. YOUNGDAHL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following article by David Lawrence from the United States News, as follows:

American public opinion has shifted so rapidly in the last few weeks that many observers regard the change as phenomenal. But it isn't. The change from a state of indifferent isolation to a state of alert awareness of the dangers that face American security is the result of a simple and natural process—the conquest of fallacy by truth.

For several years now we have been fed fantastic propaganda about the origin of war. Sincere though misguided men among us, so-called liberals, have been insisting that only munitions makers bring on wars. Or else the contention has been seriously advanced that profiteers contrive in diabolical ways to involve our sons in war.

The blame for the present plight of France and Britain must be placed on those statesmen who refused to face the truth and to drive fallacy to the wall. We in America contributed our share to the debacle. Even the Senate of the United States by its widely publicized munitions investigation gave credence to the doctrine that munitions making makes wars. All over the world the charges and counter charges were exploited. And what was the result? The democracies, including ourselves, stifled the making of munitions by private industry and coincidentally failed to build up the Government plants which were urged so eloquently as the proper alternative.

What powder-making factories do we have today? We haven't a first class plant available to make munitions. We have been misled just as were the British and French before 1937. It takes a long time to build up a supply of munitions and to develop the technique of munition making. Only last week a few of the "educational orders" designed to give private industry the stimulus for an expanding production were let by our Government. This should have been done 2 and 3 years ago.

INDIFFERENCE TO SECURITY IS INEXCUSABLE

The same group of men who smeared the private munitions-makers smeared also a President of the United States on the ground that he dragged America into war to protect our credits and trade. This libel on the character of Woodrow Wilson was widely disseminated so as to bolster the theory that wars are made for gain and not for the defense of ideals or human liberty.

Public opinion became antiwar but at the same time public opinion became antidefense. Indifference to security is inexcusable. The names of the men who have been responsible for failing to permit America's defenses to be built up should be written plainly on the tablets of American history so that this generation may know who it was that conceived the plot to weaken the war defenses of democratic nations.

BLAME FOR OUR UNPREPAREDNESS MUST BE FIXED

It is not too late to institute an inquiry into what influences were at work in the United States between 1934 and 1940 to sap the economic vitality of the Nation on the production side and to frustrate the granting of the requests of the Army and the Navy for new weapons and adequate supplies.

The blame for unpreparedness must be fixed, and fixed soon. America today has very few airplanes, hardly any mechanized weapons for the Army's use, and not enough transports or patrol vessels to take care of contingencies on our long seacoasts. Why have our defenses been neglected?

Certainly the facts about the world situation have been known to our Government. Our military and naval intelligence representatives abroad have told their superior officers in Washington for 3 years just what Germany has been doing. President Roosevelt has had detailed reports from diplomatic representatives of the United States stationed in foreign capitals. The danger that faced the democracies has been well known to the President. Why did he fail to tell the American people so that the Congress would respond by appropriating the necessary sums to build up our airplane industry for defense purposes?

The most commonly advanced explanation is that if Mr. Roosevelt had attempted to arouse the Nation he would have been called a warmonger and that he would have been refused by Congress the grants of funds. But this is no answer. Leadership based on revelation of the facts may fail temporarily; but if the debate is begun soon enough, truth will in time prevail.

What would have happened had Mr. Roosevelt tried in January 1937 to advise the people of the United States of the need for enlarged defenses? He might have been balked by public opinion for the time being; but if it were clear to the people that Mr. Roosevelt wanted nothing for himself, that he had no third-term ambitions, the people would have accepted his argument as a disinterested expression.

Mr. Roosevelt even in 1938 and 1939 had nothing to lose by urging preparedness—nothing except possibly a third term. And many a fair-minded person will say that as between a political loss for oneself and the development of a policy which in the long run looks to the protection of the people against foreign aggression, the doubt should have been resolved in favor of an uncompromising campaign for national defense.

Ambition has ruined many a statesman in history. Consideration of self has beclouded the vision of many a would-be leader of democracy. Conversely, the heroes of centuries of human achievement have been men who have cast aside all thought of self in the sacrifices that bring spiritual rather than material compensations.

We are on the verge of war. No man can foretell how soon we will realize that all democracy faces a threat of extinction and that we must recognize a state of war exists now against our own democracy. These are not times when wars are declared. They simply happen overnight and only the democracies insist on taking time for the formalities, while the aggressors bomb airdromes and render defenses impotent.

The President's duty is very plain. He must sacrifice his political ambitions for the good of the Nation. He might well consider the recommendation to the Congress of a program putting America immediately on a war basis. At the same moment the President ought to announce that he will respect the American tradition and refuse to run for a third term.

NATIONAL UNITY CANNOT BE BUILT ON DISTRUST

A change in the Presidency is not likely to cause any dislocation in industry, especially if Mr. Roosevelt will appoint now or give power to men already appointed to accelerate the industrial production of the Nation for defense. Whether another Democrat is chosen—and there are many capable leaders in the Democratic Party—or whether the country chooses a Republican, the fact remains that at this, of all times, democracy must prove the worth of its institutions. In the middle of a critical period, Britain changed Prime Ministers last month, and so did France.

If America is to go into war, it must be with a leadership that is freed from the handicaps that would face a third-term President. National unity cannot be built upon foundations of distrust. And, unhappily, industry today does not feel that the President is as concerned about the national defense as he should be, or else he would not be temporizing with advisory councils and insisting on maintaining the restrictions and barriers that have hamstrung industry for the last 7 years.

ALL POLITICAL AMBITIONS MUST BE SACRIFICED

Mr. Roosevelt cannot do the job of directing industrial operations himself. He must delegate authority and do so promptly. He must also tell the people the truth about the need for a modification in the restrictions imposed by the New Deal on business management and industrial production. If this is not done, it will be said with emphasis on every side that the administration is more interested in saving the New Deal than in saving America.

To attain the desired end—national unity—the third-term issue must be disposed of by the President himself. To refuse a third-term nomination would, to be sure, disappoint the selfish politicians and parasites who infest Washington and who have imposed long enough on the good nature of a generous-minded President.

But to refuse a third term would put the name of Franklin D. Roosevelt alongside that of George Washington and Thomas Jefferson. The excuse of a war emergency, offered by the proponents of a third term, is a shallow one. To surrender the democratic process in the face of a challenge to democracy itself is to misconstrue the innate capacity of the American people to govern themselves and to give their lives and their properties for an ideal.

The time has come for men in public life to raise the quality of statesmanship by sacrificing the political ego for the common good. Only by such an example can the thousands of men young and old in our midst be encouraged to make the supreme sacrifice of self. For such sacrifices will have to be made if the women and children in our cities are to be protected from the bombs that can be so readily dropped by aircraft operating from nearby ocean bases left unprotected by the defeat of Britain and France.

Will America learn the lesson of her neglect of defenses of these last few years or will historians fix the blame for America's downfall on the blindness and selfishness of her political leaders of today?

No Reason for Third Term

EDITORIAL FROM THE WORCESTER (MASS.) TELEGRAM

Mr. HOLMES. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Worcester (Mass.) Telegram of July 10:

[From the Worcester (Mass.) Telegram of July 10, 1940]

NO REASON FOR THIRD TERM

It is universally agreed that the all-important issue before the American people is the preservation of a free and democratic United States against the totalitarian threat from Europe. The issue is so important that it dwarfs all other issues and reduces some of them to negligibility. We must build up our national defenses to a point where we can defy the totalitarian fury. We must aid in every way consistent with law and our own defense those who are now at war against that fury.

It happens that the foreign policy of the Roosevelt administration is based upon a lively appreciation of this situation. Prior to the Republican Convention at Philadelphia, it was felt by many Republicans as well as Democrats that world events demanded the continuance of Mr. Roosevelt in office. Columist Dorothy Thompson, who up until then had evinced no great admiration for Mr. Roosevelt or his ways, cried out hysterically from Paris during the battle of Flanders that the Republicans should not nominate anyone against Mr. Roosevelt.

The candidates for the Republican nomination, with one exception, were frighteningly casual about what was happening in Europe—frighteningly casual and bewilderingly indefinite; their opinions reflected more or less strongly the discredited doctrine of isolationism. Mr. Vandenberg, for example, began the campaign as an old-fashioned provincial isolationist and wound up as an "insulationist," whatever that may be. Mr. Dewey, in one of his first speeches, seemed to display some understanding of the portentousness of events abroad and then, in mid-career in the West, misled apparently by the isolationist sentiment then articulate in that region, went overboard for isolationism. Mr. Taft, in his robot-like progress, moved on inexorably, undisturbed, it would seem, by anything outside the domestic scene.

But the exception we mentioned a moment ago was Mr. Willkie. He understood the implications for us in the European war and he emphasized them boldly and clearly. He abhorred isolationism and warned the Republican Party over and over that, if it embraced isolationism, it might as well close up shop as far as this 1940 campaign is concerned. He accepted the Roosevelt foreign policy in all essential particulars, and said so. And now Mr. Willkie is the Republican candidate for President. Regardless of what the sweating platform-makers labored forth at Philadelphia, Mr. Willkie is his own platform.

Thus, when it comes to the foreign policy of the United States, the Willkie formula and the Roosevelt formula virtually coincide. Mr. Willkie sees the totalitarian threat as vividly as Mr. Roosevelt sees it. Mr. Willkie is as anxious to preserve a free and democratic America as Mr. Roosevelt is anxious. Mr. Willkie is as convinced of the need of building up adequate national defenses as Mr. Roosevelt is convinced. Mr. Willkie is as confident of the wisdom of giving all aid consistent with law and our own defense to those at war against the totalitarians as Mr. Roosevelt is confident. And in achieving these aims, Mr. Willkie promises to be more effective than Mr. Roosevelt would be.

Therefore, in the range of American foreign policy, there is no longer any reason for urging a third term for Mr. Roosevelt. The New York Times, which used to be known as an independent Democratic newspaper and now, significantly, wishes to be known as independent without any Democratic qualifications, yesterday, in its leading editorial, called upon the President to abjure a third nomination in view of Mr. Willkie's concurrence in foreign affairs. In this way the third term issue, said the Times, could be kept out of the campaign.

The Times seems to be unduly wrought up about the third-term issue. To our mind, the Willkie nomination has shot that issue down into the realm of the academic. For us, the main point is that there is no longer the slightest reason for giving a third term to Mr. Roosevelt. On their domestic record, he and his party richly deserve repudiation. If it weren't for the European war repudiation would be recognized by all as inevitable, ever since the 1938 elections disclosed the popular trend away from the New Deal. For a time Republican fumbling with the problems created by the war gave substance to the third-term argument. Willkie has ended that fumbling. If the President's grasp of foreign affairs is "masterly," to use Dorothy Thompson's word, so is Mr. Willkie's. The one offsets the other.

We are confident the American people recognize this, and are preparing to act accordingly.

ARTICLES BY CHARLES M. UPHAM AND HAL G. SOURS

Mr. CARTWRIGHT. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an article by Mr. Charles M. Upham, engineer-director of the American Road Builders' Association, which appeared in a recent issue of the Road Builder Magazine, regarding the importance of road building in our national-defense program.

The article referred to is as follows:

ROADS AND FREEDOM

"The rockets' red glare,
The bombs bursting in air,
Gave proof through the night
That our flag was still there."

More than a century and a half has passed since Francis Scott Key penned these immortal words. His song, which so eloquently expressed the spirit of '76, has never been more meaningful than in 1940. Today a United States at peace is firm in its hard-won right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, free from control by any nation across the sea. An ocean lies between us and the bombs bursting in Europe. The rockets whose red glare painted the skies on the Fourth of July were set off by the hands of peaceful celebrants of America's successful fight for independence.

Americans celebrated Independence Day this year with more than usual thought for the significance of the occasion. July Fourth orators found new meaning in the phrases "freedom of speech," "freedom of the press," and "freedom of worship." These constitutional guaranties can no longer be taken for granted and forgotten. The citizen's rights are being destroyed with alarming speed in the Old World. The United States is forced to embark on a gigantic preparedness program. The Nation must make ready to defend its rights if the need arises.

The possibility of foreign invasion of these shores is no pleasant consideration. America has in the past rested secure in the confidence that two oceans are protection enough. Today, that confidence is shaken. Adequate defense has become one of the Nation's most important needs. We must now be prepared to meet attack on either coast. Although we are speedily taking steps to increase the size of our armed forces, we cannot expect to build up an Army large enough to defend our long eastern coastline, plus a duplicate force that can always be stationed in the West.

Instead, we must have a mobile Army that can quickly move from place to place. If we are attacked on the west coast, when our main forces are stationed in the East, it must be possible to send help to the invaded area with the least possible delay. The United States Army is doing its best to make rapid transportation possible. Every branch is speeding up the addition of motorized units. The growth of rapid, mechanized fighting equipment has been phenomenal. Our men, arms, and supplies are today carried on rubber-tired wheels. Unfortunately, however, rubber wheels and gasoline and Diesel engines are not the only requirements for rapid movement. Our hopes for the future may some day be in the hands of America's armed forces. Their ability to fulfill these hopes may in turn rest on America's highway system.

How well are our highways prepared to meet the test of modern warfare? You received a striking answer to that question if you, like thousands of other Americans, celebrated the Fourth of July with a motor trip. You found the highways congested and incapable of meeting the demands of modern traffic. You lost many minutes in traffic tie-ups, minutes that might be priceless to an army in wartime. If you left the main highways you found many miles of unimproved dirt roads, roads over which foodstuffs must be transported from the farms to the Army in the event of war. You probably experienced at least one narrow escape from accident at a sharp curve, railroad grade crossing, or some other highway hazard. You returned home at night with darkness added to the other dangers of driving. And you found reports of hundreds of deaths and injuries due to holiday traffic in your morning newspaper.

The traffic that you found on the roads on July 4 was small in comparison to the numbers that must use these same roads in wartime. The inadequacy of our highways becomes increasingly apparent as we consider the need for speed in the transportation of troops, arms, and supplies. We must strengthen our Army, Navy, and air force. We must also perfect our highway system that we may be always certain of an affirmative answer to the query—

"Oh, say, does that star-spangled banner yet wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave?"

Also, I include an article from the same magazine on the subject of military roads by Mr. Hal G. Sours, chief engineer of the Ohio Department of Highways and president of the American Road Builders' Association.

The article referred to is as follows:

Progressive thinking in highway circles can well look to the subject of military roads as a means of rationally driving home the message of need for highway improvements. Judging from present dispatches from the war theater and from activity in this country, the subject of war and war preparation is likely to be with us for several years, no matter what the immediate outcome. It is not within my province or desire to attempt to be a prophet on military subjects. However, without our solicitation, the problem of military preparedness is upon us. We can do ourselves and the world a service by thinking in the same terms regarding highways.

As industry gears itself for wartime production, highways will be subjected to a vast tonnage increase in both commercial and noncommercial vehicular travel. The cost of highway depreciation during such times is a bill against war which can neither be anticipated nor calculated, but the toll will nevertheless be taken and it will hasten obsolescence. One of the outstanding lessons of the war to date has been the success of mechanized units. In this new type of warfare highway construction and maintenance will probably be put to its greatest test. From it road builders can learn the greatest lessons.

As is well known, one of Germany's earliest steps was to build new highways to provide for the rapid movement of mechanized units. We saw pictures and read much about German road building before we received information concerning the mechanized units themselves. So Germany apparently prepared for war in a logical manner by first preparing the tracks for the rapid movement of its mechanized units. The practicability of such forethought is indicated by the speed with which attacks have been made and their results.

Military highways designated as such by the War Department constitute only a small percentage of our total mileage, but preparation of such highways for military purposes furnishes an excellent vehicle for driving home the economics of highways in a field of public opinion that is now ready-made, so far as home defense is concerned. In other words, attention is being increasingly focused on military highways and this public interest will grow as mechanized military equipment is augmented. The opportunity of revealing the highway story under such auspices is a necessity and a patriotic endeavor.

Needs of military units of the mechanized type are scarcely greater than requirements for our ordinary vehicular travel. Well-located highways of sufficient and safe widths, with ample sight distances, bypassing many of the small, closely spaced communities to provide the expeditious movement of units are the ruling needs of the day in peace as well as in wartime. In wartime, however, quick action is expected. During the last World War, in some instances, the army had to take over road building under unfavorable circumstances where civil authorities were unable to provide the necessary routes. Highways produced under emergency conditions no doubt served the immediate purpose, but long-time engineering and sound road-building practice were lacking under the force of circumstances that demanded haste. The road-building industry can serve the Nation in this present situation by encouraging farsightedness in military needs that automatically link up with the modernization of highways. The waste of funds and effort encountered in the World War can thus be saved.

By standing by and moving in an orderly manner the road-building industry can at least aid in setting the pace of business sanity during the approach to wartime conditions. Two problems, therefore, confront the industry: First, to make highway military preparedness consistent with peacetime needs, with the long-range viewpoint uppermost; and, second, an orderly approach and self-regulation of conditions which may change deliveries, wage scales, and other road-construction factors.

EXTRACT FROM WAR REPORT TO PRESIDENT WILSON IN 1919

Mr. SHANLEY. Mr. Speaker, there has been so much talk about a war industries board that I am taking advantage of my privileges to include in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD several salient extracts from the war report to President Wilson in 1919. It is contained in the rapidly vanishing House Document, Volume 97 of the Sixty-sixth Congress, second session, and is a monument to a great chairman, Bernard Baruch, and his assistants.

REPORT OF CHAIRMAN OF THE WAR INDUSTRIES BOARD

NEW YORK, December 15, 1919.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: An estimate of the spirit of service and the success that characterized the work of the Board's members, with whom I had the honor of being associated, is generously expressed in your own words when you said, with reference to them, that they had "turned aside from every private interest of their own and devoted the whole of their trained capacity to the tasks that supplied the sinews of the whole great undertaking. * * *

To American industry, to employer and employee, to capital and labor, to each of whom is due a large share of such success as the War Industries Board has achieved; to their spirit of service, of patriotism, and of cooperation, I make acknowledgment and dedicate this booklet, which is largely a record of their own activities and of achievements their support made possible.

In measuring our victory the importance of the battle line at home must ever be a great factor. The mobilization of America's industrial forces and conversion from peace and construction to war and destruction was a gigantic task and responded to in a gigantic manner. Its value in the final outcome rates second only to the mobilization of the Nation's manpower, and in that enterprise, the War Industries Board, which commanded, under you, the forces of industry, was likewise of aid by indicating those trades from which the workers could be more readily spared than from others, the continuation of which were essential to the war's development.

The needs of the Army and Navy and the other war agencies of our country and our associates changed and expanded over night. It was no part of our work to make the program; our duty was to help execute it by supplying the materials that make success attainable. To be able to do this, to know what we had to do and then to plan to do it, to coordinate and synchronize the multiplicity of national and international efforts and make them effective in supplying the war demands so that our armies and navies could discharge their duty of fighting and winning, the War Industries Board evolved a general formula, which is herewith appended because it contains its theory of organization and policy of procedure—because it shows what the board was and what it tried to do. It read:

"Wars are fought and won—or lost—on the land, on the water, in the air, and on those battle lines behind the front where the civilian forces stand.

"It is not enough to mobilize the Nation's military strength; there must be a mobilization of her full economic resources—industrial, agricultural, and financial. These must be organized, coordinated, and directed with the same strategy that governs the operations of the purely military arms of the service.

"The prodigious strain upon the world's productive capacity must be met and balanced to provide the means of warfare and to maintain the civilian population as well as to preserve the economic fabric.

"America today is the chief source of strength to the forces engaged in the conflict against German world domination. That strength is expressed in terms of manpower and of material—the one military, the second industrial.

"To control and regulate industry in all its direct and indirect relations to the war and to the Nation, the President has created the War Industries Board and placed the responsibility for its operation in the hands of the chairman."

Also, the Board provides supplies necessary to the military needs of our associates in the war, and those commodities required by neutrals in exchange for materials essential to us.

Finally, and of paramount importance, the Board, in alliance with the food, fuel, and labor administrations, provides for the country's civilian needs, the protection of which is a particular duty of the organization.

It is not only the duty of the War Industries Board to stimulate and expand production in those industries making war essentials, it is equally the Board's duty to protect, as far as may be, those industries not immediately essential to the war program.

The War Industries Board is a method of control devised by the President to equalize the strain placed upon the American industrial structure by the war.

It stimulates and expands the production of those materials essential to the war program and at the same time it depresses and curtails the production of those things not of a necessitous nature. This is done by regulation, in consonance with other executive branches of the basic economic elements: (a) Facilities, (b) materials, (c) fuel, (d) transportation, (e) labor, and (f) capital.

The method of control is through a preference list, on which are placed those industries whose output is essential to the war's progress. The priority indicated by the preference list is the master key to the six elements named.

Further, the Board regulates all and controls certain other industries of first-rate war importance, it fixes prices through the price-fixing committee, it creates new and converts old facilities, it clears the national business requirements, and it leads to conservation, which is needed to bridge the gap between the extraordinary demand and the available supply—a gap which exists in almost all the great commercial staples.

The War Industries Board embraces all and each of the Nation. Food and fuel are separately administered, but with every other article of military need and of ordinary life the Board has a direct connection, and it has a basic relationship which the War Industries Board provides.

The abnormal conditions of the war demand sacrifices. It is the price of victory.

Only actual needs, not fancied wants, should and can be satisfied.

To save heavy and long privation, temporary deprivation must be the rule.

America's willingness to accept these conditions marks her ability to quicken the end of the conflict.

It is with great pride I inform you that there was not a slacker to be found among the industries. Not one had to be coerced. They governed themselves by the answer to a single question, namely, Do the continuation of our enterprises help or hurt the war program?

The choice was unanimous for service rather than profit—for national need instead of the individual expediency. In every way they thoroughly responded to the test. Not a single business from the greatest business organization to the smallest merchant but was affected by the war; but was called upon to make some sacrifice. But because of them—their brains, their workers, and their money—added to the indomitable spirit of our soldiers and sailors, and to the general public's readiness for sacrifice, America was not found wanting; because of them America was able to supply the men and materials without which victory, at the time it came, could not have been won.

It is impossible to estimate the value of America's industrial efforts in terms of dollars but it is safe to say the total ran into the billions.

In my associates chosen from the whole Nation because of their ability, I found my support to come as quickly from the Republicans as from the Democrats; from the man of German extraction as from the one whose antecedents were English. In the spirit of service because of the world crisis and the national emergency, there were fused all differences of politics, of ancestry, of religion; all were Americans and as such soldiers of the common good. To these men on the board, and to the American employer and employee, goes such praise as the organization may have earned.

With these beside him he was able to render service; without their support he could not have succeeded.

Because every member of the War Industries Board from the top to the bottom is deserving of the attention of yourself and their fellow citizens, I will append a complete roster of those devoted fellow citizens, men and women who discharged their duty to their country by earnest service in this vital organization. To them I again express my thanks and for them I express the gratitude we all of us feel in having been vouchsafed this great opportunity to which we sought, as best we could, greatly to rise.

Between the time of the signing of the armistice and the discontinuance of the War Industries Board the problem was faced of reversing the Board's machinery in order to demobilize industry from war service and assist it back to its normal channels. The German collapse had been spectacular in its suddenness. When fighting ceased, war production in the United States was reaching its peak. Every unit of the vast machinery was keyed up to high speed. There is no doubt but that knowledge of this fact contributed materially to Germany's sudden realization to the hopelessness of her position. The Board did all that was possible to prevent any injury to industry as it was put back on a peace basis. The price-fixing committee of the Board determined as a general policy that price agreements should continue for the period originally fixed. The President directed the various departments of the Government not to market, in competition with private producers, materials in which there was no shortage and which were not of a perishable nature. The Board, through recommendations and advice, aided in cancelation of contracts so as to stabilize as far as possible the flow of materials, labor, and plant facilities back to peace channels. It was arranged with all of the war-making agencies of the Government that the Board should be advised of revisions and adjustments of all Government contracts in excess of $100,000. The Board's facilities section, for a brief time, remained as the clearing house for all information relating to contract adjustment. Contact also was maintained with the Labor Department so that as labor was released from war work it was distributed to peacetime industries needing it. If the proper authority had been at hand, it would have been possible for the War Industries Board to have continued its functions during the period of readjustment. Much good could have been accomplished. But with the signing of the armistice, the purchases by the Allies and our own great departments coming to an end, the power of the Board, without further additional legislative authority, ceased, and it was possible to do only what was done—to wind up its work as quickly as possible.

A similar emergency may arise in the future, and it can more easily be coped with if the experiences of the last 2 years are profited by, the writer believes.

1. There should be created a peacetime skeleton organization based on the experience of the war-making agencies. It should be headed by a chairman who, when the emergency arises, should be granted the powers necessary to cooperate and synchronize the economic resources of the country. With him should be associated the representative of the Army and the Navy, or any other department. There also should be in the skeletonized organization a vice chairman, a secretary, a council, and members in charge of raw materials, finished products, facilities, prices, labor, planning, and statistics (during peace, under the Department of Commerce), priority, and conservation. Under these there should be also the various section or commodity heads. The peacetime organization would meet at least once a year to discuss and outline plans and to keep in touch with the general world situation and with one another. Each sectional head would name committees in each industry, in order that, in the event of an impending crisis, it would be possible within a few days to create an organization which immediately would mobilize all of the industries of the Nation and quickly make available for the Government all of its resources. These men, with the exception of the secretary, who would keep the records, would serve without compensation, and the actual expense of maintaining such an organization would be small. I would further recommend that all priorities, including those of shipping, would be centralized in the chairman.

2. Through a system of stimulation by a protective tariff, a bonus, an exemption from taxation for a limited period, licensing, or any other effective means, every possible effort should be made to develop production of manganese, chrome, tungsten, dyestuff, byproducts of coal, and all such raw materials usually imported, but which can be produced in quantity in this country. Above all, immediate and persistent effort must be made to develop production of nitrogen and its substitutes, not alone for war but for agricultural purposes.

3. Under the supervision of the proper departments of the Government, some industries must be given encouragement to maintain a skeleton organization through which can be developed the rapid manufacture of guns, munitions, airplanes, etc. Some facilities already developed might be kept alive through outright purchase or by small orders for munitions and airplanes, while at all times there must be kept on hand the necessary dies, jigs, fixtures, etc., needed for the manufacture of munitions. The expert personnel of the War and Navy Departments, in addition to keeping abreast of the times in the new war-making agencies, should keep the industries of the Nation attuned to a skeleton form to meet immediately that enlarged demand which would come through war.

Very sincerely yours,

BERNARD M. BARUCH.

An Interventionist With a Record

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES E. VAN ZANDT
OF PENNSYLVANIA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Thursday, July 11, 1940

ARTICLE BY LAWRENCE DENNIS

Mr. VAN ZANDT. Mr. Speaker, a most interesting article concerning the appointment of Henry L. Stimson, as Secretary of War, appeared July 7, 1940, in the National Whirligig, one of America's outstanding newspaper columns. The writer of this article is a well-known author and lecturer and was formerly in the United States Diplomatic Service.

The record of a real interventionist should be read by every Member of Congress and is as follows:

INTERVENTIONIST WITH A RECORD

(By Lawrence Dennis, author and lecturer; formerly United States Diplomatic Service)

A dogmatic man of 73 may be expected to run true to his record and convictions. Henry L. Stimson's major dogma through the years has been that the United States should not miss opportunities to intervene in foreign wars. And now he is Secretary of War.

The chief episodes in Mr. Stimson's interventionist record are Nicaragua in 1927 and Japan in 1931. In Nicaragua he had a success, in Japan a failure. His success in Nicaragua made him Secretary of State and cost the lives of 116 United States marines and of some 3,000 Nicaraguans in a 4-year war which took an American expeditionary force of over 5,000 marines and bluejackets to fight. His failure to get Britain and the United States into a war with Japan in 1931 doubtless saved tens of thousands of American and British lives. American patriots, mothers, wives, and children should now be praying for the failure of Wrong Horse Harry's next design for American intervention in a foreign broil. Germany, Italy, and Japan will be tougher nuts than Nicaraguans for the American fighting man, though not for Stimson's legalistic mind and crusading (in a Washington desk chair) spirit.

Mr. Stimson, as a legalist, a moralist, and a propagandist of commercial international interests, stands for all that has been most foolish and proved most disastrous in foreign relations for both America and Britain over the past quarter of a century. It was this ideology that prevented a realistic policy in Mexico after the overthrow of Diaz in 1910, with results costly to our relations there. It was this same ideology that got us into war in April 1917 and got Britain and France into war in September 1939.

Mr. Stimson was of no use in carrying out the military phases of the Nicaragua intervention. A tired old attorney who can work only with legal papers and only for a few hours at a time, he will now be of little use in connection with any purely military problems America may have to face as a result of his interventionist policy. But, for committing American soldiers to fighting on foreign shores without a congressional declaration of war for tricking Congress and the American people into a war they don't want, and for making out a case for such intervention based on misrepresentation of facts and disregard for the plainest imperatives of the Constitution, no better legal mind or moral propagandist could have been mobilized by our war-minded President. Moreover, his powerful personal claque, carefully cultivated in each of the 48 States, has long been accustomed to endorse by phone, wire, cable, mail and political pressure the plans of "Mr. Secretary."

This writer was United States chargé d'affaires in Nicaragua from August 1926 to the beginning of 1927. I am, therefore, qualified by the possession of much unpublished information to discuss both Mr. Stimson as a diplomat and Mr. Stimson's interventionist record in Nicaragua. In the eight months of 1926–27 during which I was in charge of the American Legation in Managua, I carried out with full approval the instructions of our State Department to get Adolfo Diaz designated President of Nicaragua so Washington could recognize him; I presided over an unsuccessful peace conference held aboard an American warship between the Managua Government and the rebels who called themselves the legal government; and I sent the inaccurate telegram, as instructed by Washington, saying that American marines were needed to protect American lives and property in Nicaragua.

On my return to Washington in early April 1927 I was at once rushed into the palsied presence of old Secretary Kellogg and his hard-boiled Under Secretary of State, R. E. Olds, both of whom complimented me on my handling of the Nicaraguan situation. But they said that the Nicaraguan developments had become so grave that it required the talents of the biggest man they could find. Accordingly, President Coolidge had drafted Mr. Stimson to go to Nicaragua as his personal representative to make peace—something Admiral Latimer with the Special Service Squadron and I with the Legation had failed to achieve. The Admiral and I, when asked our opinions, had told Washington that our only alternatives were: (1) To let the Nicaraguans fight it out, with every probability that the rebels would win and oust our puppet president; or (2) to take over all Nicaragua with a force of 5,000 marines, which we said would probably involve a long-drawn-out war similar to our 4-year pacification of the Philippines after the Spanish-American War. Washington turned from its professional fighting man and diplomat to the high-priced Wall Street corporation lawyer who was supposed to possess a magic formula for making peace with legal words and legal contracts.

Stimson reached Nicaragua in early May 1927. Under a marine-arranged truce, he entered at once into negotiations with President Diaz and rebel General Moncada. The latter saw no reason to quit with victory in sight. Stimson told him that Washington, having recognized Diaz, could not allow our picked man to be ousted. Moncada quickly came to the point. If the honorable special emissary of the White House would put it in writing, so Moncada could prove to his generals that American armed forces would be used against the rebels to force compliance with the Stimson terms, he, Moncada, would lay down his arms and try to get his men to do likewise, fully realizing the futility of a little Nicaraguan Army defying the mighty United States. Stimson, to avoid a return to Washington in failure, reluctantly put this threat in writing. When he advised Washington by cable in a code message that he was doing so, Secretary Kellogg shot back instructions not to do it. But Stimson had already proceeded and, going over Kellogg's head to President Coolidge, was upheld. Meanwhile, just after the ultimatum had been delivered, against Kellogg's instructions, the State Department permanent officials had publicly denied its delivery, assuming that Stimson had not exceeded his authority.

Once Moncada and his generals had signed on the Stimson dotted line, the Wall Street attorney wired back to a waiting America that he had brought peace to Nicaragua. Shortly thereafter, one of Moncada's generals, Sandino by name, refused to lay down his arms to Yankee imperialism, as he called it, with a resulting loss of the 3,000 Nicaraguan and 116 American lives. But this minor sequel, engaging over 5,000 American naval forces in the Nicaraguan jungle for several years, was not allowed to tarnish the luster of Stimson's peace. Sandino was merely labeled a bandit. Actually, he was an exalted if foolish patriot and no more of a bandit than George Washington or Garibaldi.

Stimson had no legal authority and President Coolidge had not a shadow of constitutional right, without a congressional declaration of war or sanction, to authorize Stimson to pledge the armed forces of the United States to a war on Nicaraguans on Nicaraguan soil in enforcement of Stimson's ultimatum. Several Senators, including Borah, said publicly that the President of the United States was properly impeachable for this excess of authority. Stimson, as Secretary of State, made out a Philadelphia lawyer's case for his Presidential client. The difficulty was met largely by euphemisms and name calling. It was not a war but cooperation with the Nicaraguans to put down banditry. Sandino was not a rebel but a bandit.

With that precedent, how easy it would be now for Mr. Stimson to call an American expeditionary force to Europe a mere matter of cooperating with the British in stamping out the banditry of Hitler et al. Stimson will be no good for the military aspects of the enterprise, but his record proves him an expert at putting over a foreign war by the President without congressional authorization. He can put it over in a legal, propaganda, and moral way. The task of putting it over in a practical way, of course, will fall to younger fighting men and executives, the age limit even for generals being 64.

OF

HON. MATTHEW A. DUNN

OF PENNSYLVANIA

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Wednesday, July 10, 1940

Mr. DUNN. Mr. Speaker, my main reason for not supporting S. 3046 was because I believed it to be undemocratic. I did not support the original Hatch bill, which passed the House last year.

I do not question the sincerity of the sponsors of this legislation, nor those who support it; however, it seems to me that we are getting away from the principles of democracy when we deprive Federal employees of the right to seek office and to publicly support candidates in whom they are interested.

Roosevelt's Decision Cannot Be Delayed Longer—The Real Fight Now Looms Between Two New Deals

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HOMER D. ANGELL

OF OREGON

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

EDITORIAL FROM THE OREGON JOURNAL

Mr. ANGELL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following editorial from the Oregon Journal of July 5, 1940:

[From the Oregon Journal of July 5, 1940]

ROOSEVELT'S DECISION CANNOT BE DELAYED LONGER; THE REAL FIGHT NOW LOOMS BETWEEN TWO NEW DEALS

Four months from today the people of the United States will vote on Presidential nominees.

A week ago, in a surprise move, the Republican Convention proclaimed a New Deal for its party and went before the country with its strongest possible ticket—Wendell Willkie, of New York, and Senator Charles L. McNary, of Oregon.

A week from Monday the Democratic convention will meet to name its ticket, and there is no reason why it, too, may not be featured by a surprise move. It is possible that President Roosevelt may decline the nomination of his party for a third term.

Until the invasion of the Low Countries by the Nazis, in early May, political wiseacres the country over chorused assurance that the President would not accept the nomination but would undertake to dictate his successor as head of the ticket.

From mid-May until late June the grim specter of war and the overnight demand for large-scale national defense shadowed all political considerations, and again the acceptance of a third-term nomination by Roosevelt was taken for granted.

Now, America is aware of the gravity of the war situation, public opinion, on record for preparedness, shifts back to politics, again to ask the question: "Is he or isn't he?"

Only the President knows the answer to that question. For months he has maintained the silence of the sphinx. His name appeared on the primary ballots in many States with no word from the White House. Accordingly, an overwhelming majority of delegates will converge on Chicago pledged to his renomination. The people who want Roosevelt for a third term expect him to accept the nomination and do not believe that he will let them down. The nomination will be difficult to decline.

Only the President knows his own mind and heart. Only he can appraise for himself whether he cares to undertake the campaign that would be a fight from start to finish. And it is certain that he would not care to risk defeat with the issues drawn as they appear to be at the moment.

At present no one can forecast with any certainty the outcome of a Willkie-Roosevelt race, beyond the probable election of a Republican House of Representatives.

Both men have personal appeal. Both men have liberal ideals. Willkie previously had indorsed the foreign policy of the Roosevelt administration and had approved its reciprocal trade treaty policy.

Either candidate would suffer much if tainted as an interventionist, because, regardless of party, the people of this country do not want the United States to become embroiled in a foreign war.

To date, there has been no mass sentiment against Roosevelt. The belief that in Roosevelt the average man has a President who cares and who has done something for his material welfare pretty generally prevails.

If Willkie today is not widely known, he soon will be, and his ideas, too. He is that kind of person. There is nothing in his record to indicate other than frankness, candor, and the capacity of making himself understood. The average man may have confidence that Willkie, also, will not overlook him. He may be expected to win many by his own program of social justice.

The Willkie candidacy, too, has appeal to those ardent supporters of Roosevelt's first term who cooled early in 1937 and are now cold to him. There is the businessman, large and small, who has seen himself cuffed around far more than he deserves and who is sick and tired of bureaucratic regimentation that glories in making him do the goosestep.

There are those who well remember how the administration condoned the sit-down strike, ultimately outlawed by the Supreme Court; there are those who cannot forget the effort to enlarge the Supreme Court, and everyone will feel for years the lavish expenditure of money that raised the public debt to an all-time high. Whether there are enough of them who have soured on the New Deal, for these and other reasons, to turn the tide to Willkie in a contest with Roosevelt, no one knows. In brief, the Willkie candidacy has not had time to jell.

Business, large and small, feels that, if given the opportunity, it could relieve the Government of much of the burden of unemployment, which an economic system of free enterprise should facilitate.

All of these and many other important considerations confront the President if he contemplates rejection of the nomination.

On the other hand, last week's Gallup poll showed that 92 percent of the Democratic voters want Roosevelt for a third term, and that is quite an overwhelming percentage.

At long last, Roosevelt must make his decision.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ARTHUR D. HEALEY

OF MASSACHUSETTS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

ADDRESS BY ROLAND L. MACDONALD

Mr. HEALEY. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include the following address by Roland L. MacDonald, State commandant, Massachusetts Department Marine Corps League:

Fellow citizens, ladies, and gentlemen, in these dark and dreadful days, when ruthless despotism is ravaging and seeking to destroy the democracies of the world, and when civilization itself hovers on the brink of chaos, America can ill afford to dally with defense.

Lulled into a false sense of security in the belief that the Nation was inviolate, the shocking disclosures of our unpreparedness to meet aggression or invasion struck the national conscience like a Hitler "blitzkrieg." Every American is now fully aware that adequate defense is not only imperative but it must be immediate and efficient if we are to be spared the fate of unprepared European democracies.

What does adequate and efficient preparedness mean? It means more than expanding our military, naval, and air forces. It means more than the accumulation of unlimited men, munitions, and modern mechanized equipment. It means more than the concentration of huge reserves of supplies and material to bolster the combined armed forces defending our democracy.

Adequate preparedness means that the Nation as a whole, individually and collectively, must patriotically support the defense program and be ready and willing to make sacrifices far beyond any the people have been called upon to make in any previous crisis.

Adequate preparedness means that courage and high resolve in themselves are not sufficient, but that courage must be backed by training and efficiency of the highest degree to cope with a super-trained and merciless foe. Of what avail are huge armies, imposing navies, or impressive air armadas if they who man them lack the training necessary for them to withstand a superior force.

To illustrate this, let me relate one of the outstanding episodes of the last World War which, but for the superior training and physical stamina of the American forces involved, might have ended in disaster for the Allied cause. As one who was privileged to participate in that crucial encounter, I believe I am qualified to appraise it at its true value.

It was just 22 years ago, June 6, 1918, to be exact, when the events I am about to describe began. A few days previously the Germans had launched a surprise attack against the Allied forces on the Chemin des Dames sector, northwest of Rheims. The French and British soldiers, exhausted after weeks of heavy fighting, were completely unprepared for a lightning major drive by the enemy, and in a comparatively short time they were forced to retire. The German push continued until they reached the Marne at Chateau-Thierry and then to Belleau Woods on the Paris-Metz road.

Now, Paris was definitely menaced. The sound of the battle could be heard in the city streets. The civilian population began moving out. More than a million fled the city. The Government itself made preparations for a hasty exit, planning to establish headquarters in southern France.

The Germans had established artillery stations and machine-gun nests on rocky eminences concealed in the woods, giving them a commanding sweep of the open wheatfields and roads in the low terrain.

At that time, my own marine machine-gun battalion, attached to the Second Division of the Regular Army of the A. E. F., had just been relieved from the front line at Verdun. On Memorial Day word was received that the Allied line had been broken and we were ordered to reinforce the position and stop the German advance. At daybreak the next morning we started out to join our Allies and help stem the enemy drive. Traveling in lorries, our progress was hampered by the hordes of refugees fleeing Paris, then under bombardment by Big Berthas and bombing planes. As we advanced we came upon other refugees, lowly peasants from the country, old men and women who probably had never been more than 10 miles from home in their lives. Pitiful creatures, trundling what they had salvaged of personal belongings, hurrying they knew not where.

During the nighttime, proceeding without lights or guidance, we several times drove through the German lines, which were in snakelike formation, only to reappear in Allied territory. All this time we were under constant aerial attacks and artillery fire. How we managed to reach our objective without disaster is one of war's miracles which only Divine Providence can explain.

We took up our position in the low-lying wheatfields, unaware of the enemy concealed in the woods and also unaware that we had marched into what the Germans believed was a death trap. We were met by hordes of French soldiers and refugees retreating under rear-guard protection, who had apparently given up all hope and conceded victory to the Germans. "Finis le Guerre,"—the war is over—they cried despairingly. "Finished, bah," was the rejoinder of the marines as they prepared to meet the onslaught.

Unexpectedly there came an order from the commanding French general for the Second Division to retire to Meaux. We were then only 25 miles from Paris and the order to retreat caused dismay to the Americans. One Marine officer refused to heed the order and flung back the famous, "Retreat be hanged, we've only just got here."

For 26 days the marines and the equally trained soldiers of the Second Division resisted the full force of the enemy's fury and refused to give ground. Fierce hand-to-hand fighting finally cleared the Germans from their woodland positions and with their collapse the whole German line began falling back. It was the turning point in the war. Paris was saved and Allied victory was assured.

Unfortunately there are many sincere and well-intentioned persons in America who believe that we will not be obliged to defend this country only in the event of actual invasion. We regret that this is not true. Should the Allies lose this war, which God forbid, the totalitarian victors could bring this Nation to its knees by economic pressure exerted through the South American republics. Under the terms of the Monroe Doctrine the United States is bound to defend the Western Hemisphere against any and all forms of aggression, and it is possible that we may have to wage war outside of our own territory to protect our economic structure.

But it is not only against outside enemies that we need adequate defense. There are enemies within who desire the downfall of the American stronghold of democracy. Make no mistake about it, my friends, we have a "fifth column" in this country that would plunge the treacherous knife into Uncle Sam's back at the first opportunity.

As a chain is no stronger than its weakest link, so will any defense program be no stronger than the weakest effort to support it. There must be united effort to guarantee security. Rich and poor, industry and labor, big business and agriculture must all pull together for the sake of America. There must not be any racial, religious, or political difference on this vital issue. United we stand, divided we fall, must be the guiding motto of every true American through this national crisis.

The Marine Corps League, of which I have the honor to be State commandant of the Massachusetts Department, stands four-square for preparedness in the realization that adequate defense is the best guaranty of peace. We are ready to aid in any way possible in bringing our country's defense to such strength that no foreign aggressor dare attempt to challenge our supremacy.

When that objective has been attained, America will be in a position to lead a war-weary world into the paths of peace, a peace founded on justice and self-respect, that lasting peace which will give to all peoples the God-given right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. To that end our national-defense program is aimed. With such an objective, we cannot fail.

President's Demand for More Money Constitutes Apology to Congress

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. PAUL W. SHAFER

OF MICHIGAN

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

Mr. SHAFER of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, a short time ago when some of us Members were protesting against the demand that Congress adjourn promptly for the summer, when a few of us who realized the pitiable state of our defenses insisted that this Congress stay on the job and remedy this condition, we met with scorn from the White House.

President Roosevelt at that time told his press conference that Congress should go home. He said that if we stayed here all we would do would be to make speeches—speeches which impliedly were useless.

Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the President sent to this Congress an urgent message asking that we appropriate or authorize a total of five billions of dollars in appropriations for national defense. The need, he said, was immediate, and the objective was total defense.

It is a matter upon which the country is to be congratulated, that the President has at last seen the urgency of our defense needs. And further congratulations are due the country that the President has found that under the American form of Government Congress serves a different purpose than merely making speeches—that we are a part of the Government and that under the Constitution which still prevails we have a duty and a responsibility to the people who send us here.

I trust, Mr. Speaker, that this message of the President constitutes an apology for his former sneering remarks as well as an indication that the President is willing to concede that there are other branches in our form of government besides the executive.

Theater Must Be Purged

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM P. LAMBERTSON

OF KANSAS

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

Thursday, July 11, 1940

Mr. LAMBERTSON. Mr. Speaker, there has been a great furor over my remarks of July 4 on the demise of the W. P. A.

theater project. Such terms as "bigotry," "witch's hunt," "liberty," and "red" baiting have been employed in the usual "party line" manner. On the other hand, many warm messages of approval have reached me.

There is nothing so new in all this. The sad thing is that there is not something new—the ridding of the theater of this communistic crowd. When the theater project was debated in the House on May 23 last we were warned against the continued dominance of the Communists and the Workers Alliance in theatrical affairs, yet on the very next day Actors' Equity, at the annual election of council members, showed its preference for leaders of that stripe by electing Sam Jaffe, as I previously pointed out.

The official report of this annual meeting mentions "a disappointingly small turn-out of scarcely 350 members" out of a total membership of over 4,000.

Except for a couple of emotional flare-ups toward the end of the meeting—

The report states—

this was generally a quiet and amicable meeting, which received the reports of officers and committees, cast ballots which elected the entire regular ticket of officers and councilors, and sustained the Chair in its ruling that a resolution which would have committed Equity to nonparticipation in any aspect of the war, or preparation for it, was out of order.

Note that this indicates that the "slate" was "streamlined" through. The emotional flare-ups mentioned in the report were later described. It seems that Philip Loeb has quite a lot to say at these policy meetings. The Dies committee has him cataloged as belonging to or participating in the following communistic projects:

American Committee for Democracy and Intellectual Freedom; Theater Arts Committee; National Emergency Conference for Democratic Rights; American League for Peace and Democracy; in defense of the Bill of Rights; New Masses letter to the President; statement by American Progressives on the Moscow Trials, volume 1, page 375, hearings of this committee.

Let us see what this last tag refers to. I will quote from page 374 of the sworn testimony of Walter S. Steele, representing the National Republic, and chairman of the American Coalition Committee on National Security, representing various organizations:

There has grown up in the United States quite a vast group referred to freely in non-Communist circles as Russians' and communism's "antiseptic squad," meaning small groups devoting its efforts toward ridiculing the idea of a "red" menace and attempting to discredit anyone who charges that there is such a menace. This group also protests attempts of Congress and State legislatures to advance laws to deal with revolutionists and their activities. It carried on a vocal and "in the paper" campaign for recognition of Russia. It condemns the releasing of radicals from college and other professional and political positions. It comes to the front in event of attempted deportations of alien "reds" and for the advancement of citizenship to aliens who refuse to swear allegiance to our country. In other words, its job is to defend Russia and communism and to coo our people into calmness in face of the reality of a "red" menace in the United States, which they claim is but a myth.

In November 1937 over 500,000 of such individuals are reported to have affixed their signatures to what the "reds" entitled the "Golden Book" which was a book of eulogies to the Communist Government of Russia on the event of its 20 years of rule and ruin of the Russian people. This book was dispatched to Mr. Stalin, the dictator, through the Russian Ambassador in the United States.

In April 1938 some of this type even went so far as to declare their support and approval of the widespread epidemic of Government killings of individuals whom Stalin claims were deserters and enemies of his regime. They said:

"The measures taken by the Soviet Union to preserve and extend its gains and its strength find echoes here, where we are staking the future of the American people on the preservation of progressive democracy and the unification of our efforts to prevent Fascists from strangling the rights of our people. American liberals must not permit their outlook on these questions to be confused, nor allow recognition of the place of the Soviet Union in the international fight for democracy against fascism to be destroyed. We call upon them to support the efforts of the Soviet Union to free itself from insidious internal dangers * * *."

And there, among two columns of signatures, is that of Philip Loeb, this spokesman of the Council of Actors' Equity Association. Going back to the official report of this latest annual meeting, Loeb is described as being "particularly disturbed over the campaign against Sam Jaffe, nominated for the council on the regular ticket, whom Mr. Loeb described as 'one of the finest, noblest creatures in the theatrical professional, a man of culture and an asset to the profession.' "

Anyone sufficiently interested in this question to read my remarks will readily recognize in them a constructive suggestion to the theater and to the great majority of patriotic members of the profession to clean house. I challenge the Actors' Equity Council to go publicly on record that the seven members of its governing council that I have named are not Communist "fellow travelers" or Communist members. As to demands for proof, the council may rest assured that the appropriate branches of the United States Government will adequately care for that in due time. It is significant that Sam Jaffe, one of those I named, has issued a statement offering Congress a "swap." He, with others of his ilk, "will resign from Equity Council the day Congress restores the Federal Theater to full activity." That is exceedingly generous of a man who signed, last August 10, a manifesto addressed to many publications in this country, which was characterized by The Nation in its issue of September 2, 1939, as "an unqualified endorsement of the Soviet system."

Perhaps Mr. Jaffe would like to explain also, his membership in the Theater Arts Committee, and the League Against War and Fascism, later known as the League for Peace and Democracy, which the Dies committee has officially designated as a front organization of the Communist Party. He could also amplify his public statement that I would have been entirely incorrect had I offered as an excuse for killing the W. P. A. theater project the fact of his election to Equity's Council. He states he was "not on the council of Actors' Equity when the project was killed."

The United States Senate had restored the theater project in House Joint Resolution 544. Senator ADAMS, in charge of the legislation, stated to the Senate that no inquiry had been made by his committee as to whether or not any Communists were still on Equity's Council, and the Senate was willing to give the profession another chance. It voted the theater project back into the appropriation. This would have given the deserving people in the profession the same status as those in other W. P. A. projects. Local sponsorship is required for all W. P. A. projects, and the Senate's action would have revived the theater project and put it on a par with the others. However, the conferees, 4 weeks after Jaffe's election, struck down the project again.

Mr. Louis Schaffer of the Garment Workers Union, director of the Labor Stage in New York City, has published a booklet entitled "Stalin's Fifth Column on Broadway." He gives convincing proof that T. A. C.—Theater Arts Committee—is a Communist Front organization. To quote a short passage:

To trail in the wake of T. A. C. is to uphold the hands of those who helped wreck the Federal Theater by pursuing the factional ends of the Stalin machine and who will discredit any effort at reconstruction because the world knows them for what they are; the friends of the Soviet Army which invaded Finland, slanderers and demagogue in the service of an alien national interest.

Contrast that quotation with the very brief résumé of Philip Loeb's championship of T. A. C., in the report of Equity's annual meeting of May 24, page 17 of Equity for June. The report represents Mr. Loeb as resenting "the ruling adopted by Equity in April, forbidding the Equity membership to resort to other organizations, and specifically T. A. C., on matters of obtaining Federal relief for actors."

"I do not think it incompatible to be a good member of T. A. C. and a good member of Equity," he declared.

Mr. Loeb, Mr. Jaffe, Mr. Sherman, Miss Marsh, Mr. MacLean, Mr. Hewitt, Miss Van Cleve, and Mr. Heller, mentioned in my July 4 remarks, are all members of T. A. C. and have fought tenaciously to aline Equity with that organization.

Loeb also offers Congress a swap, and has the temerity to utter the word "bigotry." Another swapper is Hiram Sherman. On what meat do these our Caesars feed, who offer to stop their communistic activities in exchange for congressional acquiescence in their demands?

It is my hope that the entertainment professions will weed out the Communists occupying key positions in their organizations. I am convinced that only by doing so, can they hope for the assistance of Congress which they have sought.

Mr. Speaker, let me close these remarks with the reading of two of the communications on this subject I have received representing two viewpoints. Here is a letter from a woman who has seen and experienced the under-cover workings of these Communists. For obvious reasons, I am omitting her name:

Representative LAMBERTSON of Kansas,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. LAMBERTSON: Thank God you see through the Federal Theater Project. There are those of us who are compelled to sit by and see the Communists strangle worthy actors and our profession. It is a horrible feeling. This situation has been going on for such a long time that the stench has finally reached high Heaven and I hope you will personally see that there is a thorough clean-up. I know your job won't be easy for the Communist clings with a tenaciousness that refuses to let go. I only wish I could jump in and help free the theater of this pestilence. These have been hard times for me, but managed to get along somehow without W. P. A. Sometimes I didn't know which way to turn, but I wasn't born in good old Illinois for nothing. I kept my chin up. So it is with a profound feeling of gratitude that I write to thank you for taking your stand against these vultures who not only seek to destroy my profession but all professions, our families, our homes, and finally our Nation.

Perhaps you won't even read this letter, but it gives me courage to write my feelings to a man who has grasped the situation, especially in this hour when we need so much courage to go on.

Thanks to you and God bless you.

Sincerely.

The following is the way in which Horace Casselberry views the situation:

45 WEST 47.

LAMMY:

Ignorance is about the loosest thing that bigotry ever uses to defeat itself. Yours is no exception. We confidently expect your congressional demise in due order. Kansas is John Brown's old stamping ground and the spiritual distance between you and old John Brown is as great as the black bottomless abyss between the young Jew Jesus, and the Pope of Rome. Equity will still be Equity when you are laid out cold by your own Kansas constituents and not a single actor to mourn you. You may fatuously believe that you are "ganging up" on Equity, but you are actually "ganging up" on yourself. "Red" baiting is a thing that comes home to roost, especially when it is as viciously ignorant as yours. What Congress needs just now more than anything else is a few intelligent Communists in seats close to yours. That will come in time. We are glad you used the RECORD to expose yourself so neatly. We earnestly hope to hear more from you of the same high order of ignorance.

HORACE CASSELBERRY.

The Leaf and the Life

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JED JOHNSON OF OKLAHOMA
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES
Tuesday, June 11, 1940

ADDRESS BY DR. GEORGE W. TRUETT

Mr. JOHNSON of Oklahoma. Mr. Speaker, under the special leave granted me, I am including as a part of my remarks a very unusual, eloquent, and inspiring address delivered some 38 years ago by Dr. George W. Truett, who for about a third of a century has been pastor of the First Baptist Church of Dallas, Tex., and for 5 years was president of the Baptist World Alliance.

May I add that this address made such a profound and lasting impression upon my mind when I first read it as a small lad that I feel it will be of genuine interest to citizens of all ages, creeds, or political faiths. It is a literary gem.

This memorable address, delivered by one of the world's greatest pulpit orators, and outstanding religious leader, follows:

THE LEAF AND THE LIFE

The topic upon which I am to speak is, The Leaf and the Life. It at once suggests the wide influence of the printed page upon all human life, whether upon the individual, the home, the state, or the church.

In thinking upon this subject a scene of the olden days passes before me. An old man is confined in the dark, cold, noisome Mamertine prison. Upon him are marks of feebleness by reason of advancing age and also the scars of many a hard-fought battle. The time of his departure is almost at hand. He has fought a good fight and is now complacently awaiting the summons to go hence. But before he goes he must write to his son in the ministry, Timothy, the gifted young pastor of the church at Ephesus. It is all a very realistic picture. See the old man as he slowly writes, "Do thy diligence to come shortly unto me." Poor, old, lonely soldier, while the shadows are so heavily gathering about him, it is no wonder that he yearns for the companionship of his dear young friend. He goes on to write, "The cloak that I left at Troas, with Carpus, when thou comest, bring with thee." You see, Paul was no Christian Scientist. He was just a plain sensible man, recognizing that he had a physical body, and that he needed his cloak in order that he might be somewhat protected against the cold. Then he added these significant words: "Bring with thee the books, but especially the parchments." Just what these books and parchments were, of course, we may not positively say, but it is probable that they were the Holy Scriptures, together with other noble books that had wrought mightily in their influence over Paul, and were unspeakably precious to his great heart.

Though he was first and foremost in all the works and triumphs of Christianity, though he was marvelously endowed by nature and by grace for his incomparable work as an apostle, yet Paul prized beyond all human computation his books. They were his constant companions and fellow helpers through all the eventful years of his matchless ministry. Paul was not only a flaming evangelist, he was a glorious teacher of doctrine as well. The two should always go together. In his far-reaching outlook for the work of the kingdom, Paul employed the leaf as well as the voice. Indeed, the crowning work of his life was the writing of his Epistles.

This scene of the olden days suggests some lessons of measureless moment to the people of God. Prominent among these lessons is that of the possibility of preserving and disseminating truth by means of the printed page. The printing press is man's greatest mechanical triumph. By this means we not only become the heirs of the thoughts of the wisest and best men of all the ages but we have also the transcription of the very thoughts of God. This is a triumph beside which none other of man can begin to compare. Though one may be poor, seeing never the wise and great of the earth, yet by means of the printed page they enter his humble home and become his personal companions and friends. Thus Franklin enriches him with his practical wisdom. Shakespeare reveals to him the worlds of imagination, and Milton sings to him of paradise. Nobly has Milton said of a good book that "It is the precious life blood of a master spirit treasured up unto a life beyond." And strongly does Emerson say, in his great Essay on Books, that "there are books which take rank in our life with parents and lovers and passionate experiences, so medicinal, so stringent, so revolutionary, so authoritative."

We are never to lose sight of the truth that it is utterly impossible for the printed page to take the place of the preacher. The progress of civilization, the vast increase of schools and learning, the amazing triumphs of the press, mighty as are all these agencies, they can never supersede the divinely sent preacher. "It pleased God by the foolishness of preaching to save them that believe." Let not Christ's minister for one moment lose sight of the divineness of his mission. Of him it has been truly said: "He holds a divine commission, he proclaims a divine revelation, he is animated by a divine purpose, he accomplishes a divine result, he is dependent upon a divine Spirit." As in the past, so shall it ever be in the future, that God's foremost instrument in both the evangelization and civilization of the world is His preacher.

But it is just as true that the preacher can never take the place of the printed page. The preacher and the printed page are correlatives. Hand in hand they always need go, and their union should be as vital and as indissoluble as was that of the Siamese twins. Their conjoined influence finds striking illustration in the rise of Protestantism. The preacher alone did not bring about the great Reformation, and could not have brought it about. The printer had to come in. Luther was the preacher, Erasmus was the writer.

This truth is still more strikingly illustrated in the union of Christ the incarnate word and Christ the written word. The incarnate word was not enough; neither was the written word enough. Therefore, the word "incarnate" and the word "written" stand or fall together. The two storm centers of all religious history and controversy have been Christ and the Bible. The Bible is the complement and counterpart of Christ. They are one and inseparable—the binomial word of God. The porch of Solomon's temple was upheld by two mighty pillars of brass, the names of which were Jachin, meaning strength, and Boaz, meaning continuance. When the ancient Jew went to the temple, though faint and weary from his journey, the sight of those two pillars always brought confidence to his heart and strength to his arm. The leaf and the life, the word "written" and the word "incarnate," are the Jachin and Boaz in the whole scheme of the Christian religion. They must stand or fall together, for the veracity of the one stands pledged for the perpetuity of the other. We do not have one iota of fear as to the destiny of either, but our deepest conviction is that if Jesus Christ is to reign throughout all the world—an ultimate triumph of which we have not a doubt—to a marvelous degree the propaganda must be carried on by the dissemination of the word of God. Its leaves, like the leaves of the tree of life, are for the healing of the nations. Those leaves are to be sent upon the four winds of heaven, bearing the tidings of salvation to those who sit in darkness and in the shadow of death.

Would you see the influence of the leaf upon national life? Then you have only to open your eyes to behold illustrations without number. The circulation of the Bible in France, Switzerland, Germany, Holland, and England, in the several stages of Protestant development, exercised an immeasurable influence. The iron preacher, the press, could go where the flesh and blood preacher could not go. And when assemblies were unlawful and speakers would be arrested and imprisoned, the leaves from the press were being silently carried from country to country, from city to city, and from house to house.
